No one who has seen the permanent military preparations of Japan on Chinese soil—in Manchuria, Chihli, Shantung, Mongolia, Fukien, far up the Yangtze Valley, and in southwest China; Japanese telephones and telegraph lines, barracks, and garrisons, and wireless plants—can doubt Japan's studied policy of continuous military and economic aggression; e. g., the Japanese Government now has great wireless plants erected all over China at these strategic points—Hankow, Peking, Manchuli, Dalny, Port Arthur, Kungchuling, Tsingtao, and Tsinanfu. This last named, in the capital of this Province, is located in a great, high, stone-walled fortresslike compound; permanent barracks here of brick and stone to accommodate hundreds of soldiers. And the garrison is full of soldiers who periodically sally out and terrorize the people. This compound could not be more strategically located, being between the yards of two great railroad lines, one running north and south from Peking to Shanghai (Nanking), the other from Tsingtao westward. The compound was taken away by the Japanese from the Standard Oil Co. of the United States. This one Japanese garrison in this place, with its powerful wireless, has a stranglehold on China—north, south, east, and west.

In another place this man says:

One of the many illuminating illustrations of what Japan will do in China for the "equality of races" and "equal opportunity" and "the open door" of John Hay is seen in her recent doings at Tsingtao, as soon as the Paris decision made her secure in her position. She began the same sort of proceedings there and in the same spirit as against American missions and missionaries that she tried to carry out in Korea several years ago in the bogus conspiracy trials and secret tortures there. On utterly false and absurd charges the American missionaries and Christian teachers were arrested, haled before the Japanese authorities, the missionaries rebuked, the Chinese teachers sent home, the Chinese principal of the boys' high schools, Mr. Wang Shu Ching, a peaceable, law-abiding man, banished for three years; the fine big high-school building, of stone and brick, the gift of Mrs. Hugh O'Neill, of New York City, seized and sealed by Japanese soldiers. The American mission has been practically kicked out of the east end of the Province. It will have to move, at great monetary loss and detriment to a fine work it has been building up among the Chinese since it was begun, in 1863, under the venerable and beloved missionary pioneer, the Rev. Hunter Corbett, D. D., LL. D. The Chinese church at Tsingtao, self-supporting for years, has been broken up by the Japanese; the Christians, leading business men and educators, have been forced to get out. Two Chinese pastors are held there, constantly spied upon by the Japanese soldiers and ordered several times a week to the yamen to be grilled by inquisitors. Needless to say that American business, as well as Chinese, has long since been throttled in Tsingtao by the Japanese Government. In the unfairly acquired property the Japanese have opened up business.

In the same manner the American Girls' High School, though more than one hour westward by railroad outside the Japanese "Gebiet," has been repeatedly visited by Japanese armed and in uniform, the girls' rooms entered, and the girls and teachers insulted, until all are terrorized, and the parent constituency in all the five adjoining counties now fear to send their girls away to school. The Japanese have therefore accomplished the same purpose in this instance as by more formal proceedings against the boys' high school at Tsingtao.

The Japanese Government hates American missions in China with a deadly hatred. The Bible, which they teach, stands square against all the injustice Japan purposes and pushes in China. The Japanese officers in uniform have told the missionaries to their face, "There are too many American missionaries in Shantung." There are indeed—for Japan's purpose in Koreanizing China.

Any student of the Japanese press will soon be astonished and then alarmed at the political and economic gospel that is being preached the Japanese Nation. Its leaders, following their Prussian teachers, are sedulously indoctrinating the people with the idea of Japanese supermanship and ability and right to conquer, not merely China but the world, in view of Japan's ready mailed fist and superior "Kultur." It is preached skillfully and all the time in the current literature by parliament members, Government professors, army and navy officers, Government civil officials and editors, just as Gerard shows it was preached in Germany in order to uphold the militaristic, oligarchic clique. If this propaganda and policy is not counteracted vigorously and speedily, here is the powder train of a greater world war.

The above is not "German propaganda." The writer, like most Americans, came to the Far East an ardent admirer of Japan. The unanswerable logic of Japanese doings outside Japan in the Far East, and particularly in Formosa, Korea, and the Chinese Provinces and dependencies, slowly but inevitably turns one in unqualified condemnation of the Japanese Government and its people abroad. Outside Japan they are not merely a nuisance, disliked by foreigners of all nationalities, but feared as a menace of world peace.

No wonder, then, that every sort of an association and company of Americans in the Far East has cabled home protests to the purport of that cabled by the Americans of Shantung:

Then he quotes the cablegram, as follows:

American citizens in Shantung capital against treaty ratification.

The American citizens of Tsinanfu, the capital of Shantung Province, China, on July 9 sent the following cablegram to Senator JOHNSON of California:

"Paris decision Shantung question aggravating Japanese arrogant aggression. Treaty proposals unjust to China, antagonistic to American ideals, mean closing open door, imperiling peace Far East. American citizens Tsinan, Shantung, therefore strongly protest against ratification peace treaty in present form."

Mr. President, I have read at considerable length from this man's letter. I have done so because it seemed to me, in the first place, there was no doubt of the reliability and the honesty of the man, and there can be no question of his knowledge of the situation about which he is writing.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. I was going to ask the Senator if he desired to conclude his remarks to-night? There is a wish on the part of some Senators for a closed executive session.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am willing to go on or to quit now; but I will say to the Senator from Utah that I am not going to be able to conclude my remarks to-day. If it is desired to have an executive session and the Senator from Utah desires to make such a motion, I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, before the Senator from Nebraska yields the floor, I desire to ask him a question.

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GRONNA. How recently was the letter which the Senator has read written? If the Senator has stated it for the RECORD, it will not be necessary for him to repeat the date.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know whether I stated it or not.

Mr. GRONNA. I should like to know the date of the letter.

Mr. NORRIS. This letter was written on the 20th day of July, 1919.

Mr. GRONNA. As I understood the Senator, only German missionaries have been undisturbed in the Province of Shantung?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRONNA. And all American missionaries have not only been disturbed but that they have been persecuted and sent to prison. Am I right in my conclusion?

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has said in his question, "All American missionaries." I do not know of any who have not been persecuted, but I would not dare to say that all of them have been persecuted, for I do not know.

Mr. GRONNA. But a great many of them have been persecuted, as I understood the Senator?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I have not heard of any who have not been persecuted.

Mr. GRONNA. I do not know that it would be fair for me to propound an inquiry as to why so many of the ministers of the gospel, the men who are looking after the welfare of our souls, the men who are supposed to preach the true doctrine of Christ, are so insistent upon the ratification of this treaty unamended. Can it be that they are ignorant of these facts?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Senator has asked a very fair question. In a sentence, I will say that my judgment is that there is not a Christian minister anywhere on the face of the globe who, if he understood all that this treaty means, would ask that we approve it unamended. On Monday I am going to take up and compare with what has been done in China that I have outlined so far, what Japan did in Korea, and in doing that I expect to go more fully into the particular aspects of the matter that is suggested by the question of the Senator. I do not care to go into it now, because I have a great deal more evidence, more convincing than any I have yet produced, as to what the Japanese were doing in Korea in blotting out the Christian religion and destroying the Christian churches.

Mr. GRONNA. I want to thank the Senator. I have been very much interested in his speech. I may say that I am always interested in what the Senator has to say, but this particular discussion has been very illuminating to me. I can readily see where these men may be honestly mistaken.

Mr. NORRIS. These preachers?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, they are. I have no doubt of that. I would not think of accusing any of them, or anyone else, of having any malicious motive. I do not think they have. I think they are just as honest in their convictions as I am in mine.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator has not accused anyone, so far as I have been able to hear; but, if the Senator will permit me, I will state that it is as old as history; in fact, it is older than history. We find that prophets, scribes, and Pharisees can easily get together with great aggregations of wealth, and for a time delusions and false doctrines prevail. But I am really surprised to learn that the great financiers of this country, the men who are located on a certain street in the great metropolis of our country which I do not care to name now, with their great eagle eye for business, have overlooked the fact that this treaty will not be beneficial to them in any business way. I am sure the Senator's remarks will be not only glanced over but read with care; and if they find that the conditions are as I believe them to be, and as the Senator from Nebraska has stated them to be, then, sir, there will not be so many millions poured into the treasury of these men who are so eagerly and so anxiously asking that this treaty shall be ratified without the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am not going to discuss in any detail the financial provisions of the treaty at this time or in this address. I am confining my remarks to the pending motion; but the Senator has gauged it rightly. If I can understand it, not only are American missionaries and the Christian religion to be driven out of Asia, but American business men in the Far East are going to lose business if this treaty is approved. Of course, the great millionaires to whom the Senator refers may be more interested in making millions in Europe, so that the loss of business in Asia will be so small as compared to what they will make over in Europe by the ratification of the treaty that they will still be for the treaty. I only wanted to suggest to the Senator from North Dakota and to the Senate, in connection with his suggestion about the moneyed men of the country being so anxious to have this treaty approved, that they never ought to forget that the first copy of this treaty that ever came to the United States came to Wall Street. They had it before the Senate was able to get it. They had it when the President refused to let us see it, and they had it with the President's consent. Wall Street had it at that time and knew what was in it.

Monday, October 13, 1919.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, following what the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has said, I desire to make a further correction of the President of the United States in some other erroneous statements that he has made, and to do this I will have to repeat slightly what I have already said in my present address.

On the 5th day of September the President, in speaking at St. Louis, used the following language:

> Great Britain and, subsequently, France, as everybody knows, in order to make it more certain that Japan would come into the war and so assist to clear the Pacific of the German fleets, had promised that any rights that Germany had in China should, in the case of the victory of the Allies, pass to Japan.

On the next day after the President made that speech at St. Louis, in the Senate I called attention to the error in the following language, after quoting that which I have just read:

> Mr. President, the President represented our Government at the peace conference. He knows, of course, what was presented there and what the facts are; but it is a matter of history that Great Britain and the other Governments of which the President speaks did not make that secret agreement with Japan until the year 1917. Japan went into the war soon after it was declared, in 1914. At the time the secret agreement of which he speaks was made with Great Britain and the other powers all of the German possessions in China had been captured, and there was not a German vessel free on the Pacific Ocean; so the President does not have his history on straight.
> The first move that was ever made to bring about that secret agreement was made on the 27th day of March, 1917, and I challenge anyone to produce any evidence that before Japan went into the war she had any such agreement. I ask the President, in his next speech to the American people, to produce that evidence and substantiate what he said at St. Louis.

Shortly after I made that speech I received the telegram that I have already read in evidence, but I will read it again because what will follow immediately bears directly upon it:

> GARRISON, MONT., September 12.
> Hon. G. W. NORRIS, > United States Senate, Washington:
> I thank you for correcting an unintentional inaccuracy in one of my recent speeches.
> (Signed) WOODROW WILSON.

Mr. President, there can be no meaning to that telegram excepting the particular correction that I have just read. I made no other, so it must refer to that.

In my remarks in the present address, I think it was on Friday, I commented on the fact that the President in making the correction had done it by a private telegram to me; that I had not given that telegram to the public until he had finished his tour, because I had hoped, I had expected, that if he wanted to be fair with the American people he himself would make the correction in as public a manner as he had made the misstatement of a very material matter in connection with the treaty. I am not going to comment on that now, because I have already done it in this address.

But this morning some one gave me an official copy of the addresses of President Wilson. They have been printed by the Government of the United States, and I have the volume now in my hand. I had assumed that, though the President had not made a public correction of that important mistake and misstatement of fact, he would at least not repeat the misstatement in other speeches to the American people. Mr. President, I was dumbfounded when, just a few moments ago, since I have come into the Chamber and was given this official report of his speeches, in the few minutes that I have had to spare to look at it, I have found four instances where the President, since he sent that telegram to me, has made practically the same misstatement that he made at St. Louis.

He made it at Los Angeles, in the same speech to which the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has just referred, and in which he has corrected another misstatement made—and I will say to the Senator from Idaho that the same mistake that the President made about John Hay in the Los Angeles speech was made in several other speeches, as I have just accidentally observed while I was looking for this particular Shantung provision. But notwithstanding the President's telegram of September 12 to me, on September 20, at Los Angeles, he used this language:

> In the meantime, after this present war began, England and France, not at the same time, but successively, feeling that it was essential that they should have the assistance of Japan on the Pacific, agreed that if Japan would go into this war and take whatever Germany had in the Pacific, she should retain everything north of the Equator which had belonged to Germany.

Again, on September 22, at Reno, Nev., the President used this language in a public address to the American people:

> Not only that, but, in the meantime, since this war began, Great Britain and France entered into solemn covenants of treaty with Japan that if she would come into the war and continue her operations against Germany in the Pacific they would lend their whole influence and power to the cession to Japan of everything that Germany had in the Pacific.

Again, at Salt Lake City, on the 23d day of September, the President used this language:

> At the beginning of the war and during the war Great Britain and France engaged by solemn treaty with Japan that if she would come into the war and continue in the war, she could have, provided she in the meantime took it by force of arms, what Germany had in China.

Again, at Cheyenne, on September 24, the President said:

> Before we got into the war, Great Britain and France had entered into solemn covenant by treaty with Japan that if she would take what Germany had in Shantung by force of arms, and also the islands lying north of the Equator which had been under German dominion in the Pacific, she could keep them when the peace came and its settlements were made.

Now, Mr. President, I have only had a few minutes to examine the President's speeches. I do not know how many other times the President has made that misstatement of fact.

Of course, as I have already shown in my present address, Japan had been in the war for two and a half years. There was not a free German ship anywhere in the Pacific Ocean, armed or unarmed, at the time that secret agreement was made.

It is not with any comfort, Mr. President, that I call the attention of the Senate to these facts. I assumed, of course, that when the President sent the telegram acknowledging his error he would not repeat it. It seemed to me that if he wanted to be really fair with the American people he would have told them that he had made a mistake at St. Louis. It is hardly conceivable that he made a mistake at St. Louis even, because he knew the facts were not what he said they were; but not only has he withheld the facts from the American people, but after he has acknowledged in a private way the error, he has gone on and repeated the statement over and over again to the American people.

As I said at the beginning of my remarks on last Friday, the truth will probably never overtake the falsehood, because wide circulation was given particularly to the St. Louis speech; but I can hardly conceive how any man—oh, I can not conceive how the President of the United States—can deliberately restate and state again and again something that he not only knows but has acknowledged to be wrong and which he knew was absolutely untrue in connection with an extremely important matter pertaining to this treaty. I commented at some length last Friday on that, and I am not going to repeat what I then said.

Mr. President, when we adjourned on Saturday last I had reached in my remarks a place where I was going to take up Korea. Before I do so, however, I wish to refer briefly to what the treaty provides in other cases where property has been taken in the course of the war and turned over to the people to whom it rightfully belonged.

Everybody knows that Shantung belongs to China and ought to go to China, and that the treaty ought to have given it to China. Belgium was recaptured by English troops and turned over to Belgium. Everybody concedes that that was right. Portions of France were recaptured from Germany by American troops and turned over to France. Everybody admits that that was right. The sacred soil of Alsace-Lorraine, captured in part by the sacrifices and the lifeblood of American troops, was turned over to the rightful owner—France. Nobody has said that anything should be different. But, Mr. President, it was not only in relation to the big powers but to the little powers as well, with the one exception of China, that the same rule applied. Let me read article 135 of the treaty. It provides:

Article 135.

Germany recognizes that all treaties, conventions and agreements between her and Siam, and all rights, title and privileges derived therefrom, including all rights of extraterritorial jurisdiction, terminated as from July 22, 1917.

It must be remembered that China claimed when she went into the war with Japan that that act abrogated Germany's right, whatever it might have been. Let me read article 136 of the treaty, which applies more particularly to the point I am now making:

Article 136.

All goods and property in Siam belonging to the German Empire or to any German State, with the exception of premises used as diplomatic or consular residences or offices, pass ipso facto and without compensation to the Siamese Governement.

The goods, property and private rights of German nationals in Siam shall be dealt with in accordance with the provisions of Part X (Economic Clauses) of the present Treaty.

Article 139.

Germany recognizes that all treaties and arrangements between her and Liberia terminated as from August 4, 1917.

Article 141.

Germany renounces all rights, titles and privileges conferred on her by the General Act of Algeciras of April 7, 1906, and by the Franco-German Agreements of February 9, 1909, and November 4, 1911. All treaties, agreements, arrangements and contracts concluded by her with the Sherifian Empire are regarded as abrogated as from August 3, 1914.

In no case can Germany take advantage of these instruments and she undertakes not to intervene in any way in negotiations relating to Morocco which may take place between France and the other Powers.

Article 144.

All property and possessions in the Sherifian Empire of the German Empire and the German States pass to the Maghzen without payment.

For this purpose, the property and possessions of the German Empire and States shall be deemed to include all the property of the Crown, the Empire or the States, and the private property of the former German Emperor and other Royal personages.

Then another clause of the same article provides:

Mining rights which may be recognised as belonging to German nationals by the Court of Arbitration set up under the Moroccan Mining Regulations shall form the subject of a valuation, which the arbitrators shall be requested to make, and these rights shall then be treated in the same way as property in Morocco belonging to German nationals.

Mr. President, when it came to China a different rule was applied—the only exception in the treaty.

Now, I am going to take up Korea. There are several reasons why the situation of Korea ought to be given very close consideration in passing on this treaty. In the first place, I have set out at length the treaties which Germany and other nations made with China in which the integrity of the Chinese nation was recognized and guaranteed. I will show that Japan proceeded along the same lines with reference to Korea that she is now proceeding with reference to China, although from time to time, by treaty obligations with Korea similar to those I have shown to exist in the case of China, Japan guaranteed the integrity of the Korean Empire. If that be true, then it is fair to conclude that what Japan did with Korea she is going to do with China, since up to the present time she has pursued exactly the same course, in a good many instances almost word for word and step by step. Everyone knows that eventually she took all of Korea and annexed the nation.

There is another reason why the consideration of the Korean question is important. If we were a court of probate and some one were here asking for the custody of an orphan child which was within the jurisdiction of the court we would look into the character of the person asking for the child's custody, and, if that person had been given the custody of another child prior to that time we would investigate and ascertain how he took care of the other child the custody of which he had theretofore been given. If we are going to turn China over to Japan it is interesting and important and necessary that we inquire how Japan has conducted herself in other cases where people and nations have been turned over to her.

There is another reason why it is extremely important to give heed to these considerations. If this treaty is ratified, as I think I will be able to show, American citizens will never dare harbor within their midst or within our territory anyone who advocates the independence of the Korean Republic. Let me read the much-discussed section 10 of the covenant of the league of nations and consider it in a light in which it has not been discussed:

The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league. In case of any such aggression or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.

Nearly everybody—I do not know but that everybody, so far as I remember now—who has discussed article 10 has discussed it in the sense that we guarantee to preserve against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of members of the league. No one has yet discussed what obligation we will be under when we come to consider that we are not only bound to preserve from external aggression the territorial integrity and political independence of the members of the league but we are bound to "respect" the territorial integrity and political independence of members of the league. If we approve the league the first Irishman who stands on a street corner and makes a speech in favor of the freedom of Ireland will be doing something that will show disrespect to a member of the league, and we will have to suppress him and ought to suppress him under the league; it would be our duty to do so. The same is true as to Korea, and the agitation for Korea's independence will have to cease if we have the proper respect that we say we will have in article 10.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does the Senator consider the word "respect" there to mean esteem for, or does he not regard it as meaning the obligation upon the part of members of the league not to violate the territorial integrity or political independence of the other members of the league? Does the Senator construe the word "respect" to mean esteem?

Mr. NORRIS. Well, I should say that "respect" includes both of the interpretations that the Senator has suggested.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Senator will pardon me for a further interruption——

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. In my opinion, clearly the word "respect" there simply means that the nations obligate themselves not to violate the territorial integrity or political independence of the other members of the league, and the allusion that the Senator has made to a Sinn Feiner or an Irishman on the streets advocating independence for Ireland would not constitute a violation of the obligation as I construe it.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator for his suggestion, and, of course, he may be right in his interpretation, but in my opinion we would not be having the respect that this treaty demands we should have for other members of the league if we should permit our citizens or people under the jurisdiction of our laws to try to work up a sentiment in favor of the independence of any people anywhere on the face of the earth; and I believe the first thing that would happen would be an objection on the part of England, or if it took place in reference to Korea the first thing that would happen would be an objection upon the part of Japan; and as I construe the word "respect" they would have legal grounds for making it.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. FALL. Would the Senator understand that the interpretation placed upon article 10 as it stands here now was the interpretation placed by the President of the United States upon article 10 originally when he presented to the "A, B, C" countries of South America the proposition for a treaty?

Mr. NORRIS. Well, I am not going to try to construe anything that the President said. I confess I give that up. [Laughter.]

Mr. FALL. I have here what the President said with reference to article 10, the original draft.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I have read it. I am familiar with it.

Mr. FALL. He gives his own interpretation of it. I thought it might be enlightening.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator desires to read it, I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. FALL. Referring to the original draft of article 10, which was presented by the President of the United States to Argentina, Brazil, and Chile, with an invitation to the other Latin-American countries to join it—this was in December, 1915—in speaking of it on January 6, 1916, the President said:

It will be accomplished, in the first place, by the States of America uniting in guaranteeing to each other absolute political independence and territorial integrity.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator. I want to read, before I take up the Korean question, the second clause of article 11 of the league of nations:

It is also declared to be the friendly right of each member of the league to bring to the attention of the assembly or of the council any circumstance whatever affecting international relations which threatens to disturb international peace or the good understanding between nations upon which peace depends.

Now, Mr. President, if some one were going through the country advocating the independence of Ireland, or if some one were trying to raise funds, for instance, to further the movement for the independence of Korea, or it might be for the relief of Egypt, or it might be for India, and Japan or Great Britain said to the council: "Here is the United States Government permitting within her borders the creation of a sentiment that is against our Government"—in the case of India they would say it was against Great Britain, and in the case of Korea they would say it was against Japan—is there any doubt but that they would have the right, under that treaty, to make that complaint? And if they made it, would not a fair construction of it be that we would be ordered by the council or the assembly to stop it? At least, we would not be able to pass on it. The council or the assembly would do that.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. This treaty has not been ratified; but has the Senator had called to his attention the cases—14 in number, I think—of the Hindus who during the war advocated the independence of India who are now to be deported to India?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I am somewhat familiar with it; and I want to say to the Senator that my understanding is, from talking to some of those men themselves, that if they are sent back it means either death or imprisonment for a long term of years, probably life. I do not know whether they will be sent back or not, but our Government has the question up now; and if we are going that far before we get this clause that I have read as binding, what can we expect when we make the agreement by which they will have a perfect right to do those very things? Always heretofore this has been a land of refuge from which political prisoners have never been extradited. When they came to free America they were not subject to be deported and taken back because some monarchical Government had said that they were conspiring against it. When this treaty is agreed to, that freedom is gone, and gone forever.

In August, 1894, Japan entered into a treaty with Korea. Article 1 said:

The object of the alliance is to maintain the independence of Korea on a firm footing.

April 17, 1895, not quite a year afterwards, Japan made a treaty with China, article 1 of which reads:

China recognizes definitely the full and complete independence and autonomy of Korea.

That was at the end of the Japo-Chinese war, and Japan required that China should make that recognition.

April 25, 1898, Japan made a treaty with Russia. Article 1 reads as follows:

The two Governments recognize definitely the sovereignty and entire independence of Korea and pledge themselves mutually to abstain from all direct interference in the internal affairs of that country.

Bear that date in mind—August 25, 1898. Could there be anything clearer? Could there be any possible doubt but that Japan, by her own act, had guaranteed the independence of Korea?

January 30, 1902, England and Japan made a treaty, and the preamble says:

The Governments of Great Britain and Japan, actuated solely by a desire to maintain the status quo and general peace in the extreme East, being moreover especially interested in maintaining the territorial integrity of the Empire of China and the Empire of Korea, and in securing equal opportunities in those countries for the commerce and industry of all the nations, hereby agree—

Now, they are not only so desirous to maintain the national integrity of Korea, but here comes article 1 in the same treaty:

ARTICLE 1. The high contracting parties, having mutually recognized the independence of China and Korea, declare themselves to be entirely uninfluenced by any aggressive tendencies in either country.

Now, that will apply to China as well as to Japan; and, remember, that was made January 30, 1902, not only recognizing the independence of Korea and China both, but declaring before the world that they are uninfluenced by any aggressive tendencies in either country. Since that time Japan has gobbled up one, and if this treaty is ratified and becomes a law she will have the greater portion of the other.

When Japan declared war against Russia on February 10, 1904, the Emperor of Japan used this language as a part of the declaration of war:

The integrity of Korea is a matter of gravest concern to this Empire. * * * The separate existence of Korea is essential to the safety of our realm.

That was February 10, 1904.

February 23, 1904, Japan and Korea made a treaty, article 1 of which said:

For the purpose of maintaining a permanent and solid friendship between Japan and Korea and firmly establishing peace in the Far East, the Imperial Government of Korea shall place full confidence in the Imperial Government of Japan, and adopt the advice of the latter in regard to improvements in administration.

Article 2 of the same treaty:

The Imperial Government of Japan shall in a spirit of firm friendship insure the safety and repose of the Imperial House of Korea.

Article 3 of the same treaty:

The Imperial Government of Japan definitely guarantee the independence and territorial integrity of the Korean Empire.

Remember, all those protestations were made February 23, 1904.

August 12, 1905, Japan made a treaty with Great Britain, article 3 of which reads as follows:

Japan possessing paramount political, military, and economic interests in Korea, Great Britain recognizes the right of Japan to take such measures * * * in Korea as she may deem proper * * *. Provided, That such measures are not contrary to the principle of equal opportunities for the commerce and industry of all nations.

Now, Mr. President, the camel is getting his nose into the tent. You remember that Japan had made a treaty with Great Britain in which she had recognized and guaranteed the territorial integrity of Korea? Later, she made this other treaty with Korea, in which the Korean Government says that she will have full confidence in the Imperial Japanese Government, and adopt the advice of the latter.

Japan has the treaty with Great Britain in her way, and so she goes to her ally and makes another treaty by which Great Britain practically takes her hands off and says, "Go ahead, Japan."

That was August 12, 1905. September 5, the next month, Japan makes a treaty with Russia, article 2 of which says:

The Imperial Russian Government, acknowledging that Japan possesses in Korea paramount political, military, and economic interests, engage neither to obstruct nor to interfere with the measures * * * which the Imperial Japanese Government may find it necessary to take in Korea.

The camel is going in a little farther. Japan is making arrangements now with Russia, so that Russia will keep her hands off and let Japan proceed in Korea. She makes a treaty with Great Britain in August, with Russia in September, and then she gets hold of Korea, and on November 17, 1905, makes a treaty, and the preamble to that treaty reads as follows:

The two Governments—

That is, Japan and Korea—desiring to strengthen the principle of solidarity which unites the two Empires, have * * * concluded:

ARTICLE 1. The Government of Japan * * * will hereafter have control and direction of the external relations and affairs of Korea.

The camel has his head in now.

Then, in 1906, Marquis Ito was made Japanese resident general in Korea, and in 1907 Japan prevented the representatives of the Korean Emperor from being given a hearing at The Hague conference.

The camel is going in a little farther.

Then, on July 24, 1907, Japan makes another treaty with Korea, the preamble of which reads:

The Governments of Japan and Korea, desiring speedily to promote the wealth and strength of Korea, and with the object of promoting the prosperity of the Korean nation, have agreed—

Now, whenever Japan says that, look out for what follows. This is what they have agreed to:

ARTICLE 1. In all matters relating to the reform of the Korean administration the Korean Government shall receive instructions and guidance from the [Japanese] resident-general.

You see the similarity, Mr. President, with what I showed at the beginning of my remarks about China. They are taking the same course, following a parallel line exactly. I will read further from the same treaty. I read article 1. Article 4 reads as follows:

In all appointments and removals of high officials, the Korean Government must obtain the consent of the resident-general.

Whom you will remember was a Japanese appointee.

ARTICLE 5. The Korean Government shall appoint to be officials of Korea any Japanese subjects recommended by the resident-general.

ARTICLE 6. The Korean Government shall not appoint any foreigners to be officials of Korea without consulting the resident-general.

The independence of Korea was practically taken away by that treaty, contrary to every solemn obligation and promise that Japan had made, not only to Korea, but to all the world. And, Mr. President, in the one treaty that I have referred to, at the beginning of the Russo-Japanese War, the Korean Government went so far as to permit the Japanese Government to bring soldiers and munitions and guns into Korea, to use her railroads and transportation facilities in order that she might reach the Russians, who were up north of Korea. The Korean Government practically went into an alliance with Japan, which saved no man knows how much in that great war Japan was waging with Russia. It might have been the difference between victory and defeat for all I know. But it gave her a great advantage, and from that day to this the Japanese soldiers have never been taken out of Korean territory.

Now, we are down to 1908. In 1908 Prince Ito declared publicly that it was no part of Japan's purpose to annex Korea. They had practically taken possession of the Government, but were still keeping her separate.

In 1909, one year afterwards, Prince Ito, the same man, declared that Korea must be amalgamated with Japan, and August 22, 1910, there was a treaty between Japan and Korea; and I will show you, Mr. President, that every one of these treaties in which Korea surrendered any part of her sovereignty was made by force. None of them were ever made until after the Russo-Japanese War, until the Japanese soldiers were quartered on Korean soil, until Japan had taken possession of the railroads, given at that time voluntarily with the idea of helping Japan in her contest with Russia, but from that time on everything was compulsion. Unarmed, unfortified, Korea had to submit to the will of the military government of Japan.

Now, we come to the treaty between Japan and Korea, wrung by force out of Korea on August 22, 1910. It reads in part:

ARTICLE 1. His Majesty the Emperor of Korea makes complete and permanent cession to his Majesty the Emperor of Japan of all rights of sovereignty over the whole of Korea.

Everything that Japan said she would not do is now accomplished. But mark the words, it is the Emperor of Korea who makes this cession. Maybe Japan will not accept it. If Japan was so anxious to keep Korea independent perhaps she will say, "No; you had better not do that."

Let us see what article 2 of the same treaty says:

His Majesty the Emperor of Japan accepts the cession mentioned in the preceding article, and consents to the complete annexation of Korea to the Empire of Japan.

Remarkable, remarkable, what a concession Japan was making!

On August 29, 1910, seven days later, Japan formally declared Korea annexed to the dominion of his imperial majesty the Japanese Emperor.

And thus disappears from the world of nations one of the oldest nations of the earth, the Korean Government, annexed absolutely to Japan. Mr. President, I want again to call attention to the parallel between Korea and China. Every step all the way along Japan was making professions and giving guaranties of her intention to preserve the integrity of the Korean nation. Everywhere she is doing the same with China, by taking one slice after another.

If the 21 demands are ever acceded to she will be as fair with China as she was with Korea when she appointed a resident general who took practical control, appointed all the officers of Korea, and removed all Koreans from holding office. It will be only one step more until, as she did in Korea, there will be a treaty by which China will ask the Japanese Government to take her over, and the Japanese Government will reluctantly consent.

Mr. President, during all this time we had a treaty with Korea, and because I want to produce some evidence that has some bearing on it I want to read article 1 of that treaty. It was made May 22, 1882, and was in force at the time Japan took Korea over. Article 1 says:

There shall be perpetual peace and friendship between the President of the United States and the King of Chosen—and the citizens and subjects of their respective Governments.

Chosen, of course, means the same as Korea—

This is the part to which I want to call the Senate's attention:

If other powers deal unjustly or oppressively with either Government, the other will exert their good offices on being informed of the case to bring about an amicable arrangement, thus showing their friendly feeling.

During most of the time while these things were going on an American citizen, H. B. Hulbert, was the adviser of the Korean Emperor. As I remember, he has spent 30 years in Korea, and I am going to read part of the letter in which he sends me some documents. I will read the first paragraph anyway:

MY DEAR SENATOR: I inclose herewith the documents which we spoke of in our conversation. They are, of course, translations of the original, and though there may be slight inaccuracies, I am sure that they correspond very closely with the original. If these documents are found in the archives of the State Department or elsewhere it will be possible to verify them with the new translation, if desired.

One of the documents that I have talked over with Mr. Hulbert, and which he inclosed in that letter, was a translated copy of the message that the Emperor of Korea, in October, 1905, which was about the time Japan was getting the last treaty with Korea, sent to our Government, and he sent it because of the provision in the treaty between our Government and the Korean Government that I have just quoted. Mr. Hulbert was the bearer of this message. He brought it with him from Korea to Washington in person. The original is signed by the man who was Emperor of Korea. It reads as follows:

Ever since 1883 the United States and Korea have been in friendly treaty relations. Korea has received many proofs of the good will and the sympathy of the American Government and people. The American representatives have always shown themselves to be in sympathy with the welfare and progress of Korea.

Many teachers have been sent from America who have done much for the uplift of our people.

I think I ought to pause there to say that under the Korean rule, American missionaries and American teachers were welcomed in Korea. They were protected. The Korean people took kindly not only to the Christian religion, but to the English language, and the missionaries and teachers established schools all over the Empire of Korea. Continuing, the Emperor's letter says:

But we have not made the progress that we ought. This is due partly to the political machinations of foreign powers and partly to our mistakes.

It seems to me this is a very modest letter, because he says later on that he would be glad to receive advice even from the Japanese.

At the beginning of the Japan-Russia war the Japanese Government asked us to enter into an alliance with them, granting them the use of our territory, harbors, and other resources, to facilitate their military and naval operations. Japan, on her part, guaranteed to preserve the independence of Korea and the welfare and dignity of the royal house. We complied with Japan's request, loyally lived up to our obligations, and did everything that we had stipulated. By so doing we put ourselves in such a position that if Russia had won she could have seized Korea and annexed her to Russian territory on the ground that we were active allies of Japan.

Nobody disputes that statement. It is simply a restatement of historical facts.

It is now apparent that Japan proposes to abrogate their part of this treaty and declare a protectorate over our country, in direct contravention of her sworn promise in the agreement of 1904. There are several reasons why this should not be done.

In the first place Japan will stultify herself by such a direct breach of faith. It will injure her prestige as a power that proposes to work according to enlightened laws.

In the second place, the actions of Japan in Korea during the past two years give no promise that our people will be handled in an enlightened manner. No adequate means have been provided whereby redress could be secured for wrongs perpetrated upon our people. The finances of the country have been gravely mishandled by Japan. Nothing has been done toward advancing the cause of education or justice. Every move on Japan's part has been manifestly selfish.

The destruction of Korea's independence will work her a great injury, because it will intensify the contempt with which the Japanese people treat the Koreans and will make their acts all the more oppressive.

We acknowledge that many reforms are needed in Korea. We are glad to have the help of Japanese advisers and we are prepared loyally to carry out their suggestions. We recognize the mistakes of the past. It is not for ourselves we plead, but for the Korean people.

At the beginning of the war our people gladly welcomed the Japanese, because this seemed to herald needed reforms and a general bettering of conditions, but soon it was seen that no genuine reforms were intended and the people had been deceived.

One of the gravest evils that will follow a protectorate by Japan is that the Korean people will lose all incentive to improvement. No hope will remain that they can ever regain their independence. They need the spur of national feeling to make them determine upon progress and to make them persevere in it. But the extinction of nationality will bring despair, and instead of working loyally and gladly in conjunction with Japan the old-time hatred will be intensified and suspicion and animosity will result.

It has been said that sentiment should have no place in such affairs; but we believe, sir, that sentiment is the moving force in all human affairs and that kindness, sympathy, and generosity are still working between nations as between individuals. We beg of you to bring to bear upon this question the same breadth of mind and the same calmness of judgment that have characterized your course hitherto, and, having weighed the matter, to render us what aid you can consistently in this our time of national danger.

That is the message. Mr. Hulbert attaches to that message an affidavit, in which he says:

I declare under oath that the above is the substance of a letter delivered to me by the late Emperor of Korea on or about the 20th of October, 1905, in the city of Seoul, Korea, for transmission to President Roosevelt; that I brought it to Washington, arriving on the 17th of November; that I delivered it into the hands of Secretary Elihu Root on the 21st, after its acceptance at the White House had been refused; and that I hold a letter from Elihu Root acknowledging receipt of the letter.

That is signed by Mr. Hulbert and is sworn to before a notary public.

Now, Mr. President, the principal object that I had in reading this correspondence is to show, if it can under any conceivable circumstances be considered necessary, that this treaty made between Korea and Japan, by which Korea signed away her birthrights, was made by force. In my judgment, under that treaty, our Government ought to have done something then, but, as a matter of fact, we stood like the rest of the world did and saw Japan gobble it up. That is sometimes used as an argument why we should sign the present proposed treaty.

As I have said before in referring to the treaty with China that was made by force and this treaty here, we are confronted with a responsibility that we can not throw off of our shoulders. We must take some action. It is the difference between not being in a position where any action is required and being in a position of responsibility.

Mr. President, if you in your neighborhood knew that some one had stolen your neighbor's horse, if you were a very high-class citizen, you probably ought to go and report it; but suppose you did not and later on some other neighbor steals a horse and you are put on the jury to try him. The case comes before you and the defendant says, "Why, here, Mr. Smith stole a horse last week from this same man and nobody was prosecuted." Would that be a defense if you were a juror or if you were the court when you are required to pass on who owns the property or in a criminal case the punishment of the criminal? In this case it is the ownership of the property we are trying, like a replevin suit.

Would it be a defense to say to Mr. B, who stole a horse from Mr. C, that he could not be prosecuted and that he had a right to keep the horse because Mr. A had stolen a horse from Mr. C and had not been prosecuted?

But, Mr. President, the other document that Mr. Hulbert inclosed in the letter, which I have partially read, was a telegram sent by the Emperor of Korea to him. I will read his letter to me, in which he describes what he did. He took this letter and started for Washington. While he was away they took the Emperor and the members of his cabinet by force and compelled them to sign another treaty, as he describes in the letter, but when he got here he got this telegram from the Emperor of Korea:

I declare that the so-called treaty of protectorate recently concluded between Korea and Japan was extorted at the point of the sword and under duress, and therefore is null and void. I never consented to it and never will. Transmit to the American Government.

(Signed) THE EMPEROR OF KOREA.

Mr. Hulbert says:

I hereby affirm under oath that the above cablegram was received by me on the date named—

That is on the 21st day of November, 1905—and that I delivered it into the hand of Robert Bacon, the then Assistant Secretary of State, and received from him the assurance that it would be put on file in the records of that department.

Signed by Mr. Hulbert and sworn to before a notary public.

I think I can describe what happened over there when this last treaty was agreed to that he describes there by reading the letter of Mr. Hulbert to me. That was the treaty of August 22, 1910, when the Japanese Government took over the entire Korean Government. I will not read all the letter, but I will read that part which has a direct bearing here. This is a letter directed to me and written by this same Mr. Hulbert, who was for 20 or 30 years the advisor of the Korean Emperor and who was the custodian of the message from the Emperor of Korea to our President, which I have just read. In part this letter reads as follows:

When the Japan-Russia war broke out, Japan made a treaty with Korea—

I have read extracts from it—

whereby Korea gave Japan some very tangible advantages and thereby put herself in such a position that, had Russia won the war, Russia could have annexed Korea without a word of protest from any other Government in the world. Japan on her part guaranteed the perpetual independence of Korea. After the cessation of hostilities, it became apparent that Japan did not intend to keep her agreement with Korea. The Emperor was naturally much disturbed and asked for advice from his friends. I suggested that he consult the treaty with America, in the first clause of which it is agreed that if either of the high contracting parties should be threatened by any third party, the other should use her good offices to find an amicable settlement of the difficulty. The Emperor examined the treaty, and then asked me to carry a letter from him to President Roosevelt. I then consented to do so, but before starting with it I consulted the American minister in Korea, Mr. E. V. Morgan, who made no objections at all, but rather encouraged the mission. The Japanese became aware of the matter, through what source I do not know, but greatly suspect, and knew that they must seize Korea before I should reach Washington, or else it might embarrass the administration in Washington. They worked upon the Emperor and his cabinet until I was within a single day's journey from Washington—

As a matter of fact, he was in Cincinnati when this thing he is about to describe happened—but without avail. The Korean Emperor and cabinet were adamant in their determination to prevent the alienation of Korean sovereignty. But during that last night, before I reached Washington, the Japanese filled the palace with their own troops and summoned the cabinet. Please note that there could be no legal meeting of the Korean cabinet except as called by the prime minister at the instance of the Emperor. A peremptory demand was then made by the Japanese that Korea consent to a protectorate by Japan. This demand was instantly and indignantly refused. Field Marshall Hasegawa and his aids then took Han Kyu-Sul, the Korean prime minister, into an adjoining room and closed the door. Hasegawa drew his sword and demanded that the prime minister consent. The latter again refused. The Japanese left him there under guard and went back to the Emperor and the rest of the cabinet. The latter supposed that Han Kyu-Sul had been disposed of, and that a like fate awaited them, and under such mortal pressure three of them signed the document.

In other words, they took the prime minister out, where they were in a meeting, put him in another room, and when they came back they all reached the conclusion—and it was a very reasonable one, under all the circumstances—that the prime minister had been murdered and that they were about to be murdered unless they signed the treaty, and three of them signed it.

And under such mortal pressure three of them signed the document. The great seal—

They had to have the great seal to make it legal—

The great seal of State was stolen from the foreign office and placed upon that document by the Japanese themselves. Full evidence of these facts can be secured from Han Kyu-Sul and other members of that cabinet still living. This was accomplished almost at the moment when I was entering Washington. I immediately sent to President Roosevelt, through the kind offices of Judge Wendell P. Stafford, of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, and asked that I be received. The Emperor had asked me to deliver the document into the hands of the President in person. The reply came back that the letter could not be so received, but that I might apply to the State Department if I saw fit. I immediately did so, but was refused admittance on the plea that they were "too busy." I was advised to come the next day. I did so, but was informed that they were still too busy, but that I should come the following day. I went, then, directly to the White House, and was told by Secretary Loeb's secretary that they were well aware of the contents of the letter from the Emperor, but that if anything were to be done it must be at the State Department and not at the White House. That very day, while still holding the message from the Emperor in abeyance, the administration accepted as true the Japanese statement that the new arrangement was very pleasing to the Korean people, and without a word to the Korean Emperor or the Korean Legation in Washington, it cabled our legation to remove from Korea. The following day I was admitted to the office of Secretary Root, and I placed the letter in his hands. I hold his acknowledgment of its receipt with the statement that the letter came too late to be seriously considered. The following day I received the cablegram from the Emperor declaring the forced treaty to be null and void, having been extorted by duress. This cablegram I handed to Assistant Secretary Bacon in the State Department, and received his assurance that it would be placed on file in the archives of the department.

Mr. GORE. May I inquire whose letter that is from which the Senator is reading?

Mr. NORRIS. This is Mr. Hulbert's letter, the personal advisor of the Emperor of Korea.

I might read some of the comments which are made further on in this letter:

Now, in view of these facts, which are susceptible of corroboration, I contend, that unless simple, brute force is the final argument of international law, the seizure of Korea at that time was an illegal act and without valid force; and if so, every subsequent act of spoliation on the part of Japan was consequently illegal and void because they were all based upon and derived from that act.

Mr. President, so far we have found an exact parallel between the conduct of Japan in China and in Korea, with the one sole exception that Japan has finished her work in Korea and is not quite through in China; and one of the steps to enable her to complete her mastery of China is the approval of this treaty with the provision in it which we have before us.

As I said a while ago, it is quite important to know what Japan has done with Korea while she has had her during practically these 20 years. What has Japan done in Korea? What kind of a government, after she robbed the people of the sovereignty of their nation, has she given them? I want in passing to read an extract from Japan's own report about crime in Korea. There is not a more peaceable people on the face of the earth than are the Koreans, who are absolutely unarmed, with a civilization older than the Christian era, older than that of Japan, but without any military spirit; a fine class of people. I will have occasion later on to comment somewhat upon the women of Korea and their ideals and to show that they correspond with what we in our age in America believe ought to be womanly attributes, but that those ideals are absolutely contrary to every Japanese conception of modesty or of virtue.

In the Japanese report for 1912–13 on Korea, on page 47, speaking of crimes, it is stated:

The total number of criminal cases decided during the year 1912 by police summary judgment reached 21,483—

If I wanted to take up an hour or two, I should show you what "police summary judgment" means, and, incidentally, as I go along and from the evidence that I shall read and produce, Senators will learn what "police summary judgment" means. It means that men and women who are arrested for acting contrary to Japanese requirements, without charges being made against them, are disposed of by the men who arrest them—the soldiers or the police, as the case may be.

The total number of criminal cases decided during the year 1912 by police summary judgment reached 21,483, being an increase of 2,580 over that of the previous year. Of the persons implicated in these cases 433 were sentenced to short terms of imprisonment with hard labor, 34 to imprisonment only, 5,736 to a minor fine, 1,807 to police detention, 9,705 to a police fine, 18,438 to flogging, and 800 were acquitted, making a total of 36,953 persons.

The total number of criminal cases decided during the year 1916 by police summary judgment reached 56,013, involving 82,121 offenders, being an increase of 14,777 cases and 21,750 offenders over those of the preceding year. Of the persons implicated in these cases 81,139 were sentenced—

Now, listen to this, and remember that it is an official statement—

30 proved their innocence, and the remaining 952 were pardoned.

They arrested altogether 81,139, and out of that number there were 30 who proved their innocence and were let go. What does an American think of that kind of a record? How would you like it if a foreign Government took possession of our Government, simply because they had the power to do so at the point of the sword; ousted every American official from office and put their men in, and then arrested 81,000 of us and said, "Unless you prove your innocence you are going to be punished"? That is the kind of jurisprudence under which Japan operates in Korea. The police rendered "summary judgment" on 56,013 in that year.

Mr. GORE. Were the police natives or Japanese?

Mr. NORRIS. The police are Japanese. I say "the police," but it is very often—probably oftener than otherwise—the soldiers who make the arrest. I will say that there are occasionally some Koreans who are put into office; but if there are, they are in positions where they are under the Japanese, and unless they obey—and there are some of those, of course, who follow and do whatever their masters tell them—they do not hold office very long. There is no one in position over there who is not either a Japanese or some one that the Japanese absolutely control.

I only offer these observations in passing to show that while we are asked to turn over the Chinese to the Japanese Government, according to the evidence produced by me on Saturday and Friday it is proven they are doing the same thing in China which they have been doing all the time in Korea.

For 20 years Japan has had possession of Korea, and everybody supposed that Korea was completely subjugated. The Koreans were absolutely under the heel of the conqueror; their schoolhouses had been burned; their language had been almost abolished; their houses had been searched for books and papers printed in the Korean language, which, when found, were destroyed. Everybody supposed that Korea was dead; Japan thought so; she considered that she had conquered the spirit of the people; but in March, all at once, all over Korea, as by a flash, the people—men, women, and children—rose up, and, though unarmed, with not a gun in the whole country, not a revolver, a pistol, a sword, or a club, they all came out on the streets on that day shouting "Mansei," which means "hurrah for Korea." Thirty of them got together and declared the independence of Korea. They are now either dead or in jail.

The Japanese then brought out their soldiers. However, I described that somewhat when I spoke on Shantung here last July, and I am not going to repeat it now. I only mention it to show that you can not by any man-made edict or law or treaty, regardless of the amount of power that you may have behind it, kill the spirit of liberty and freedom. It lives under a law not made by man; and this treaty can no more kill it, can no more drown it out in China, than Japan, by her militaristic course that would have made the Kaiser blush, succeeded in doing in Korea. Unarmed though she was, and almost without the knowledge of anybody, as if by magic, she rose up and said, "I want to be free."

The spirit of Korea still lives. There is now an organized Korean Republic, mostly in the United States, mostly on paper, I admit, growing out of that movement. I have here a letter signed by a man who represents that Republic from which I desire to read a few extracts. He describes what happened when the Japanese took over Korea, as follows:

The Japanese seized all of our telephone and telegraph lines, took control of our postal service, suppressed and confiscated all of our newspapers, and established a strict censorship, not permitting any news of our real condition to be openly published in the world.

Now, there is a charge. Somebody may say that is written by an interested party; but, Mr. President, from the beginning of the publication of the treaty I have investigated this question, and if there ever has been in my life a statement as to the truth of which I am satisfied, I am satisfied that the paragraph from the letter which I have read is no exaggeration whatever of the truth. I have talked with ministers, missionaries, and others who have spent their lives over there; I have had letters and telegrams from them and from organizations as to the truth of which there can be no question, substantiating everything that is said in this communication. Now let me read a little further:

They then seized all of our public lands, turning them over to Japanese colonists exclusively, and used every conceivable method of coercion to compel our Korean people to give up their lands to Japanese. As a means to that end, they had the Japanese-controlled Bank of Chosen call in all money and specie throughout the country, thus practically depriving Korea of a circulating medium, and proceeded to levy excessive taxes, which they stipulated must be paid in money.

Remember that. I have had men who were there personally, representative Americans, tell me the same story. I had a man in my office who told me that he personally furnished money and bought some of the Korean homes, paid for them, and had the deeds put in his own name, being an American citizen, in order to keep them from falling into the hands of the Japanese.

The stories told me corroborate the statement made here that the Japanese, through the bank which they absolutely controlled, called in all of the metal money and then issued a decree that taxes must be paid only in metal money. Here is a Korean with his family living in a home which he owns, which his father owned, which has come down through the ages; no one questions his title; but taxes must be paid; he can only pay them in metal money, and there is only one place on earth to get the metal money, and that is from the Japanese, and there is only one way to get it. The Japanese will give him the money, but they fix a price on his home, on his land, and they fix the price invariably at much less than the property is worth. Then they get it, and the Korean has to go away. They have gone by the thousands into Manchuria and other places. Therefore I know the writer of this letter is telling the truth when he describes the situation as he does:

Having no money, Koreans were compelled to make arrangements with the Bank of Chosen, and the only arrangement they could make was to give up lands to Japanese. In the course of this oppression the Japanese have seized and destroyed Korean historic records and literature that had been accumulating and recorded for over 4,000 years in both public and private archives and attempted to burn every vestige of the public records and documents of the Korean Government.

Laws have been enacted and enforced by the Japanese prohibiting the teaching of the Korean language and of history and geography in the schools, and, as a stroke against Christianity, have prohibited the holding of any religious services in the schools, compelling the Koreans instead to worship Mikado tablets. Koreans are now prohibited from being educated abroad, which is a direct violation of article 11 of the provisions of our treaty with your government permitting and inviting our citizens to become educated in your colleges and universities, which reads—

Then he quotes another provision from the treaty which I have read, and I think I had better read the extract:

Students of either nationality who may proceed to the country of the other in order to study the language, literature, laws, or arts shall be given all possible protection and assistance, in evidence of cordial good will.

I will have something to say further on about some of the Koreans who have come here to secure an education. There are thousands of them in the United States; there are a great many in Great Britain; there were many in France; and there were many in Russia.

Korea was susceptible to the work of the Christian missionaries. She was on the eve of a great upheaval for Christianity and civilization when the Japanese Government took possession. Her Emperor, who was compelled to sign this, was not of very much force. I concede that. They would in time, of course, have gotten rid of him. They would have been better off without him, or at least they would have been much better off if they had had somebody with more stamina than he had, although it must be said for him that he refused to comply with the last request to sign the death warrant of the Korean people and only consented to it under force.

Mr. President, I think this might be as good a place as any to comment a little on the question that is raised there about the students who were in this country.

I have here copies of cablegrams and letters showing what happened to 50 Koreans. They were in England. This was all since the armistice. They were students. I do not know whether or not Senators are familiar with the way these students work to get an education. I happen to have some personal knowledge of it. I know that in my own congressional district there is a college where there are always a lot of Korean students. I have been there, I have talked with the president of the institution, and without a single exception during the time that there were probably 50 or 100 of them over here there was not one that went wrong. They were always anxious to get an education in English, Christians every one of them, and all were preparing themselves to go back to their own people to teach civilization and Christianity.

When Japan took over Korea it found these students scattered all over the world, and they have never been able to go back, except on one condition. We have them right in the United States now. They can not go back to their native country, because in order to get a passport our State Department requires that it shall be visèed by the Japanese ambassador in Washington, of which technically Korea is a part, and the Japanese never will visé a passport to a Korean to go back to his native home unless he takes the oath of allegiance to the Japanese Government.

Here were 50 Koreans over in Europe. This cablegram says:

Fifty Koreans from Russia, one from America, are here. Communicate with State Department for transportation to America. Cable what can be done.

So the cables went back and forth. The long and short of it all was that they were not allowed to come to America from England. France finally admitted them, I am told, although it does not show from this; but the man who gave me the information said they had succeeded in getting out of England and getting into France.

Here is one of the cablegrams, which says:

Authorities here—

That is from our own liberty-loving land—

Authorities here won't issue passport or permit landing without Japanese visé. Cable immediately when students arrived, under whose surveillance and orders, and under what authority are they interned? What did they do in Russia? Where were they? When did they leave Korea? Will British authorities permit departure for Canada, France, or Shanghai?

I had taken up with me a few days ago the case of five Korean girls over in the Hawaiian Islands. They were born there, and they have lived there all their lives. You know, in the case of these Koreans who were over here or any other place when Japan took over their country, very few of them have ever gone back. They would like to go back to their homes, but they will never go back on the conditions that are required of them—an oath of allegiance to the Japanese Government. They refuse to give allegiance to the Japanese Government. They still claim their own liberty and their own freedom and their own country; and for that hundreds, thousands, many thousands, have suffered death. These five Korean girls were not even allowed to come to the United States until I took up the matter. I finally succeeded in getting the State Department to grant permission—and the State Department seemed willing, too, I will say for them, to do it. They have told me that they have wired the immigration authorities to let them come in. All of them are going to different schools to study.

These Koreans, scattered over the world, have formed organizations in various places, all of them clamoring for the independence of Korea, just like you would do if, while you were in England, Mexico had come up here and conquered our country and would not let you come back unless you took the oath of allegiance to Mexico. You would starve before you would do it. You would not do it, but you would never stop fighting, you would never stop agitating, you would never stop working for the independence of your native land, your own country. That is what I said a while ago. In my judgment, article 10 and article 11 of the league of nations, if adopted as they now stand, will put a stop to that kind of work.

But, Mr. President, you will learn as I proceed that the Japanese have a particular dislike to Americans, and a particular dislike to American Christian missionaries. The Christian religion is one of the things they object to, because with the Christian religion always goes education. The missionaries not only teach Christianity, but they teach the English language. They give education to everybody that will come to get it, as far as their capacity and room will permit.

I am going to read you now a letter from an American missionary in Korea. Of course, I can not give his name; I will not give, in a good many instances, the places that he writes about, because you must understand that if his identity were established over there his life would pay the penalty, and another martyr for Christianity would pass into eternity. I do not know the man personally, but the letter and the man are vouched for to me by the Presbyterian Missionary Society of San Francisco, Calif. This letter is to his mother, and I am going to read it. Although it is long, I am going to read it in full:

That is written comparatively recently, quite a while after the armistice was signed.

DEAR MOTHER: My heart is heavy to-night, for I have just come from the hospital, where I sat by the bedside of a beautiful lad while the light of life went out in suffering, heart breaking to see. He is another of the victims of the butchery going on here—the second one to die in our hospital within three days among a group of 11 young men brought here from the prison in ———. Several of them I knew last fall when I was there teaching.

They were arrested at the time of the demonstration for shouting "Mansei" and distributing announcements regarding the demonstration for independence. They were kept in prison in ——— for some weeks, and finally brought to "trial," or what the Japanese military government calls a trial, and sentenced upon the above charge to 90 stripes.

You will notice that in the Japanese report which I read of the number of floggings that took place that looked simple; but, Mr. President, when you find out what one of those floggings means, it is another matter. Let me go back and quote that again, so that we will have that in mind. This is the Japanese report, now:

In the year 1912–13 there were 18,438 floggings.

In the other year they do not give the number of floggings; but now this young man is going to describe what a flogging is:

They were * * * sentenced upon the above charge to 90 stripes. They demanded an appeal, but were roughly refused and forced to accept the sentence.

Now, to an American that is something we ought to consider. We feel particularly proud of the fact that under our laws a man, before he can be sent to prison, before he can be punished criminally, has a right to go through the courts, have his case reviewed, and, if error is found, he is entitled to a new trial or to a dismissal, it may be. That does not go over there.

They demanded an appeal, but were roughly refused and forced to accept the sentence.

On May 16 the first 30 of the 90 blows were inflicted, three Japanese taking turns inflicting 10 blows each with all their might on naked forms prostrate and securely tied at neck, wrists, waist, and ankles upon a wooden frame in the shape of a Roman cross. These blows were given in such a way as to violate the law which prohibits the drawing of the bludgeon farther back than in front of and parallel with the shoulders of the striker.

It seems they have a law governing flogging which says that you can draw the bludgeon back only so far, but he tells you how they get away from that:

The boys showed me how the blows were given—the bludgeon drawn back as far as possible and the leg raised so as to give the maximum force to the blow.

May 17, 30 more blows were laid on the raw and bleeding wounds made the day before, and May 18, the next day, the remaining 30 were inflicted in like manner. They had no medical attention and no medicine of any sort for their wounds while in prison, according to testimony given by one and corroborated by the others as they lay in their beds in the ward to-day.

On May 18 they came out and went to an inn, waiting for their wounds to heal so they could travel. By May 22 six of them had developed gangrene, while five were recovering. Three who could walk by this time brought the six who were in serious condition to our hospital on that day, and two more came later, a distance of two hours by rail.

Among them was the lad who had acted as my secretary while I was at ———. Of course, I knew him very well, having worked with him every afternoon for a month, dictating outlines, which he wrote out and duplicated on the mimeograph for my classes. When I heard that a group of prisoners had come in, I did not at first learn that they were boys I knew. Next day, just as I was setting out to teach my English class, Dr. ——— called to me across from his porch that one of the boys was my secretary, and that he could not live. The boy had told them that he knew me, and asked for me. Of course I started at once to see him, but on the way I met Miss ———, who had just come from the hospital, and she told me that my boy was dead. I saw his still form when I reached the hospital—the same finely chiseled features, but sharply drawn and thin, with marks of pain deep lined into his forehead.

He had died from his wounds in intense agony, beaten to death like a dog for shouting for his country and taking part in a peaceful demonstration; absolutely nothing else was even falsely brought against him.

Then I went to see the others. One, who could walk, met me in the hall and greeted me joyfully. He looked pale, weak, and shaken—no wonder, after those 90 blows, even though he did escape the gangrenous poison which was threatening the lives of some of his mates. I went with him into the ward; four boys lay there writhing in agony, while a fifth, thought to be least likely to survive, lay in another room by himself.

One lad, with big dark eyes and a handsome head and face, seemed especially glad to see me, and he was the one whose face I seemed to remember most clearly.

Yesterday I visited them again. This one who especially attracted me was suffering intensely, and the doctor told me he was not likely to live. He had been taken to a private room so that he might not die in the presence of the others. He had been so glad to see me the day before, and he knew me, but was too ill to give me his attention long. After foreign service—about 6 p. m.—I went again. The doctor said he could not last much after sundown. He knew me, and I knelt by his bedside to pray. I could only ask that God would make His presence very real in that hour, relieve his physical pain, and give his heart peace. He knew he must die, and said his faith held. His pain was so great—peritonitis had developed to add to the already unbearable pain of the wounds—that he wanted to die quickly if he must go, and yet his young life was sweet, and he clung to it. He told Dr. ——— in the afternoon that his one regret was that he could not live to see his country free, but that he was glad to give his life for her. During the afternoon he tried to bite off the end of his little finger—the sign of those who have pledged their lives to the freeing of their country, they signing the pledge with the blood that flows from the wound.

As I was praying he reached out and grasped my hand with a surprising firmness, and as I rose he begged me to lift him up; his pain was so great that he constantly sought relief by change of position. I went back to the compound for supper, returning with Miss ———, the nurse, about 7.30. Just as we turned into the hospital gate his brother, just arrived by bicycle and train all the way from ———, rushed past us saying as he ran, "Is he dead?" Assured that he still lived, he flew to the room where the sick boy lay. The meeting was a cry, the dying boy arousing himself and turning to his brother with upraised arms. Hearing his brother's sobs, he said, "Don't cry; I will not die now but live. Let us have a talk to-night." It seemed almost that his words might be true, but the doctor knew there was no chance, so they sent the crowd that had gathered out of the room, leaving him in charge of Miss ——— while the brother received his last messages.

I went to see the others in the adjoining room. After a little the brother went out for a few minutes, and Miss ——— and I watched by the dying boy. His life ebbed fast. He reached out to grasp our hands and begged to be turned. The brother came back and took his place by the bedside with a fan. The chosa, church leader, from his own church, one of the 11, himself suffering severely from his unhealed wounds, came in with him and stood at the foot of the cot, and one of my young women students who came down from ——— with me at Christmas time—a relative of the patient—came in with the matron. As he dropped the fan in his grief, the dying boy called for it—his last articulate words. I took it up and fanned him until the breath was gone, holding the wrist, which was now pulseless and growing cold. The chosa prayed, and as he did so the boy's eyes were suddenly alight with clear understanding, and he tried so hard to say something, looking straight into my eyes as I bent over him to catch any word he might speak.

He could not utter a word, but at last he got strength to lift his hand to his mouth. He bit at his little finger, looking at me with the message so plainly written in the brilliant dark eyes which a moment later closed in death. He wanted to pledge his life in blood to the country he loved so well. Poor boy; he had already given his blood; the bed was soaked with it from the seeping wounds on his back and hips where the cruel blows of the bamboo bludgeon had beaten the flesh to a mangled pulp.

As the chesa finished his prayer, the eyes glassed again. He called loudly the boy's name and asked, "Have you faith?" The head nodded in affirmative reply. Then the brother called, "Do you know God?" Again he nodded; the last sign he gave on earth.

Those two are gone; one more may go to-morrow. I have seen them in their terrible agony—worse than any death sentence ever inflicted in a civilized country—and yet Japan dares declare her laws are the same as those of civilized countries, and we are subject to them by the consent of our own United States.

Again I think of those scores (nearly a hundred and fifty, besides those killed outright at last report from this town) who have died from their wounds with no medical care; hiding miserably from the terror that still threatened them in our neighboring town of ———, where occurred the massacre of the unarmed crowd which broke into shouts on a market day. And I remember the hundreds more through the country—thousands it is more likely—for nearly every person I meet can tell of relatives and friends who have been beaten for no declared cause, as well as those beaten in prison after "trial." I am beginning to realize what all this means, yet it is too horrible to realize.

I shall send photos of those boys to prove what I am telling you, and a statement I shall draw up giving the testimony as they gave it to me in detail.

Can you believe that such horror continues under the flag of an "ally" who pretends to be shocked by the atrocities committed by Germany? Mother, every word is more than true. I have now seen enough to know that I really know very little of all the awful suffering that is going on. Nobody on this earth will ever know the whole story, but the God who heard the blood of Abel crying from the ground will avenge the blood unjustly spilled even in this dark day. I can't stand any more, so good-by.

Lovingly, ——— ———.

Later on the boy wrote a postscript and added it to the letter, in which he said:

Later: The two boys were buried on Monday. Under the bright noon sun the sad company gathered, following the carriers, Christian men of ———, out to the elevation just beyond our compound, where the procession halted while a funeral service was held. A pastor of our church, himself having spent 20 days in prison, conducted the service. The chesa from the boy's home town persistently kept up, in spite of his own wounds, and gave the life histories of the lads he knew so well as their spiritual leader. And the pastor who recently came here preached the sermon. He resigned on account of ill health and has been suffering from hemorrhages of the lungs. His eyes filled with tears and his voice broke as he expressed his grief at seeing those young lives go out before his own. One of the ——— deacons prayed, and his voice vibrated with grief and faltered as he cried, "Oh, Lord, why hast Thou forsaken us? Look with pity upon Thy people and save us from the hands of our enemies."

A quiet, deep sob swept over the crowd, not the cry of "Aego, aego," so characteristic of Korean heathen funerals, but a sob too deep for loud expression. The group of foreigners gathered there could not refrain from weeping with them as they took up the strains of our sweet hymn of Christian hope "In the sweet by and by."

Again the procession moved out over the beautiful valley, growing green in the spring sunshine, and climbed the steep hillside which commands one of the wonderful views of fertile valleys and blue mountains which the Koreans love so well.

There, facing the eastern hills, they laid them side by side. A woman, daring the consequences, though she must have known spies would be present, drew forth a little Korean paper flag and placed it upon the coffin of the boy whose dying message had been a pledge to his country and an acknowledgment of his God. Remonstrated with for her daring, she said, "They have done their worst to him. No blows can harm him now, and I know he would want it."

Mr. President, it seems to me that a Christian people can not read evidence like that, Christian preachers, of whom the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] was speaking the other day, and then in the next breath ask the Senate of the United States to approve a treaty that will compel us for all time and all eternity, if the league could last that long, to stand by and utter no word of protest to the nation that is carrying on that kind of practice against a helpless people. It does not seem to me, Mr. President, that we can afford to turn over to that Government, to that heathen Government, the Christians who are Americans, to say nothing of the Chinese, who have given up their pagan religion, and in answer to our call, to the sermons of our missionaries and our preachers, have confessed to the religion of Jesus Christ, and who will be left to the mercy and the peril of the same men who are persecuting and killing, as this boy tells his mother.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GRONNA. I asked the Senator certain questions on Saturday for the reason that I knew a widespread propaganda was going on, asking the good people, the women especially, of the churches of the United States, to send to their Senators telegrams asking them to vote for the proposed treaty in its original form. Of course, those people do not know that certain provisions of the treaty would simply leave things in statu quo, and that we would be absolutely prohibited, if we adopted this treaty, from seeking a change of conditions in Korea or in other lands, as the Senator has pointed out. I am receiving daily, I will state to the Senator from Nebraska, petitions and telegrams from ministers of the gospel who either have renounced their Christian religion or else they are ignorant of the facts as they exist in Korea and elsewhere.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I believe that is true. I think the latter is true—that they are ignorant of the facts as they exist.

Mr. President, Korea technically is a part of the Japanese Empire to-day, and so recognized by our Government, the same as Ireland is a part of Great Britain. If we approve the treaty, under article 10, we guarantee to preserve and protect Japan in her possession of Korea. As I said a while ago, if we turn over Shantung, if Shantung should rebel, if Korea should rebel, and go to arms, and Shantung and Korea together fight Japan, and then the balance of China come to the relief of those contending parties, we, under the treaty, would be bound to go to the relief of Japan. If those things never do happen, under article 10, in respect to our Allies, we must stop permitting Koreans to organize in our country as they are organizing now. The next thing we will have to do, if we live up to our agreement and the treaty, is ourselves to punish Koreans in America who are crying out loud for the freedom of their native land.

Mr. President, when I spoke before on the question of Shantung—I think it was last July—I gave some evidence and testimony from religious organizations in regard to Korea and the treatment of Koreans. I am not going to repeat any of that; but after that occurred there was an organization of churches called the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, which made an investigation. They are composed of churches of various religious denominations. They had reports from all over Korea, from their own missionaries. I am going to read portions of those reports that are vouched for by this organization. I will say that I have talked personally with some of the witnesses, but this Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, with headquarters in the city of New York, gives sufficient stability to the investigation to at least call for fair consideration of what they shall say, and I want to read just a little of their introductory where they explain what their work is:

About the middle of April the first person who came direct from Korea, bringing personal knowledge of the situation, and arriving in New York, was Rev. A. E. Armstrong, secretary of the board of foreign missions of the Presbyterian Church of Canada.

Then he went back to Korea.

He had spent 10 months in the Far East, visiting the stations of his board in China, Manchuria, Korea, and Japan, and was on the point of sailing from Yokohama for America when he received a wire urging an immediate revisit to Korea. He reached Seoul March 16; was there for three days, in consultation with various parties, getting full and accurate information.

On reaching New York he at once consulted Dr. Arthur J. Brown, secretary of the board of foreign missions of the Presbyterian Church of the United States; Dr. Frank Mason North, secretary of the board of foreign missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church of the United States; and Dr. William I. Haven, secretary of the American Bible Society. The subject matter to be dealt with was of such a nature that they thought it could best be handled by the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America rather than by the mission boards.

* * * * * * * *

The documents printed in the following pages the commission believes to be thoroughly reliable. More than 30 American and British individuals in Korea have shared in their preparation. Some of the documents are carefully prepared reports by committees; some are personal letters; some are signed affidavits of eyewitnesses. If all the material in hand were published, a volume of about 1,000 pages would result.

I will read extracts as I go along through this report made by this Federal Council of Churches. Here is another statement:

Many of the atrocities perpetrated in Belgium have been duplicated in Korea. According to one newspaper 6,000 Koreans are now in jails and prisons, and this is probably below the actual number.

In another place they say this:

Their police system is German to the core; and in their colonial government they have taken the Prussian rather than the British method as their model. The sword is the emblem of authority. Not only is it carried by the military, gendarmerie, and police, but by the civilian members of the civil service. Every male school-teacher wears a sword; in fact, almost everyone who holds a Government office carries a sword as the symbol of his authority. To bolster up the militaristic system a vast system of espionage exists. Consequently there is no freedom of assembly, no free speech, no freedom of the press. And there is no right of petition of grievances with immunity from arrest. Needless to say, there is no participation in self-government. In the law courts it is alleged that a Korean has no chance in a suit with a Japanese. Habeas corpus is unknown. The State has a right to keep a prisoner for two weeks or more before producing him in open court, and if it desires by means of securing extensions of 10 days ad lib. need not produce a prisoner in practice until it desires to do so. The prisoner is not allowed to consult a lawyer or to see his friends. Torture is freely applied, and a man is considered guilty until proved innocent.

That corresponds with the reports of the Japanese who, in something over 80,000 prisoners in one year, said there were only 30 that succeeded in proving their innocence.

Neither is the Korean permitted to enjoy many offices of emolument under the Government. There are some Korean police and gendarmes, but there are very few Koreans in other departments of the civil service. Korea is a paradise for the Japanese job hunter. Efforts have been made by Government officials to deprave the youth of Korea. Commercialized prostitution is flourishing and is extending from the capital to the country parts. A manifesto describing the grievances of the people has been issued by the independence committee. Another grievance which strikes deeply to the heart of the Korean is the determination of the Japanese to drive out the use of the Korean language from the schools. The proclamation which provides that Japanese is to be the sole language of instruction comes into force in 1920. The lesson of Poland and other countries seems to be lost upon the Japanese. Then there seems to be an organized attempt to deprive the Koreans in the southern part of Korea—which is the warmer portion—of their land and to force them to emigrate to Manchuria. Pressure is put upon the Korean landholder or tenant to sell, usually at a disadvantageous price, and he and his family go north to make a new home. Japanese settlers replace the Korean. This policy is fostered by a semi-official company called the Oriental Development Co., which receives valuable concessions from the Government.

March 3 was set for the date of the ex-Emperor's funeral—

That is, the Emperor of Korea, who was held as prisoner ever since the country was taken over by Japan, died this year, and March 3 was set as the date of his funeral—and it had been arranged that the ceremonies inside the city should be Japanese and outside the city Korean. Needless to say, the arrangements for the Japanese part of the ceremony were not made with the hearty concurrence of the Koreans.

The atmosphere was becoming tense. Evidently the authorities had an inkling that something was brewing, for the principals of schools were called before the prefect at the city hall and told to warn their students not to be led away by the actions of the Korean students in Japan. It should be stated here that during February the Korean students who were attending the various colleges in Japan had started a movement for the self-determination of Korea, and many had been imprisoned.

On Saturday, March 1, notices were posted on the streets of Seoul that public gatherings would be held at Pagoda Park, and printed proclamations of independence signed by 33 men were distributed. Shortly after noon a large number of the signers of this manifesto met at a Korean hotel and telephoned to the authorities that they had declared the independence of the country, announcing where they were. The authorities thereupon sent and arrested them. The police published in the newspapers that they had surrounded the ringleaders in an eating house as they were drinking success to their plot.

Meanwhile the people, including many students, had gathered at the park, and from there started to parade some of the principal streets. They walked along in an orderly way, with hands held aloft, calling their national cry of "Mansei," which means "ten thousand years." In front of public buildings, such as police headquarters and the various consulates, they would stop and take off their hats and wave them, uttering their cry of "Mansei." At the consulates they sent in letters and their proclamation manifesto. No single act of violence was done. At one point mounted gendarmes charged the crowd and inflicted some saber cuts. The police were arresting as many as they could, and all that evening and on the following day, Sunday, men were being arrested at their homes on suspicion of having been connected with the demonstration. Of the 33 signers—

Of the 33 signers of the declaration of independence, just note who they were:

Fifteen were members of the native cult, the Chuntokyo; 15 were Christians, and 3 were Buddhists. Of the Christians the majority were ministers of the various city churches, many of them college-trained men; one was a Y. M. C. A. secretary, another was connected with the Severance Hospital. Since that day arrests have been made daily, until at present there is scarcely a city church which has not its minister locked up.

Mr. President, I have already described at some length the first time I addressed the Senate on this question what happened during those days, and I am not going to repeat it now. I got a great deal of my information from eyewitnesses who were there in the streets and saw what occurred. Those witnesses can be produced. They will be glad to testify before a committee of the Senate, if they will request them to, to just what occurred when that declaration of independence was made. Men, women, and children were murdered, killed in cold blood. There was not one of them that was armed; there was not one of them, as this article says, that committed a single act of violence. They were just filled with the enthusiasm and the hope of the heart that they might do something to establish the independence of their native land.

In many cases—

This report says—

the police have questioned demonstrators and have arrested only those who admitted being Christians.

That is a thing that happened often. Particularly were they after the Christians.

An attempt was made to get 24 wealthy Koreans to sign a statement which said that the 33 signers were low-class people. They refused to do so, and pressure was brought to bear on them for several days before the attempt was given up. It should be said here, to make this point clear, that wealthy men are compelled to submit to periodical police audits of their private finances. There is no halfway government in Korea.

* * * * * * *

It is not possible at this time to record in detail all of the uprisings in various places. These are fair samples of what occurred throughout the country. The truth will eventually come out as to what has happened in places where no foreigners were present to record what has transpired.

* * * * * * *

Beating and torture are the cardinal principles of police methods in Korea. When making arrest, usually the victim is cuffed and kicked by several policemen.

These are general statements made by the Confederated Council of Churches in Christ in the United States; made, as they say, after full investigation; and they say in anything they publish no statement is included which they will not be able to prove. If there is any doubt about anything, they do not publish it.

From released prisoners stories of cruelty and torture are now pouring out. One student was asked to tell who the leaders were, and his finger nails were pushed back from the skin to assist his memory. Still another prisoner had his finger tips burned for the same purpose. Still another was put in an upright press, which operated with a screw from the back. When the screw is turned the four sides contract, and while the pressure becomes stronger the questioning is carried on—a way of squeezing out information. After being subjected to this torture the same man had a strong cord tied around the middle finger of his right hand; the cord was then passed through a hook in the ceiling, and his body was pulled up until he was resting on the tips of his toes. He became insensible during the process, and when he awoke found himself lying down while a salve was being applied to his wounds. He left the jail with a swollen hand, which had to be lanced immediately.

Mr. President, there was no charge of crime against any of these people. They were arrested simply because they were in a parade or because it was thought by the Japanese authorities that they had done something to instigate the Koreans to cry, "Hurrah for Korea!"

The girls fared even worse. For the first few days after being arrested they were confined in the several police stations. As far as can be ascertained, no matrons were on duty in those jails. Of course, the girls were not allowed to communicate with relatives or friends. The main facts in the story of one released girl are as follows: A few hours after being arrested she was brought before an officer, questioned and beaten by him on the face, shoulders, and legs. The following day the same process was repeated before a second officer. The third day she was taken before a third officer, who called her by vile names, and insinuated that she and the other girl prisoners were pregnant. "You can cut us open and see," she retorted. He then said that the Bible taught that sinless people were naked (some coarse references to Adam and Eve being intended) and ordered her to disrobe. She cried, and he did not press his demand. She was again beaten, and the fourth day, before still another officer, she was questioned and beaten again. One of her ordeals was to kneel down on the floor and hold a heavy board at arms' length for an hour. If her arm trembled she was beaten again. The girls were always accompanied to the toilet under guard. On the fifth day she was removed to the West Gate prison. She and two other girls were summoned to an officer's desk. She was told to wait outside while her two companions went in. A little later she saw them pass out stark naked, with hair down their backs, holding their clothes in a bundle before them. She was then called in and found two Japanese matrons present with the officer. After being questioned by the officer, she was ordered by the matrons to take off her clothes. After resisting for a time, and being threatened, she did so. Her hair had first been taken down by the matrons. There was no apparent purpose in this request except to humiliate her. After standing several minutes disrobed, she was told to follow one of the matrons. She wrapped her skirt around her, and carrying the rest of her clothes, walked through the hall to a cell, where she found two other girls. On the way thither she passed several male employees of the prison. The following day she was taken out by a matron and taken to a room where a very youthful Japanese doctor was waiting. Again she was ordered to disrobe for a physical examination.

After a long altercation she was allowed to retain one garment. The doctor tapped her chest, asked no questions whatever about her health, and she was in due course taken back to her cell. Several days later a gold-braided official came into her cell, asked her to remove her waist, examined her back and chest, and left the cell.

Mr. President, it ought to be said here that the Korean women are modest and are as careful of their virtue and of their persons as are American women. That is not true, however, of the Japanese. I mention this only as a fact. Any nation may have any standard it desires, so far as I am concerned. To a Japanese woman the treatment accorded to these Korean women would not be much of a humiliation. The Japanese officers know that. Their desire is to punish and to hurt and to injure the Koreans, and they know that nothing will injure a Korean woman more than to ask her to disrobe and to stand without clothing in the presence of civilians and soldiers, and to walk the streets in such a condition. So it is done because the Japanese know that it is the severest punishment that they can inflict on the Koreans.

If you will follow the cases—and there are thousands and thousands of them—you will find that almost invariably, even before they are tried, the clothes are taken off the Korean women as a part of the punishment. It is done where they are held, as is stated by this girl, awaiting a trial that may never come; there never will be a charge, probably, against them; but the Japanese want to humiliate them; they want to inaugurate, as the Kaiser did, "a reign of frightfullness," and this being the way they can best accomplish that design it is the method they follow.

Mr. President, I could fill the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD with evidence such as I have read, but I am only going to touch a few of the "high spots" as I go along. I am really not selecting anything because it is worse than something else. I confess when I read it all over I can not tell which is the worst; it is all worst; there is not an incident with one redeeming feature in it. I read a little further from another page of this testimony:

It is quite evident that the most rigorous repression of demonstrations is directed against Christians in those sections of the country where the church is prominent. In the north a number (15 according to credible reports) of churches have had windows, furniture, bells, and Bibles destroyed by soldiers, gendarmes, or authorized thugs, and in many communities where general arrests are made discrimination is always against the Christians.

* * * * * * *

We have not the remotest thought of meddling in politics and we can not hold any brief in defense of Christians who have deliberately committed themselves to a program of revolutionary agitation, but it is maddening to have to stand by and see unarmed and unresisting people treated with brutality and violence and even shot down indiscriminately and to know that these things are daily occurring in all parts of the country.

* * * * * * *

The stirring up of the minds of the Koreans is the sin of the American missionaries. This uprising is their work. In investigating the causes of the uprising two or three missionaries have been arrested and have been examined. There are a good many shallow-minded people among the missionaries and they make the minds of the Koreans bad and they plant the seeds of democracy. So the great part of the 300,000 Korean Christians do not like the union of Japan and Korea, but they are waiting for an opportunity for freedom.

Mr. President, what I have just read is a translation from a Japanese paper that is circulated in Korea for the purpose of injuring Christianity, for the purpose of hurting Christians, for the purpose of working up the minds of the Koreans against the missionaries. There is some more of it:

The missionaries have tried to apply the free customs of other nations to these Korean people, who are not wholly civilized. From the part that even girl students in Christian schools have taken it is evident that this uprising has come from the missionaries.

This is another quotation from the Japanese publication:

These messengers of God are only after money and are sitting around their homes with a full stomach. The bad things of the world all start from such trash as these. They planned this dirty work and got into league with the Chuntokyo. If we take all this into consideration, these missionaries are all hated brutes.

Here is a further description of treatment accorded Koreans who were taken prisoners:

Among those so treated was a young man named Chai Kyusae, a student and a younger brother of one of the Korean policemen. He was crying, as if in great pain; his head hung to one side from a terrible wound in the left side of his head; blood was streaming down his face. This man was sent home after a few days in a critical condition.

Another man was being dragged along toward the police station by two Japanese firemen. Across his head was the mark of a violent blow, and his face was knocked out of shape from a blow on the left side, from which blood was flowing. His left leg also hung limp, and he, too, groaned in pain. This man is a Christian, about 50 years of age. After treatment in the hospital for several days he was set free by the police with no charge against him. His name is Chai Haksung.

Another of those dragged to the police station was Fak Yichin, a student from one of the non-Christian schools. His skull was so badly crushed that after a few days he was sent out in apparently a dying condition to the home of his friends.

On this same day at least seven Korean men and a number of girls were taken to the police station in a pitiful condition from the wounds received.

While these scenes were being enacted, the police and gendarmes seemed to take no part in the arrests, but simply kept guard over the Japanese fire brigade as they clubbed and arrested the Koreans.

So far as was seen, there was no resistance made by the Koreans; they neither lifted a stick nor hurled a stone to defend themselves, nor did they utter a word of abuse against the Japanese.

These missionaries are speaking of instances where these people were brought to their hospitals. By the way, there is another institution which always follows Christianity and missionaries—hospitals where men and women are cured or given relief regardless of their ability to pay, their nationality, or religion.

During the first days of the demonstration in March a crowd of two or three hundred people visited the gendarme station at Suna Ub, Whanghai Province, and told the gendarmes that the country had declared its independence and that they should leave. The gendarmes replied that of course if the country had secured its independence they would leave, but that they would need to receive orders from Seoul before they could do so. This satisfied the crowd and it left. A matter of two hours later another crowd of people came and made the same demand. This time the gendarmes opened fire on them and killed five people. A number of others were wounded and thrown into the prison. Later on an old man went to the gendarme station to protest against the treatment meted out to the Koreans. This man the gendarmes shot dead. His wife came in and, finding the body, sat down beside it, wailing, as is the custom of the Koreans. She was told to keep still, and, not doing so, was also killed. That day or the next morning the daughter of this couple, going to the gendarme station, was slashed with a sword. The wounded men who had been thrown into prison were kept two days, a little bit of rice given them, but not a bit of water. They were in such terrible thirst that they say they drank their own urine.

That was another means of punishment. When they get them in jail sometimes they give the prisoners some food, but almost invariably they give no water to drink. Although water costs nothing, although it is free, and could easily be furnished, the Japanese seem to think that is one way to make men suffer the worst—choke them for want of water.

During the last part of March, after the people at this place—had shouted for independence, 56 people were asked by the gendarmes to come to the gendarme station, which they did. When they were all inside the gendarmerie compound the gates were closed, gendarmes climbed up on the wall and shot all the people down. Then they went in among them and bayoneted all who still lived. Of the 56, 53 were killed and 3 were able later to crawl out of the heap of dead.

That is, Maungsan, another place in Korea—

Mr. President, I could keep reading testimony of this kind all day, but I am anxious to hurry along, and I will skip over a great deal of what I intended to read.

Here he is describing the experience of a Korean girl who was arrested, not because she committed a crime, but because she was in the parade in March, at the time of the independence jubilee.

As we were nearing the Dok-su Palace, all of a sudden a Japanese policeman seized me from behind by my hair and I was violently thrown to the ground. He kicked me several times with his merciless foot. At this I was rendered almost unconscious. He rushed me along by my hair and I was led to the Chongno police department. At the entrance of the police office 20 or more Japanese policemen who stood in line sneered and kicked me and struck me with their swords and struck me in the face so many times that I became almost unconscious. The cruelty was so great that at times I did not realize whether they were beating me or some one else. This was really more than I was able to bear. My hands and legs were bleeding terribly. My body was black and blue from their blows.

I was led into a room and here again I was handled brutally, as before. They dragged me on the floor, they struck me in the face, they struck me with their swords, they flung me to one corner of the room. At this point I must have been completely unconscious, as I do not remember what happened after that.

On recovering my senses I found myself in a room packed with young men and women. I saw some of them handled so brutally it almost broke my heart to see them beaten. After some time, we were cross-examined by a police officer, one by one. It is beyond my power to convey to another person how those cross-examinations were carried on. I was made to kneel down with my legs bound together and each question and answer was accompanied alternately by blows in the face. They spit in my face. This with curses and invectives of the worst kind. He said, "You prostitute, you vile, pregnant girl!" I was ordered to expose my breasts, but, refusing, they tore my upper garment from me and I was told all sorts of inhuman things, which shocked me terribly. They tied my fingers together and jerked them violently. This made me feel as if my fingers were being torn from my hand. I shut my eyes and dropped down on the floor. Thereupon the examining officers utterd a loud, angry roar and ordered me to kneel down as before, then rushed at me, seizing me by the breast, and struck me violently. Is there anything to be compared with this inhuman treatment? He then said, "You want independence, eh? Preposterous thought. You will get independence when you are locked in jail. Your life will vanish with a stroke of the sword." He then shook me fiercely by the hair. He pulled me by the ear. But he was not satisfied even with this, so he beat me on the head with a stick without mercy. They made me to extend my hands and hold up a heavy chair, which, if I let drop, he would strike my elbow with a stick. He made me kneel down near a window with the chair held up as before. If the chair was lowered, or it touched the window pane, he would come and strike me. An hour or so was passed in this manner, when I was told to go down the stairs. I found that I was completely exhausted. I could not walk; I crawled on the floor with much difficulty, even with the help of one of their professional spies, who followed me. I arose and attempted to go downstairs. As I made the first step down my strength gave out and so I rolled down the whole length of the stairs. I was again unconscious.

On recovering my senses I was obliged to crawl into a room. The policeman in charge of the room was very much amused to see me crawling into the room. He laughed loudly at my misery. Then I prayed, and seemed to see Jesus, and was much comforted from on high. I thank the Lord for the comfort he gave me at this time.

I spent five days in all at the police station. Then I was sent to the West Gate Penitentiary. There I was stripped naked and was looked at by the men. Then I was allowed to put on my dress and was led into a room. I was sneered at and cursed beyond my power to realize. In this room there were 16 persons who were like myself.

The room was not very large, and so we were densely packed together. The toilet arrangements are placed in the room, just like the pig's shelter. The room was so filthy that it was not fit even for pigs. We were given beans and salt to eat. While we were eating now and then some one would look in and call us all sorts of names: "You dogs!" "You pigs!" etc.

On the second day a person, called the police doctor, and several others came in and weighed me stripped naked. They, too, sneered and spat upon me. Now and then I was told by the keeper that I would be tried publicly. I looked forward to that with a great deal of consolation, as I thought I would have some chance to state my case without reserve; but, alas, I was let out one day without trial and without being told the nature of my offense or, indeed, that there had been any legal offense.

Now, Mr. President, this is the story of a girl, vouched for by this organization of Christian churches, who went through all that misery and all that suffering and never was tried, and there never was a charge made against her. She was simply tortured and persecuted almost beyond the power of human endurance and then turned loose, because she was anxious for independence, because she wanted her native land to be free; and we in America are asked to put the seal of condemnation upon her prayer by the approval of this wicked and inhuman treaty that is before us!

Here is another one:

To-day, March 28, 1919, a girl, ———, about 21 years of age, came to our home and told the following: "I was arrested on the streets of Pyengyang the 3d of March and taken to the police station. There were many others, both men and women. They asked if we smoke, if we drank, and if we were Christians. Soon all were let out, with little or no punishment, with the exception of 12 Methodist women, 2 Presbyterians, and 1 Chundokyo woman.

You see, they let practically everybody go except the Christians. They are the ones they are after, and it is the Christian religion that this treaty is going to hit the worst.

Three of the Methodist women were Bible women. They stripped all the women naked in the presence of many men. They found nothing against me except that I had been on the street and had shouted "Mansei." They beat me until the perspiration stood out all over my body. Then they said, "Oh, you are hot," and threw cold water over my naked body. My arms were pulled tight behind my back and tied. Then they beat me again until my body was covered with perspiration, and then threw cold water over me. Then, saying I was cold, they stuck me with the lighted end of their cigarettes. (Some were stuck with hot irons.) My offense was very little compared with those who made flags, took part in the independence, etc. Some were beaten until they were unconscious. * * * One day an old man was beaten until he died. One of the Bible women was right next to him. She asked to be moved, but they compelled her to watch the dead body all night. One of the Bible women not only had her hands bound but had her feet put in stocks. They took our Bibles away and would not allow us to talk or pray. They made vile and indecent remarks to us. All this was done by the Japanese. Though there were Korean policemen in the room they took no part in the beating or in the vileness. The Japanese know the Bible and blaspheme the name of Christ, and asked us if there was not a man by the name of Saul who was put in prison. They asked us most of all as to what the foreigners had said, and were most vile and cruel to those who had been with the missionaries or who had taught in the mission schools. Some of the girls were so changed that they did not look like persons.

Most of these incidents, although I did not give the place, occurred in the central or southern part of Korea; but I have instances of a similar nature that have occurred in every part of Korea. I want to read now one that occurred up in the northern part, and there is very little difference between them. The same thing happened everywhere. The same treatment of women always took place, as far as I have been able to find.

Here is a school that was destroyed:

They also beat the teacher of the day school, and smashed up things in other Christian homes. They broke every window in the church, with the lamps and stoves, and took the pulpit, the Bibles, and the hymn books into the churchyard, where they burned them. They said such low-down people as the Christians had no right to live, and would all be run out of that region.

There has been no demonstration in this village. None of the Christians here took part in any demonstrations for independence in other places.

There was a case where they practically did the same thing, when no demonstration was had, without any claim that they had even cried the national word, "Mansei!" without any claim that they had marched in a procession that had asked for the independence of their country. Simply because they were Korean Christians they were murdered and their churches destroyed. While this incident does not speak of it, there were a good many instances where they not only took the Bibles and burned them, and the pulpits, but they burned the church as well, and often burned it after they had compelled Korean Christians to get inside of it, and there were soldiers standing around to shoot them if they came out.

This organization says that the Kwak San Church was burned on April 25, 1919, and that the Christians were prevented from going to put out the fire, and that they add this:

The atrocious tortures of the prisoners in Tyungju are worthy of African savages and barbarians.

Throughout the country the police immediately began to arrest pastors, elders, and other church officers. Some of these have been released after weeks of imprisonment and examination. Sentences against others are being daily announced, even in the case of men who took no part in the demonstrations, ranging from six months to three years of penal servitude. Of course no apology is intended for those who took part in the uprising deliberately and expecting the consequences. We are emphasizing the fact of the wholesale arrest and beating of Christians simply because they are Christians. In some places the men and women of the village were called together, all those who admitted they were Christians were maltreated or arrested and the others sent away. Wayfarers met by soldiers and gendarmes are asked whether they are Christians, and beaten and abused on the admission of the fact. Korean Christians remaining in the villages are given all sorts of announcements by local police and gendarmes. They are told that Christianity is to be exterminated, that all Christians are to be shot, that meetings are to be forbidden. It has been stated that Chunt Kyo is to be completely abolished because it is a native religion, but that Christianity, because of its foreign affiliations, while not being abolished, will be reduced by legislative restrictions to half its present size. There is, of course, no uniformity in these announcements, but they are all evidently part of a campaign of intimidation. That they are not groundless statements is evidenced by the fact that 19 churches have been partly or wholly wrecked by soldiers; bells, furniture, Bibles, and hymn books being smashed or burned. Seven other churches have been burned to the ground. We have no record of churches of other missions involved except as noted below.

The effect of this treatment varies in different localities. In some places worship is entirely suspended, church officers not under arrest are in hiding, and the congregations are scattered. In some places church meetings have been forbidden; in others the services are continued, but with reduced attendance and with police detectives and spies present; in still others the disturbances have had no effect on the congregational gatherings, and many new inquirers are present, attracted doubtless by the reputation for patriotism which Christians have acquired. It may be said that the local officials are always ready with some absurd explanation of the destruction of church property such as that the Christians burn their own churches to show their abandonment of Christianity or that non-Christians burn them in hostility to Christians.

Since the bringing in of additional troops from Japan things have grown incredibly worse. These troops were brought in with the avowed purpose of "using severe measures," and interpreted in the light of facts this means a campaign of fire and sword and devastation, the burning of whole villages accompanied in some instances with the massacre of inhabitants in the most approved style of Hun and Turk. * * * In all instances the hostility of the soldiers and gendarmes and police is directed against Christians. Christians in districts adjoining the devastated region have been told that the same thing would happen to them, and over large areas the people are sleeping out in the hills without shelter at night because they dare not stay in their villages, which may be burned over their heads at midnight and the inhabitants massacred.

In one village the Christians were ordered to tear down the church building and told that unless they signed an agreement not to be Christians they would be arrested as insurgents. Profession of Christianity is regarded as equivalent to confession of revolutionary purpose.

In parts of the country where the reign of terror is being maintained people dare not walk from one village to another for fear of being shot, and the men dare not work in the fields. Frightfulness of another kind is employed. Inhabitants of villages are lined up to be shot and then sent away till another day, when the process is repeated. Even though not actually shot, on these occasions the people have the instances of massacre and devastation before their eyes and never know when the threat will be carried into effect. And always the animus is directed against the Christians.

We can not go into further details in this report. The accompanying documents may be examined. But it can not be doubted that a persistent campaign is being carried on against Christianity under the plea of suppressing revolt.

Vilifying, beating old men and little children, breaking up meetings by armed officers and men, wholesale arrests, brutal treatment of those under arrest, threats and intimidation and massacre are all being employed to break the spirit of Christians and to prevent the spread of Christianity. These statements are supported by photographs, signed statements, and narratives on file.

Now, I want to read something from one of the letters they have here as exhibits, and which this organization vouches for:

The Japanese as a nation do not like Christianity—it is too democratic.

* * * * * * *

Oh, Japan is cruel! Even the best Japanese Christians, of course, back their Empire. I know Japan now. Nationally aggressive, obtaining her ends at all costs; if Christianity and love suit her, they are used; if the foulest methods of Machiavelli are required, they are employed, and all is covered with a smiling lie. I know her, but it took me two years.

Here is a letter from one of the missionaries, from which I quote:

That the Christian Church is right in the midst of the movement no one will deny. The fact that a very large number of our most influential pastors, elders, students, and prominent Christians are in prison now is clear proof that they have been making their influence felt. It is evident that the Christians are the only ones sufficiently in touch with the international situation to realize that the principles of the self-determination of small nations could be applied to their case at this strategic time. The idea that appeal and protest and noise are as powerful as guns would never have swept the country if the Christians were not what they are. The Christians are the only ones who have not been intimidated to the extermination of all hope. Our Christians have felt that our presence was an influence which would compel justice.

Their mail is searched and seized at any small pretense. Commercial enterprise is flourishing, but under such conditions as to render Koreans hopelessly the commercial slaves of the Japanese overlords. Competition on a fair basis seems impossible. Public schools are very few. They have changed textbooks so that Korean children are taught history which lauds Japan and ignores the ancient glories of Korea. Fathers clench their fists as they complain that they are compelled to send their children to Japanese schools to learn in a hated language things that they hold to be lies. Christian and non-Christian schools have been crushed and the Bible ordered out of mission schools even. Newspapers are filled with stuff that has been concocted and censored by the Government till one wonders that manhood could so desert an editor. How can any intelligent human being so garble facts in their papers while admitting that they do so at the order of the powers that be? New roads are good, but the Koreans, who have built them without proper remuneration at the point of a sword in great gangs of forced labor, do not appreciate them. Koreans justly feel outraged that Japan limits their right to have good schools of higher than high-school grade, and then refuse to let their best sons go abroad to get an education, except a limited number who are kept under Japanese tutelage in Tokyo. Japanese salaries for men in the same work throughout the whole Government system are twice what Koreans get. And yet it is the Koreans who pay the taxes. The progress is fine and the ship rides high on the wave, but it has become unbearable to the galley slaves in the hold.

Now, Mr. President, I will read a little further from this report of these charges:

Look at the administration from whatever point you will, the aim of the Japanese to make Korea a preserve for Japanese officialdom and exploit her for the benefit of Japan and Japanese colonists stands out as clear as day. Visit the large harbors and you will find that the land adjoining the docks is monopolized by the Japanese and the Koreans denied building rights within the Japanese section. The Crown lands that have been held in perpetual lease by generations of Korean farmers have been sold by the Government almost exclusively to Japanese settlers. For this reason the immigration to Manchuria has been increasing year by year. The banking system of the peninsula has been greatly extended and improved and is increasingly proving a boon to the natives. But it is surely unfortunate that, with the possible exception of the Kanjo Bank, all the managers and nine-tenths of the clerks are Japanese. It is this wholesale handicapping of the Korean youth that engenders the disaffection which has recently shown itself. This coming as it does, from a people who are so strongly urging their policy of "No race discrimination," is, to say the least, an aspersion on Japanese sincerity. Discrimination runs through their whole imperial policy, is applied in their private business enterprises, and is perpetuated by their school system. For not only are Japanese and Korean children separated in their schools, but the standard of education is higher for the Japanese than it is for the Korean.

Mr. President, further on this report shows that one of the sources of revenue the Japanese get out of Korea is the licensing of wholesale prostitution and the sale of cocaine and other drugs, which the Korean people, and that the Chinese people also, have, with the assent and approval of the whole civilized world, been trying to keep away from their citizens. That is just what they are doing in China, as I have shown in the last two or three days of my effort here, absolutely repeating in China what this history shows they have been doing in Korea for 20 years.

Mr. President, I have a communication here written by Newell Martin, of Milford, Conn. Mr. Martin was born in China, his father, the Rev. W. A. P. Martin, being president of the Chinese Imperial University, probably one of the most esteemed and distinguished American citizens in China. I intended to read some extracts from it, but on account of the lateness of the hour and my desire to finish before the Senate adjourns, I am going to ask permission to print it in the RECORD without reading it. It practically demonstrates, from an eyewitness, every statement that I have made, Mr. President, in regard to China and in regard to Korea.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEWBERRY in the chair). Without objection, leave is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

To any Americans that are prejudiced against the use of torture as a means of religious persuasion the following extract is intended:

"For the Korean Christians no relief or remedy can be seen on this side of eternity. My prayer is that your hearts may be touched so that none of those that hear me may consent to the sin of giving over Chinese Christians to the tormentors. If you had lived during the rise of the Dutch Republic would you, for any political profit, great or small, have sold the Netherlands to the Spanish inquisition? In those days of manly faith and honor what English statesman could have debated, even in his mind, the expediency of so dark a reason?"

In this letter is nothing new. In his "Mastery of the Far East" and in his short, clear article in "Asia" for September Dr. Arthur Judson Brown has told how Japan already intimidates and degrades the Shantung Christians and from a certain little brown pamphlet are taken the few examples of persecution in Korea here given.

Nothing about Korea is here stated of my own knowledge. The Korean facts are all taken from that pamphlet in a letter dated July 9, and that pamphlet (certain pages of which I shall refer to thus, "P. 30") is entitled "The Korean Situation: Authentic Accounts of Recent Events." The price is 25 cents. It was issued in August by the Commission on Relations with the Orient of the Federal Council of the Church of Christ in America, 105 East Twenty-second Street, New York City. The foreword is signed by William I. Haven, chairman, and Sidney L. Gulick, secretary. The latter is widely known as a powerful propagandist for Japan. So much of the pamphlet as is written by him and Dr. Haven shows an intense desire that the laity keep quiet and not get excited, and a deplorable eagerness to persuade us that butter will not melt in the mouth of a Japanese torturer. The pamphlet is, obviously, issued reluctantly, under pressure of persistent inquiry from missionaries and other Christians.

The statements of fact in that pamphlet are not like tales of atrocity told by refugees, in places of safety, against a distant enemy. They are statements made in secret, in the hope of bringing some sort of hope or relief. Both victim and reporting missionary are still in the awful grip of the oppressor. Neither can hope to profit by falsehood or exaggeration.

All American missions, indeed, have many times been sternly warned by their superiors that it will be worse for them if they mislead the home office by any exaggeration or show sympathy with any opposition to authority.

Published with reluctance by an advocate of the Japanese Government, the statements of fact tucked away in that pamphlet have more than the weight of charges against that Government. They are the unwilling confessions of its friends.

The first five pages of that brown pamphlet make unintentionally a sinister and terrifying revelation of Japan's hidden hand in America.

The problem before Tokio was:

(1) To blast Korea with a sudden flame of persecution, so that no crop of Christian weeds would ever make head again;

(2) To terrify so profoundly all Koreans and Chinese that prudent men would know without ever being told again that in Japanese colonies faith in a crucified Saviour leads straight to a martyr's crown; to heavenly glory, perhaps, but to certain earthly shame and ruin;

(3) To perfect this advertisement of her heathen power among her slaves before midsummer; and

(4) To keep America and Paris ignorant of the Korean horrors.

Japan achieved these seemingly incompatible triumphs with a skill beyond imagination. She began by choking off such voices as the Japan Chronicle, the most potent English newspaper in Japan, by a rigid perfection of censorship. But how silence the angry murmuring Christians of San Francisco and New York? How keep their murmurs from rising to a roar that might reach Paris over the heads of European censors?

Any American has cause for grave thought when he learns that all this was foreseen and provided for beforehand as carefully and completely as were the rawhides and hot irons that tore the flesh of faithful Christians.

Who knows by what magic or good luck or supernatural persuasiveness heathen Japan controls the time and manner of disseminating—no, of suppressing in a "publicity" department of our own Christian missions—the most important missionary news since Diocletian's day? Hundreds of pages of facts had been brought through all the perils with speed and secrecy to the Presbyterian and Methodist mission boards. Published, those horrifying documents would have roused the most complacent priest of our city churches, the meanest deacon of us all, and the coldest of our politicians; and the persecutors would have been slowed up or inconvenienced; and Paris might have denied their prayer for added power. A machinery, however, had been prepared beforehand, and according to plan, as the Japanese of Europe used to say, the unsuspecting Presbyterians and Methodists poured their facts into the "publicity" department of a "commission," the secretary of which is Dr. Sidney L. Gulick, famous for his eulogies of Japan, many of them entirely just. Those facts were buried forever, then, in the office of a Japanophile enthusiast, who was not less determined than Tokyo to keep them from getting about among the Americans or getting to Paris. Dr. Gulick called in Japanese officials, who controlled and directed the obsequious whispers in which we Christians vented our fiery wrath. Month after month went by, and five months after the persecution broke out Dr. Gulick's "publicity" department, under pressure, reluctantly printed that brown pamphlet. To kill all possible interest in it he prefaced it with five pages of flattery of the Japanese Government and of advice to us to trust Apollyon to execute all necessary "reforms." Who wishes to read one single page of these atrocities when assured by Dr. Gulick in the "foreword" that a most efficient Government is doing what we pray for and that the mission boards themselves are content? God will not be content, nor will the Christians of California.

Perhaps you have not seen Japanese executioners. I have. July 6, 1919, was perhaps the very day on which Dr. Gulick was writing his misleading praise of Tokyo. Months before that day Dr. Gulick had begun prostrating us in respectful telegrams before the Mikado's throne. On July 6, in the capital city of Korea, a muscular Japanese executioner strips to his task again. The swordlike rawhide whistles through the air, and falls with sickening force across the bare flesh of a Christian student. After 10 cruel lashes, delivered with all his might, he is relieved by a second executioner for 10 more cuts; and then comes a third to give 10 more. On July 7, once more three executioners drive the rawhide with full swing and force into the very place that was torn and gashed yesterday. The boy is again dragged back to his jail. If you were he, lying there, waiting for the next day's torture, would you not pray for death? Or would you, perhaps, curse the day you became a Christian: Or, if you knew whose secret hand was guilty of your torments, would you not curse Gulick?

A seventeenth-century writer says that it is sport to see a man on the rack for half an hour. There are sadists that skin cats alive. But neither of these sports is so thrilling to amateurs of pain as the torment of the rawhide, and sadists gather where the police are torturing Christians.

On July 8 the boy is brought out for a third torment, and at the first blow, as if the festering wounds were torn open by steel fingers, blood and pus and gobs of Christian flesh fly up and bespatter the locating bystanders. Thence young Christian goes to the American hospital or sometimes to his grave. He is but one of many; how many none will ever know.

The persecution has done its deadly work; and now the friends of the persecutors will ask us to trust and admire the new governor general and his smooth words about gentleness and reform—the purring of the sated tiger.

I have no part in trade or politics or missions, but I have a powerful motive for beseeching your attention. Chinese is my native language, and I mourn over the all but hopeless enslavement of the land where I was born and which I have always loved. From childhood I have hated with an implacable hatred all those that trade in secrecy and all persecutors and torturers.

NEWELL MARTIN.

MILFORD, CONN., September, 1919.

Neither Italy nor the Aegean is so beautiful as Japan, nor is any people more lovable and admirable than the Japanese. Gentlest of men with their own children, fiercest to their foes, these indomitable islanders are aware from a calm observation of facts that they are above common human beings as Hebrews are above Hottentots, but that is no reason why common men should unduly smooth the path for their coming masters.

The Japanese have seen how a handful of Greeks under Alexander, and, in their turn, a handful of British, have risen to world dominion. The cold-blooded Japanese oligarchs think their own turn should come next. In the relentless pursuit of this unwholesome ambition Japanese politicians have set themselves to possess, enslave, and assimilate Korea and Shantung, the two keys of Asia.

To the Koreans, only 15 years ago, they guaranteed independence. To-day in Korea it may be death to speak the word. To the Koreans, nine years ago, they guaranteed freedom of religion. In Korea to-day to be a Christian is to be in deadly peril. To-day, in enslaving the Koreans, the Japanese recklessly degrade themselves and smirch the honor of their race.

Like forest fires in a season of drought, atrocities now break forth all over the world, and men become despairingly indifferent and wait wearily for the horrors to burn themselves out. But the Japanese atrocities in Korea demand our most intense attention, because: First, pagans are persecuting Christians; secondly, we are using our gigantic power to extend these persecutions to Shantung and the rest of northern China; thirdly, these are not war atrocities or civil-war atrocities, and these tales are not scandals invented by a feeble folk to discredit their tyrants but are the horrors of religious persecution directed against peaceful Christians and unarmed women and children.

We begin to understand that in "opening" Japan we played the perilous part of the Rash Fisherman of the Arabian Nights. We unbottled the appalling Afreet, whose omnipotent form now towers to the stars and blackens all the eastern sky. But yesterday we were condescending to these islanders. To-day, under the dictation of Japanese, our huge Nation turns to paths of shame. Imperious, on their tiny islands, they make cowards of us all.

If you are a Japanese policeman, you can have no end of fun with a Presbyterian schoolgirl (p. 47). Throw her down, kick her, here and there, hard; drag her to your police court. Beat her about the face and head and legs and back until she is all blood and tears and shrieks and convulsive sobs. Tell her to show her breasts. When she refuses, tear off her undershirt. Keep her four days, then take her to another prison. There strip her naked; have her "looked at by the men." This is one of the mildest of the things done in Korea in March of this year, while the silent, inscrutable, secretive, thoroughly informed envoys of Japan, in Paris, were offering every diplomatic courtesy to our commissioners.

But for the calm confidence of those Japanese envoys in America's submissiveness to Japan that girl to-day would be like any New York maiden, securely studying her Bible lesson, and no harm would have come to her from the Japanese officials who, with greedy, lecherous eyes, watched her as she went by, all faith and hope and maiden modesty. The soldiers that gloated over her bare body are a part of the forces with which her own soldiers and engineers are affiliated to-day in northern Asia.

In March, 1919, while we were praying daily that the Paris conference might lay firm foundations for peace, righteousness, and freedom, the Japanese Government secretly ordered its police in Korea to extirpate the Christian religion, which used to flourish there, and also the modern Korean religion, a sort of Sermon-on-the-Mount affair, whose creed begins with the fantastic proposition—

Who waits on God
Will wield God's might.

No nonpagan eye but that of the Recording Angel has ever seen that decree.

You can infer, however, with scientific accuracy, from the acts of Japanese soldiers and police, the orders of their Government, more exactly than you can infer from the movement of a man's hand the action of his brain.

From those actions we know that the Japanese Government had directed that the Korean people must be taught by terror that it pays to be a Buddhist, and that it does not pay to be a Christian or to follow the gentle Korean religion or to have dealings with American missionaries.

The American missionaries had held utterly aloof from politics, but Christianity embarrassed the Japanese Government, because it gave the Koreans an outlook from slavery, a window on the world. You can not be in the house of even an intensely neutral and cautious American missionary without stumbling on incendiary books like Uncle Tom's Cabin, Milton's, or John Bunyan's.

Religious freedom in Korea is guaranteed by solemn treaties, but Tokyo thinks it no longer necessary to wear any pretense about the sanctity of treaties or to make broad any phylacteries.

Tokyo found its opportunity to get rid of these irksome religions in the Korean declaration of independence of March 1. Never was so calm a declaration. As a result of skillful secrecy and combination, without a foreknowledge of missionary, priest, or police, all the people of Korea came forth on one day and peacefully declared themselves independent. Their sole object was to inform the peace conference of Paris that 17,000,000 of Koreans desired to be free (p. 22).

In this outpouring of unarmed multitudes who shouted "Mansay!" meaning "Hurrah!" there was a natural preeminence of people of schooling. As a great number of those who have some education belonged to the two doomed religions, this gave the pagan persecutors their chance.

The Government resolved to strike terror forever into these Korean Christians, so that never again would they lift their meek faces from under the lash and cry out to mankind. They were to be taught that it does not pay to be mixed in the remotest way with Christians or Americans.

Such of the declarants as were not shot down at once had gone peacefully home to wait for Mr. Wilson's justice, now, they thought, thoroughly advised and aroused. To those homes went spies and gendarmes and police, and dragged the Christians away to torment, shame, and death.

In six weeks Korea was quiet with the stillness of death. Every Korean had learned that if he breathed a word about Americans or Mr. Wilson or freedom, he was to be classed with Christians and meet a Christian's doom.

The Christians were swept away like torn paper before a hurricane. We are told of 40,000 arrested and 6,000 killed in the Japanese fury.

Not till the graves give up their dead will the numbers be known exactly. Those figures are probably low. The people of Korea are one-sixth of those of the United States. It is doubtful whether even Japanese efficiency can strike utter terror into so great a population without killing at least 1 in every 2,000 and arresting six times as many. Some Japanese Torquemada may offer to deny these figures. I will not argue with a murderer as to the number of his victims unless he permits me at least to inspect the cellar where he hides their skeletons. Will you, Prime Minister Hara, of Japan, invite an inhabitual commission to report, from sifted testimony, exact statistics as to how many women have been dishonored, how many maidens put to shame? And what can statistics tell us of the torments of Christians slowly done to death in heathen jails? Have the Japanese kept record with algometers and registered the sum total of their torments?

When Torquemada ruled in Spain, what English Protestant would give statistics of his cruelties? When the Waldenses went to the stake and the rack, centuries had to pass before the ledgers of the Inquisition were open to the historian. I offer only a few examples of the different kinds of torture and massacre. You may infer the rest from the dumb terror that now binds all Korea and all Korean Christians.

In this persecution the resourceful Japanese use many different tortures for the body, and, in addition, a torture for the mind that is a sadistic twentieth-century novelty in religious persecution.

"A Korean woman," writes a missionary, "would rather die than expose her naked body in ways not conformable to local custom. But it seems to be the common delight of official depravity just now to humiliate our Christian women by stripping them and beating them while naked" (p. 104).

Ingenious Japanese! Some Korean Christian might dare for himself sword or fire or Damiens's bed of steel; but let him think twice of his wife and daughters put to open shame.

The ordinary slaveholder used to be inclined to encourage modesty among his helots as increasing their market value; but the Japanese, in the systematic degradation of his new slaves, finds a profit in breaking down the personal dignity of wives and daughters. No chief of police would have ventured of his own accord to adopt such a system of organized indecency. It was obviously thought out and directed by the controlling brain at Tokyo.

A government that rests on torture is a government of devils, unfit for even our time. But this Japanese Government plans carefully the violation of sanctities that lie at the base of civilized society. I remember no other modern government that has deliberately schemed to degrade the unhappy women who are its subjects. There is an unparalleled fiendishness in minds that can thus systematically befoul the purity and modesty of young girls. We might make league and alliance with an inhuman brute and put him in a council to rule over us; but we have some pride in our manhood, some reverence for womanhood, and we will not enter into covenant with a Sadist.

Of those that were arrested, be they 40,000 or 4,000, or more or fewer, how can we sleep at night when we remember that every pang they suffered earned pleasure, profit, or reward for their tormentors? Of those that died, be they 6,000 or 600, or more or fewer, how many died an easy death? Those that died quickly were the lucky ones.

Japanese methods are precise and thorough. Christianity in Japan was stamped out utterly in the seventeenth century. Then, if one Christian was found in any house, from four houses to the right of that house and from four houses to the left every man, woman, and child was taken and died the death. Doubt not that in uprooting Korean Christianity to-day the Japanese use a similar perfection of method.

In the recent uprooting machinery, of course, was sometimes used. One man was squeezed in an upright press. Then a cord was tied firmly about one finger, and he was hoisted till his toes barely touched the floor. His two crimes were cheering in a procession and receiving a letter from a friend in America and withholding it (p. 45).

In his case the Japanese applied an unnecessarily spectacular torture, so as to put another stumbling block in John Hay's open door by advertising to Koreans and Chinese that it is bad luck to receive letters from America.

The best modern tortures need no cumbrous machinery. The grewsome complexities so fashionable in medieval Europe were meant to save people from torture by frightening them beforehand.

The Japanese held wounded men in prison two days without water. Think about that quietly. They took out of our missionary hospitals men with gunshot wounds and dragged them away to the horrors of the question (p. 44).

"Beating" is a weak word for a strong torment. Beating can easily be made the seventh hell of agony. With a club discreetly used, a Japanese can break the stoutest heart; he can in a few minutes drive the strongest to scream and beg for death. He can do the same thing with 3 feet of cord.

"Beating and torture," writes a missionary, "are the cardinal principles of Japanese police methods in Korea."

"It is usual for the arrested man to be cuffed and kicked by several policemen" (p. 16).

I offer no schedule of cruelties, but I may tell the story of a dozen or more, and you then know the story of 10,000.

1. The Story of the Pregnant Woman (p. 55). No machinery is needed to torture a pregnant woman. This woman had been a mission teacher, "very bright and intelligent." She was two months advanced in pregnancy. She had gone to the house of one Pyo to comfort the mother, who was distressed because her young daughter had been carried off by the Japanese police. "As she came out of the house several police and soldiers came into the yard. They knew she was the school-teacher and had been searching for her at the school. They told her to come with them. As she stood in front of the police station, a policeman kicked her hard from behind, and she fell forward into the room. As she lay, stunned, on the floor, a policeman put his foot on her head. Then he raised her up and struck her many times over the head and face." He tore off her clothes, "meanwhile constantly kicking and striking her. He also beat her with a heavy stick and with a paddle. He tore off her underclothes and kicked her in the chest and beat her, accusing her of setting the minds of the Korean children against Japan, and said that he intended to beat her to death."

"She tried to cover her nakedness with the underclothes that had been stripped from her," but they were torn away from her. "She tried to sit down, but was forced to rise by constant kicking and beating with a stick. She tried to turn away from the many men in the room, but was constantly forced to turn again so as to face the men. She tried to protect herself with her hands and arms, and one man twisted her arms behind her back and held them there while the beating and kicking continued. All parts of her body were beaten. She became benumbed and was losing consciousness of pain. Her face swelled, and her body became discolored."

2. The story of the widow Chung, an attendant of the Bible Institute (p. 54). She is 31. She was taken into the office, and a policeman tore off her underclothes, and she protested. For this "they struck her in the face" till she was black and blue. She was beaten "systematically on the arms and legs with a paddle. The beating continued for some time. The police then stopped the beating and sat down to drink tea and eat Japanese cakes, meanwhile making fun of the woman sitting there naked. There were many men in the room." Nor was she the only woman there. The beaten mission-teacher woman was lying naked at the side of the room, while the tormentors rested and laughed and ate and drank.

3. The story of the naked Methodist women (p. 50). Fifteen women, 12 of them Methodists and 2 of them Presbyterians, were held at the Pyengyang police station. One of them, a girl of 21, tells the story: "They stripped all the women naked in the presence of many men. They found nothing against me except that I had been on the street and had shouted 'Mansay.' They beat me. My arms were pulled tight behind my back and tied. They stuck me with the lighted end of their cigarettes. Some were stuck with hot irons. My offense was very little compared with those who made flags.

"Some were beaten until they were unconscious. One young woman was just at the time of her monthly sickness. She resisted having her clothes taken off. They tore off her clothing and beat her all the harder. After four days we were taken to the prison. Here we were packed in a room with men and women. One day an old man was beaten until he died. One of the Bible women was right next to him. She asked to be moved away from the corpse, but was denied. 'They took our Bibles away and would not allow us to talk or pray.' The jailers 'blasphemed the name of Christ,' and asked 'if there was not a man by the name of Saul who was put in prison.' They asked, most of all, as to what the foreigners had said, and were most vile and cruel to those who had been with the missionaries or who had taught in the mission schools. Some of the girls were so changed that they did not look like persons."

4. The story of a young girl (p. 47). "Near the Dok Su Palace a Japanese policeman seized me from behind by my hair and I was thrown to the ground hard." "He kicked me several times." "At the entrance of the 'Chongo' police office 20 or more Japanese policemen who stood in line sneered and kicked me and struck me with their swords and struck me in the face many times. I became almost unconscious. My hands and legs were bleeding.

"I was led into a room, and here they dragged me on the floor. They struck me in the face. They struck me with their swords. They flung me to one corner of the room. On coming to my senses I found myself in a room packed with young men and women. I saw some of them handled so brutally it almost broke my heart to see them beaten."

After some time "we were examined by a police officer one by one. I was made to kneel with my legs bound." Each question and answer was accompanied by "blows in the face." "I was ordered to expose my breasts." "They tied my fingers together and jerked them violently. This made me feel as if my fingers were being torn from my hand." She then tells of her going to the cells. "As I made the first step down my strength gave out, and so I rolled down the whole length of the stairs. I was obliged to crawl into a room. The policeman in charge was very much amused to see me crawling into the room. He laughed loudly. Then I prayed and seemed to see Jesus and was much comforted from on high. I spent five days in all at the police station. Then I was sent to the West Gate penitentiary.

"There I was stripped naked and was looked at by the men."

5. The torturing of one Kim (p. 51). Kim, a young man of promise, a member of the Third City Church of Taiku, was heard by a friend in another cell "to cry out a number of times at the pain of the punishment inflicted on him in the jail." He was frequently beaten on the head with the key of the cell. After his release he suffered terrible pain in his head. "It seemed as if all one side of his head was gone." He died in 10 days.

"The night he died he was protesting in his delirium that he was innocent and that his punishment was too severe. The doctor who attended him states that he died from blows on the head. The neck and the base of the skull were darkly discolored."

6. Chopping a Christian (p. 43). "A young man was peacefully going home (he had, it is true, been shouting 'Mansay'), and was 'walking along a small street' when a policeman from behind threw him down and 'drew his sword and hacked at him.' 'His skull was cut through so that the brain showed. This was done by three sword cuts in the same place.' The photograph showed 10 sword cuts. 'During the next day his little cousin, a mission-school girl,' who was greatly attached to him, 'stood watch over his body.'"

7. The elder's wife (p. 34). On March 24 "soldiers looking for one of the elders" of a certain church "took his wife, a bright-looking woman of about 30." "They stripped her of all her clothing and beat her without mercy" to make her tell where her husband was.

8. Official advice to Christians. One missionary statement runs as follows:

"Wholesale arrest and beating of Christians simply because they are Christians.

"In some places the men and women of the village were called together. All those who admitted they were Christians were maltreated or arrested and the others sent away. Wayfarers met by soldiers and gendarmes are asked whether they are Christians and beaten and abused on the admission of the fact." Korean Christians surviving "are given all sorts of announcements by local police and gendarmes. They are told that Christianity is to be exterminated; that all Christians are to be shot; that meetings are to be forbidden."

"Throughout the country the police immediately began to arrest pastors, elders, and other church officers."

A Japanese vice governor (the real executive of his Province) "in a public meeting advised people to have nothing to do with Christianity. Police officials are urging the same thing everywhere" (p. 89).

"Presbyterian and Methodist organizations are both obnoxious to the Government."

9. Scourged on the cross (p. 67). Four young theological students who had taken no part in any demonstration "were found in the college dormitories by Japanese soldiers. Tied to a wooden cross they were given 39 strokes with a paddle and told that as Christ suffered on the cross, it was fitting that they should."

10. The massacre at Cheamni (p. 74). The village of Cheamni lay only 15 miles from the railroad by which all tourists used to travel on their way from New York to Peking and from Paris to Tokyo. Japanese soldiers were sent there in motor cars.

"The gendarmes and soldiers marching into this village, summoned the men of the village to attend a meeting in the church, where, they were told, certain orders would be read to them."

The Japanese gathered in this way about 12 Christian men and about 25 of the Korean religion. As soon as the men had "been gathered together, the soldiers opened fire upon them through the open windows, after having surrounded the building. To complete their work, the surviving women of the village told the missionaries, the soldiery entered the building and bayoneted all the men whom the bullets had not killed, while two women who had approached the building to learn the fate of their husbands were bayoneted and their bodies thrown among those of the men. Then kerosene was poured upon the dead and the bodies and the church building consumed by fire."

A missionary who saw the place the next day makes these notes: "Heaps of smoking ashes. Groups of women, children, and old men sitting on the hillside watching the ruins in dumb despair. Corpse horribly burned lying just outside of a building, which we learned later had been the church. This body was photographed where it lay. I questioned 'a villager,' but fear and shock had numbed him. He held his head in his hand and said that everything he had and all the results of years of hard work had gone."

The missionary said, "How is it you are alive?" and he answered, "I am not a Christian."

These Christians were Methodists. "These people had lost everything, even their seeds for the coming year." Another man said that "his house had not been set fire because he was not a Christian."

The soldiers seem to have belonged to the Seventy-eighth Regiment. The missionary says that at Cheamni "the odor of burnt flesh" about "the church was sickening."

One of the men who accompanied the British consul to this place says:

"Whenever we started to talk to the natives" the "policemen would saunter up and the Korean would freeze up." "The number of Christian men killed is 12, whose names were secured, in addition to which 2 women who went to find out what was happening to their husbands were killed, one a woman over 40 and the other 19. These may have been the bodies we saw outside the church."

Cheamni is a type of one class of burnings and massacres. In that one district 15 towns were burned.

11. A night massacre (p. 80). A type of another kind of official burning is Soo Chon, where "the people were awakened by finding their houses on fire. As soon as they ran out they were struck with swords or bayonets or shot." A church and 30 houses were burned.

12. Another type of massacre (p. 33). Of massacres we find another type, exemplified in Marengsan, where 56 men were summoned to the police station, locked in the police yard, and shot down by the police from the top of the wall.

The Koreans had heard, as a voice from heaven, the inspiring declarations of our President. It was their plan to march, utterly unarmed, and cheer for independence and their native land and to submit to any cruelty. Their whole aim was to tell the outer world of their woes. The outer world finds it profitable to be deaf to their cry, and hurries to put its obsequious neck under the conqueror's foot, and begs him to accept 30,000,000 new slaves and pass on to fresh conquests. Resolved to use no violence, the Koreans kept themselves under firm control to a surprising degree. That was the case even where two women were carried out from a police station, and the crowd of 500 that had gathered to protest burst into sobs at the horror of their condition. That was the station where the police officer explained that, although it was not necessary to strip men or old women, girls and young women had to be stripped naked in the search for seditious papers (p. 56).

13. The story of a brave young man (p. 16). One young man, seeing the girl that he was engaged to in the hands of the police, went to her rescue. How many of us would have had that daring? Between him and that helpless girl stood all the armies of the league of nations What do you suppose was done to that young man in the dungeon where he lay when last heard of?

14. The story of a man's mother (p. 34). "The mother of one of the wounded men told a policeman that if her son died 'she would take revenge.' The policeman went to her house and again stabbed her son, who was lying on the floor wounded."

15. Respect for gray hairs (p. 32). At Suna Ub an old man went to the gendarme station to protest against the atrocities. In the East reverence is paid to gray hairs, and old men can speak up where others fear to tread. "This man the gendarmes shot dead. His wife came in and, finding the body, sat down beside it wailing, as is the custom of Koreans. She was told to keep still, and, not doing so, she also was killed." The daughter who came to seek her aged parents was spared, being merely slashed with a sword.

This persecution throws light on the part which Japan will take in the league of nations.

The governor general of Korea is close to the heads of the Japanese State and in the closest confidence of the court. What he says and what he does are in a high degree the voice and act of Tokyo.

The great Ito was resident in Korea. The powerful Terauchi was governor general before he became prime minister, preceding Hara, now prime minister. Hasegawa succeeded Terauchi as governor general.

We may expect Hasegawa in a short time to rule over us as Japan's representative in the council of the big five.

This governor general made a proclamation reminding the Koreans, with a view to letting them understand that there is no hope from any quarter, that Japan is "one of the principal factors in the league of nations." He exhorted Koreans "to participate in the great work of humanity and righteousness" of Japan "as one of the leading powers of the world" (p. 109).

Lovers of the league of nations, which this governor general describes so accurately, will be pleased to know what is done in this governor general's house.

Pak Tun Nak, aged 25, met with all the other people of this village at the end of March, and without violence paraded the village, calling "Mansay." Gendarmes told them to go home. This they did, and that day there was no trouble. Five days later gendarmes went from house to house arresting people. Pak Tun Nak and many others were taken to the governor general's and flogged. He received 30 strokes at 12 o'clock and 30 at 2 o'clock. He was taken to the missionary hospital (p. 41).

A government schoolgirl says: "On March 1, at 2, we went to the French consulate and the American consulate and shouted 'Mansay.' We pressed forward to the governor general's, and there the kotung koan (high official) 'came out with his sword, beating all in his way. He struck me with his sword on the back, making a wound 3 inches long. The force of the blow threw me down, after which he stamped on my head with his foot'" (p. 82).

Poor little lamb! Shouting her cry for freedom before France and England and before the august governor general who stands for the might of the league of nations!

A peculiar gravity attends the Korean terrorizing. It has a twofold object. It is to terrify the Koreans into silence; it is also to terrify Japan's new Chinese subjects into silence. When Japan moves in China, she wishes to hear no protests and to be bothered with no Christians. The prudent Chinese study the reports on Korea, and will hasten to avoid being mixed up in any way with Christians and Americans. The prestige of Christianity and of America is gone, and Hara is content. One would suppose that at the first offense the nearest missionary could go to the polished governor general and through him and the polished Viscount Uchida cable all the facts to New York and Paris. Nobody dares to mail even sealed letters from Korea about these crimes.

Japan controlled the mails and telegraphs. America, therefore, could hear nothing of these atrocities. America meekly waits for such news from Asia as Japan thinks wholesome for her weak mind. The peace conference was sitting, and we in our homes were invoking divine light and guidance for its counsels.

The facts about Korea were essential to aid our President in deciding whether he should award the 30,000,000 of Shantung to the cruel taskmasters that hold the whip over the 17,000,000 of Korea. If we had made any promise, it would be void because of the concealment of these material facts about the policy and conduct of the men to whom we awarded Shantung.

A missionary came to New York, a messenger, as if we were back in the days of Erasmus. Messengers, with documents hidden about their clothes made their way out of Korea.

In a famous painting, The Missionary's Story, a shabby priest tries to tell an absent-minded cardinal what the pagan wolves have done to the lambs of his flock. I fear that some of the officers of the great mission boards were alarmed when they heard this Korean missionary's story lest the American people might hear what should fire the coldest heart. Who, with the smell of burning Christian flesh in his nostrils, could vote for Gov. Gen. Hasegawa and his league of nations?

The Commission on Relations with the Orient, which operates as a brake on the mission boards, has consistently followed the policy, in which it has been skillfully seconded by the press, of keeping everything quiet and keeping everybody cool.

There are indications that some of the hierarchy of our Protestant churches have been misled by Japanese diplomatists into believing that everything should be hushed up that may diminish the popular demand for a league of nations and for a permanent alliance between our Government and that of Japan.

On April 16, 1919, the mission boards called a meeting of that commission of the sesquipedalian name.

To two such meetings "important Japanese were invited." "Urgent and full cablegrams" were promptly sent to Japan by some of these "Japanese friends."

The commission sought by these "quiet and friendly methods" to exert influence. "It deemed it only fair and just to take up the matter first with the Japanese" "before giving to the daily press the rapidly accumulating matter from Korea."

Under pressure from anxious, inquiring Christians, that commission scrambled together such papers as they could no longer withhold and printed them in the little brown pamphlet of 125 pages referred to in the preface, entitled "The Korean Situation."

That pamphlet begins by saying that "many exaggerations have been circulated." It says that "there is good ground for belief that even before the uprising"—"uprising" is a strange word to describe the Korean's peaceful protest—"the present cabinet" "was earnestly grappling with the problem of administrative reform in Korea," and that "there is every reason to believe that Premier Hara and his colleagues will exert their fullest power to rectify the wrongs and inaugurate a new era in Korea."

The facts set forth here have been dug out of that pamphlet. You may rest assured, then, that these notes contain none of the "exaggerations" deplored by the Rev. Dr. Gulick.

How much effort has been made by the press and the commission to awaken and inform the public you may infer from the amount of information that you yourself had in regard to the Korean atrocities before reading these notes.

Viscount Uchida will smile and say, "You ask Americans to be more royalist than the king, to be more zealous against pagan cruelty than the mission boards." Let me remind you that there was once a mission board in London that derived revenue from the African slave trade.

Cæsar's image and superscription go a long way with a mission board, but when I hear of Christian maidens dishonored, Christian men with their finger nails torn up by torturers, Christian women tormented to make them betray their husbands, I need no cautious clergyman or prudent prelate to tell me what to think or what to say.

The mission boards are made up of earnest, honest, able, learned men, devoted to spreading the gospel. In every board are ardent servants of God who plead with the board to make no bargain with such Japanese officials as are even now forcing morphine on Shantung, and always there is some unpractical zealot, like John Brown, of Ossawatomie, who feels on his own back every lash that tears the flesh of a Christian slave. But boards of directors bank and cool all apostolic fires. Six mission boards, acting through a commission, operate as a freezing mixture on righteous indignation. After ragged martyrs have told their tale, the chilly voice of Mr. Worldly Wiseman advises pliancy and the conciliation of the powers of darkness.

On April 20 a cablegram was sent to Viscount Uchida, minister of foreign affairs. We can infer from the answer that it was "cordial and friendly" and that the commission declared itself "moderate." The commission seems pleased with the answer they received. In that Hara, while acknowledging the obsequious attitude of the commission, coldly threatens that any publicity, any excitement, any denunciation in the press, will "seriously interfere" with his "reforms." In other words, more torture, more massacre, unless you are silent under the whip. What Premier Hara means is: Not one word from you Americans until we have carried out point at Paris and secured a free hand in China. When we Japanese have stamped out Korean Christianity we may later grant you some "reforms."

The Premier Hara who said, in answer to the mission boards, that he was laboring on reforms is the same Hara who, on August 27, 1919, said: "Japan has no ambitious designs against China. The ministry is urgently advocating closer friendly relations. The day will arrive when China will come to comprehend the sincerity of Japan."

Korea and, I hope, some Americans already understand the sincerity of Japan.

On April 20 the "cordial and friendly" telegram was sent to Viscount Uchida, which elicited the information that "Premier Hara is now in the midst of special investigations for the realization of reforms" and his threat.

The Americans and the American press were humble and silent. Let me describe some of the activities of a liberal Japanese premier "in the midst of" plans for "reform."

On April 19, 1919, Mowry, American missionary, innocent of any knowledge of the agitation, was sentenced to six months at hard labor.

On April 24 a missionary writes, "Since the coming in of fresh troops and the inauguration of 'more severe' methods of repression as announced by the Government, increasing numbers of reports come in regarding the violation of women by the soldiers." "The absence of this form of violence in the past" and "the sudden appearance of such reports coincident with the new order"—these things fit together. "The reports * * * come from trustworthy sources. Complaint made to the police in regard to this has been met by beating" (pp. 85, 101).

On April 26 a missionary writes, "The Kwak San Church burned yesterday morning. Atrocious tortures of prisoners in Tyung Ta."

On April 30 a missionary writes that Christian refugees "have no bedding, no clothes. The church at—better not give its name—was burned the other night."

Under date of May 25, 35 days after the "friendly and cordial" message, you will find a tragic report about nine Christian boys who were "beaten." Perhaps, besides being Christians, they had complained to the police about rapes. Let their case tell you what it means to be beaten, and I need not give more examples of Premier Hara's "reforms."

"Eleven Kangkei boys came here from ———. All the 11 were beaten 90 stripes—30 each day for three days, May 16, 17, and 18, and let out May 18. Nine came here May 22, and two more May 24.

"Tak Chank Kuk died about noon, May 23.

"Kim Myungha died this evening.

"Kim Hyungsun is very sick.

"Kim Chungsun and Song Taksam are able to walk, but are badly broken.

"Kim Oosik seemed very doubtful, but afterwards improved.

"Kim Syungha reached here about an hour before his brother died. The first six who came into the hospital were in a dreadful fix, four days after beating. No dressing or anything had been done for them. Dr. Sharrocks just told me that he feels doubtful about some of the others since Myungha died. It is gangrene. One of these boys is a Chun Kyoin, and another is not a Christian, but the rest are all Christians.

"Mr. Lampe has photographs. The stripes were laid on to the buttocks and the flesh pounded into a pulp" (p. 125).

"Ninety strokes of the bamboo flail, 30 each on three successive days, is a frequent penalty."

Observe that after 24 hours the torn victim is given over again to the tormentors, and the flail falls exactly on the gaping wounds of yesterday. Now hear what the servants of hell were doing 80 days after our "cordial" telegram:

"SEOUL, July 9, 1919.—Yesterday we admitted, beaten cases, 15. Dr. Ludlow has been treating cases which have come to us ever since early in March, but these 15 students came straight from the West Gate Prison in Seoul, having received their last 30 blows in the morning. They expect 20 of their comrades to be released to-morrow. These beatings are given either with bamboo rods or rawhide, and the blows are usually delivered on the buttocks.

"We have had cases, however, where the blows extend from the shoulders to the buttocks.

"In some cases the men who do the beating are relieved after each tenth stroke."

I have nothing to say about Korean independence. I wish that in 1917 our President had asked the great powers, then in a frame of mind suited for virtuous resolves, to stipulate that China and Korea should be given such treatment as the American conscience can approve.

I wish our Secretary of State, when the first messenger arrived from Korea, had conveyed to Japan in diplomatic language a statement of views and policy like this:

"I hear that you are stamping out Christianity. That is old stuff and will not go. America maintains that American missionaries can go anywhere in the world and preach their various gospels and set up hospitals and churches and make converts. No man anywhere in the world can interfere with them or their converts. You may threaten that my words will cause fresh sufferings to Korean Christians. Such threats also are old stuff. I require you to admit instantly to Korea commissioners to take account of facts and see that no such threats are carried out.

"You may retort that we have mobs and lynchings in America. That is true, but not in point.

"America is not in form a Christian nation, but to a great extent she is a nation of Christians. Many of these Christians are anxious not to be detected and exposed as hypocrites. If you show the slightest intention of carrying on in any respect a pagan persecution of Christians and Christianity, I shall instantly call on the Governments of England and France to join with me in choking you, and shall ask them at once to lay aside all their crooked bargains with you. If they decline, I shall report your refusal and their refusals to my people and they will be guided in their dealings with other powers by the light that these refusals throw on governments that misrepresent their people."

It is your turn next, America. Japan is moving toward you by way of Korea and Shantung. With northern China enslaved and assimilated, Japan, with her speed and cunning, can smile at your measureless resources. When she chooses to move against you some injudicious economizer will have disarmed you.

No nation can go unarmed while old Pagan gnashes his teeth, particularly when he sits in a high seat of the high council of the league of nations. When she chooses to move against you she will contrive to embroil you in some new European quarrel, and you will have to face Japan and some European power at once. Japan has a right to expect that at the critical moment our rulers will show themselves not infallible.

We can never make a greater blunder than alliance with Japan. We can never make a greater blunder than surrendering China to Japan. We have only one course to follow: Cut loose at once from the league of nations. Demand the withdrawal of America, France, Japan, and England from all illegitimate interference in China. Ask the Japanese afreet to step out of China and confine himself to eastern Siberia.

John Milton lifted up his voice and cried, "Avenge, O Lord, thy slaughtered saints!" The Lord has not avenged them to this day, and the Japanese know it. Milton and Hampden, lovers of God and liberty and honor, could waste their time on such invocations.

Listen to our modern form of prayer: "Lord God of Sabaoth, before whom lie Thy slaughtered saints, Thou dost hear the long agony of tortured Christian women. Grant that there may be on earth the minimum of publicity, and no excitement, and that we may continue in our moderate attitude, and that we may still receive the congratulations of Viscount Uchida on our cordial and friendly spirit.

"Thou knowest, O Lord, that those inquisitors who are paid by Prime Minister Hara commit their deeds of cruelty against his wishes and in violation of his commands.

"Thou knowest, O Lord, that any public criticism will seriously interfere with the realization of the reforms with which Prime Minister Hara has been for some time past most deeply concerned.

"Thou knowest, O Lord, and Prime Minister Hara knows, that during the several months in which he has been most deeply concerned in regard to the introduction of reforms in Korea, bodies of military have been taking more severe measures against Korean Christians which can not be described in church, and that the machinery of the Japanese Government in Korea has been directed to the suppression of all practice and teaching of Christian religion; but Thou knowest how unfaithful human servants are and with what helpless sorrow Prime Minister Hara has observed this disobedience of his orders.

"We pray Thee to open the ears of our people, so that they may aid the Christian powers in extending to China the dominion of Japan and the persecution of the church.

"There now rises to heaven, as the incense of sacrifice, the smell of the burnt flesh of Korean Christians.

"Hasten, therefore, O Lord, the day on which we shall join the league of nations and make firm alliance with the Emperor and the various priesthoods, Buddhist and Shinto, of Japan; and, above all, hasten the day on which the Japanese may enter into undisturbed possession of their promised land, Shantung, so that the smell of the burning flesh of Chinese Christians may float as incense to Thy throne. Amen."

John Bunyan, in the "Pilgrim's Progress," wrote a prophetic description of a Japanese police court and of the trial and execution of Christians in Korea.

"Then were these poor men brought before their examiners again and there charged as being guilty of the late hubbub. So they beat them pitifully and hanged irons upon them * * * for an example and a terror to others, lest any should further speak in their behalf or join themselves unto them. * * * They were brought before their enemies and arraigned. Their indictment was * * * that they were disturbers * * * that they had made commotions and divisions, and had won a party to their own most dangerous opinions in contempt of the law of the Prince.

"Then Faithful began to answer: * * * 'As for disturbance, I make none, being myself a man of peace. The parties that were won to us were won by beholding our truth and innocence, and they are only turned from the worse to the better.'"

Testimony was given against Faithful.

In the course of his defense, Faithful said: "The Prince of this town, and all the rablement of his attendants * * * are more fit for being in hell than in this town and country, and so the Lord have mercy upon me. * * *"

Judgment was given against Faithful.

"Then they scourged him, then they buffeted him, then they lanced his flesh with knives and * * * pricked him with their swords. * * * Thus came Faithful to his end."

"At the end of the Valley of the Shadow of Death," says Bunyan, "lay blood, bones, ashes, and mangled bodies of men. * * * I copied a little before me a cave where the giant Pagan dwelt in olden time, by whose power and tyranny the men whose bones, blood, and ashes lay there were cruelly put to death. * * * I have learned since that Pagan has been dead many a day."

John Bunyan wrote 244 years ago. He thought, in his innocence, that pagan persecution of Christianity was at an end.

I can imagine Uchida and Hara and Hasegawa and Terauchi smiling at this in the library of the Noblemen's Club.

"Old Pagan is dead, is he?" says Terauchi. "We'll show them whether old Pagan is dead or not."

The Japanese Government invites us to enter into a permanent league in the face of George Washington's advice. In that league the fiercest, most ambitious, and most formidable of its controlling members will be a heathen nation, drunk with ambition.

The world was backward enough in 1675, but even then we thought we were beyond pagan persecution. Now the pagans begin again, and we are their obedient acolytes and the familiars of their torture chambers, and we hurry to give them fresh victims.

It is to believe that the powerful priests of the Missionary Cold-Storage Commission say: "Hush; let us be friendly with Old Pagan. Let us act so that he may realize reforms."

I have no prejudice against paganism. I love many pagan temples. Some of the religions of Japan are better than some of the religions that I see about me here. But let us use no tact with torturers. Let us hear of no policy of "cordiality and friendship" with any man in Asia that crucifies a Christian.

The pains and horrors of this persecution came to us here through secret messengers. The telegraph and the wireless were closed by our own associates against the sending of these messages; and then the Government of Japan sends us word that we must not protest or publish. Yes, they threaten us. They say: "For a long time we have been planning reforms, but if you do not shut your mouths we will stop the reforms."

And this is the Government that is to be one of the "big five" who in the league are to dominate our own sublime free Nation.

May my life cease and my hand wither before I consent by any voice or vote, public or private, to any such Japanese dominion.

Mr. NORRIS. The writer of this article is Mr. Newel Martin, of Milford, Conn. Mr. Martin was born in China. His father, Rev. W. A. P. Martin, was president of the Chinese Imperial University and probably the most esteemed and distinguished American resident in China.

Mr. President, no man can read the record, no man can read the evidence, and not reach the conclusion that the signing of this treaty unamended means the driving of the Christian religion out of Asia. It is piled up so high that no disinterested student of the subject can reach any other conclusion.

There is one of the great churches of our country that has a rule which requires every one of its pastors once every year to preach a sermon on the activities of the missionaries in heathen lands and to take up a subscription on that occasion. He can preach as many other sermons as he sees fit, but he is required, under the rules of that great church, to preach at least one in behalf of the missionaries. If we approve this treaty, the church can revoke that rule. If we approve this treaty unamended, we will not need to pass the hat for the missionaries in Asia or to have anybody pray to extend the work of those Christians there. Under articles 10 and 11 of the league of nations it will be the duty of those preachers, instead of preaching for the missionaries of Christ and praying for them, to raise their eyes to heaven and pray, "We thank Thee, O God, for the rule of the Japanese, for the Government of the great Mikado. Give strength, we pray Thee, to the arms of his slaves and soldiers as they strike the dagger to the hearts of Christians, and as they wash their heathen hands in Christian blood give them new courage, O God, to go forth and destroy Christian churches, murder Christian missionaries, ravish Christian women, starve Christian children. Let them go on, O Father, until the teachings of Thy Son, the lowly Nazarene, shall be unknown of man, until all the world shall be under the control of this great heathen nation, Christianity destroyed, and paganism established; and we will ascribe to the great Mikado and his heathen gods all the honor, all the glory, forever and ever. Amen."

That, Mr. President, will be the prayer that our preachers will have to pray. I can not conceive how anyone with a love of Christianity in his soul can ask the Senate to stab the Christian religion to the heart, to destroy it in Asia, and to lift up in its place the reign of heathen paganism.

Mr. President, I am not a member of any church; I am not a member of any religious organization, but my hand shall wither and my lips shall be sealed in eternal silence before I will ever give my official approval to any act that will stamp out the religion of Jesus Christ and establish paganism in its stead. I hope that we can meet every question that comes before us and decide it on the proposition of whether it is right or wrong. If it is right, then let us approve it. If it is wrong, let us turn it down; and let us have the courage to do it regardless of what the consequences may be.

I hope that I may be given the humble privilege of being classed as one of the followers of the religion proclaimed by Abou Ben Adhem. Old Ben Adhem was awakened in the night by an angel. The angel was writing in a Book. Ben Adhem asked him what he was doing, and the angel said, "I am writing the names of those who love the Lord." Ben Adhem asked, "Is my name written there?" and the angel said, "No." Then Ben Adhem said, "I pray you write my name as one who loves his fellow man." The angel wrote and vanished and the next night Ben Adhem was wakened again from his slumber. The same angel appeared and he bore in his hand a scroll, upon which was written in letters of flaming fire the names of those who loved the Lord, and, behold, Ben Adhem's name led all the rest.

Mr. President, we must not take this step against what has been the civilizing influence and the advancement of our race from the beginning of the Christian era. We should not now give approval to this damnable instrument that strikes the worst dagger into the heart not only of Christianity but of civilization—we must not; we can not. We must not forget now that we fought this war not to enslave nations but to free them. Let us remember that we went forth before the people and that on every rostrum and on every stump we said we were fighting for a world democracy: we were going to abolish secret treaties; we were going to establish self-determination; we were going to advance civilization. Here we come now to a step, Mr. President, that if we take it will put the clock of civilization back a thousand years. We can not kill the spirit of freedom or religious liberty, even if we say in our might and in our power that we will, because under God's law paganism in the end must go down. The Christian religion will live, it will thrive, and the world will go forward. This treaty, unamended, will hold it back, will retard progress. It is a crime against humanity, a dishonor to our Nation. In the name of every American boy who breathed out his life's blood in fertilizing the soil of France I ask that this amendment to the treaty be made, and if the treaty is unamended that it be condemned out of honor to the memory of the men who have given their lives for a cause that we have all said was the cause of freedom, of liberty, of Christianity, and of an advancing civilization.

EXECUTIVE SESSION WITH CLOSED DOORS.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business with closed doors.

The motion was agreed to, and the doors were closed. After five minutes the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate, as in open legislative session, adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, October 14, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

With all reverence and gratitude welling up in our hearts, our Father in Heaven, for the blessings of the past vouchsafed unto us, we most earnestly pray that Thou wilt continue Thy blessings upon us, since nothing is strong, or great, or enduring, but has its origin in Thee.

Every sentence written, every score of music, every picture painted, every thought or deed which lives, is inspired of Thee.

Guide we beseech Thee our statesmen in all their deliberations, to deeds which shall live and glorify our Republic and all its people. In Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted as follows:

To Mr. TINCHER, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi, indefinitely, on account of illness in family.

To Mr. OVERSTREET, for 10 days, on account of business.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—JAMES D. SALTS AGAINST SAMUEL C. MAJOR (H. DOC. NO. 265).

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Clerk of the House of Representatives, transmitting testimony, papers, and documents relating to the contested-election case in the seventh Missouri district, which was referred to the Committee on Elections No. 1 and ordered to be printed.

PUNISHING TRANSPORTATION OF STOLEN MOTOR VEHICLES.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to move to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 9203, which has passed the Senate with two very unimportant amendments. I have conferred with the Committee on the Judiciary and members of the committee, and I desire to call it up and move that the amendments be agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman calls up the bill, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9203) to punish the transportation of stolen motor vehicles in interstate or foreign commerce.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. I will yield.

Mr. WALSH. I was just going to ask to have the language stricken out in the latter amendment read. Perhaps the gentleman can state what would be the effect.

Mr. DYER. The first amendment strikes out, as reported by the Clerk, "with intent to deprive the owner of the possession thereof," because in the same paragraph it says they are not punishable unless they know the same to have been stolen. It is really a repetition and duplication and it is unnecessary. The second amendment is simply a matter of providing that where action has been taken and brought in a State court it shall bar prosecution in a Federal court. The Senate states that it is unnecessary under the practice, because where a case has been tried upon the merits it is a bar to further prosecution in a criminal case and it is not necessary. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

Mr. GARD. All I wanted the gentleman to do was to state the effect of the second amendment. The first amendment striking out language is apparent because one can understand that, but the second amendment strikes out language which the House adopted about a conviction in a State or District of Columbia or Territory being a bar to prosecution under the Federal act.

Mr. DYER. That is language the Senate has stricken out.

Mr. GARD. If the House agrees to the language stricken out by the Senate, is there any protective measure for such language remaining in the bill?

Mr. DYER. As I understand it, Mr. Speaker, the Senate claims, and they inform me, that this language is unnecessary, because where a man has been tried upon the merits in a criminal matter and the case has been disposed of, it is a bar anyway to further prosecution; that it only may complicate matters and interfere with the administration of the act.

Mr. GARD. Has the bill as amended by the Senate been brought to the attention of the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. DYER. I have taken it up with the chairman and most of the members of the committee whom I have been able to see.

Mr. GARD. But not the committee sitting as a committee?

Mr. DYER. No; it has not been referred to the committee. The bill has been on the Speaker's table.

Mr. GARD. What is the attitude of the chairman of the committee upon the matter?

Mr. DYER. The chairman of the committee says that both of these amendments ought to be agreed to.

Mr. GARD. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendments.

The question was taken, and the Senate amendments were concurred in.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey asks permission to speak for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. On what subject is the gentleman going to talk?

Mr. LEHLBACH. On Saturday the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] in effect charged me with making untrue statements on the floor in relation to the postmastership situation——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Could not the gentleman wait until the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] is here?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I was not present when the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] made his statement, and that fact was called to his attention by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL].

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I think it would be better to have both of you here at once and get this thing settled somehow, so I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BUSINESS.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee on the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of bills on the District Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for consideration of District of Columbia business.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, and pending that I would like to see if we can agree upon general debate. I suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] that we have one hour's general debate, one-half of that time to be controlled by the gentleman from Kentucky and one-half by myself.

Mr. WALSH. For all bills?

Mr. MAPES. For the two bills.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Does the gentleman mean that debate be limited to the bills?

Mr. MAPES. And that the debate be limited to the bills.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do not object to that.

Mr. WALSH. Oh, well; that is too short.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to one hour, one-half to be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] and that the debate be confined to the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object——

SWEARING IN OF A MEMBER—L. B. RAINEY.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object, for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Michigan a question. The Representative elect from the seventh district of Alabama is present. His credentials, which are in proper form, have been shown to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], and he desires to be sworn in at this time. Will the gentleman withhold his motion until that can be done?

Mr. MAPES. I will.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, the Representative elect from the seventh congressional district of Alabama, the Hon. L. B. RAINEY, has presented his credentials. He is present and desires to take the oath of office as a Member of this body. [Applause.]

Mr. L. B. RAINEY appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office administered by the Speaker.

DISTRICT BUSINESS.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman from Michigan a question? Does the one hour proposed for debate apply to only one bill or several bills which the District Committee may take up?

Mr. MAPES. All bills to be considered to-day.

Mr. BLANTON. One hour of debate on all of the bills to be considered to-day? How many bills will be considered?

Mr. MAPES. It is pretty hard to tell; two or three, if we can reach them.

Mr. BLANTON. Would the gentleman mind stating the nature of the bills that might be considered, and upon which general debate is limited to one hour?

Mr. MAPES. One is the policemen's salary bill; one is a bill revising the weights and measures law for the District of Columbia, and one is a bill relating to the Washington Market Co.'s charter.

Mr. BLANTON. May I ask the gentleman whether or not the police bill which will be considered has in it a provision that will prevent the affiliation with a union that affiliates with any other union?

Mr. MAPES. There is a section which deals with that subject, as the gentleman will see.

Mr. BLANTON. There is a section of the bill which takes care of that situation?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I understood I was recognized. Reserving the right to object, I desire to inquire which bill the gentleman intends to take up first?

Mr. MAPES. The police salary bill.

Mr. GARD. I do not desire to object to any plan that is convenient to the members of the committee, but how much time is to be allowed upon the police bill, for instance, for debate?

Mr. MAPES. I have very little request for time. Of course, we would like to proceed with the business of the House as fast as we can.

Mr. GARD. What other bill is there? The standard-measure bill?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. GARD. Is there anything else?

Mr. MAPES. There is the Washington Market Co. bill, if it is possible to reach it.

Mr. GARD. Does the gentleman think that the general debate of 1 hour, 30 minutes on a side, is sufficient for those three bills?

Mr. MAPES. There is no request for time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, further, I want to ask the gentleman whether he has heard of any opposition to the police bill, or the particular provision to which he refers?

Mr. MAPES. I have not.

Mr. BLANTON. He has heard of no opposition?

Mr. MAPES. I have not.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I think this is one of the most important measures that has come before Congress, and therefore I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. GOODALL. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BLANTON. I withdraw the objection for the present.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—TAGUE AGAINST FITZGERALD.

Mr. GOODALL, from the Committee on Elections No. 2, submitted the majority report and the minority views on the contested-election case of Peter F. Tague against John F. Fitzgerald, tenth congressional district of Massachusetts, for printing under the rules.

DISTRICT BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of business on the District Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. TREADWAY in the chair.

METROPOLITAN POLICE.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill (H. R. 9821) to amend an act entitled "An act relating to the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia," approved February 28, 1901, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan calls up the bill H. R. 9821, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. I think the bill should be read. It is a short one. I request that it be read for information.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9821) to amend an act entitled "An act relating to the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia," approved February 28, 1901, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That paragraph 8 of section 1 of the act entitled "An act relating to the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia," approved February 28, 1901, as amended by the act approved June 8, 1906, entitled "An act to amend section 1 of an act entitled 'An act relating to the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia,' approved February 28, 1901," is hereby amended to read as follows:

"PAR. 8. That the basic salaries of the officers and members of the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia, herein provided, shall commence August 1, 1919, and shall continue thereafter annually, unless changed by Congress, as follows: The major and superintendent shall receive an annual salary of $4,500; the assistant superintendents shall each receive an annual salary of $3,000; inspectors shall each receive an annual salary of $2,400; police surgeons shall each receive an annual salary of $1,400; captains shall each receive an annual salary of $2,300; lieutenants shall each receive an annual salary of $2,000; sergeants shall each receive an annual salary of $1,800; privates of class 3 shall each receive an annual salary of $1,660; privates of class 2 shall each receive an annual salary of $1,560; privates of class 1 shall each receive an annual salary of $1,460: Provided, That privates of class 1 shall serve one year on probation, privates of class 2 shall serve two years subsequent to service in class 1, and privates of class 3 shall include all those privates who have served efficiently three or more years; members of said police force who may be mounted on horses, furnished and maintained by themselves, shall each receive an extra compensation of $480 per annum; and members of the said force who may be mounted on motor vehicles, furnished and maintained by themselves, shall each receive an extra compensation of $480 per annum; and members of the said force who may be mounted on bicycles shall each receive an extra compensation of $60 per annum: Provided further, That patrol drivers of the Metropolitan police are hereby declared to be members of the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia, but shall not be rated above class 2 privates, and those patrol drivers who have been appointed since April 6, 1917, shall be required to pass the usual physical and other tests required for members of the regular force."

SEC. 2. That no member of the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia shall be or become a member of any organization, or of an organization affiliated with another organization, which holds, claims, or exercises the right to demand of any of its membership obedience to an order to strike or cease work for any cause. Upon sufficient proof to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia that any member of the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia has violated the provisions of this section, it shall be the duty of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to immediately discharge such member from the service.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, the greater part of the work on this bill was done by the subcommittee of the Committee on the District of Columbia, of which the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULD] is the chairman. I yield to the gentleman from New York 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. GOULD. Mr. Chairman, there has been in the city of Washington a high increase in the cost of living. In July of this year the Commissioners of the District of Columbia decided that the police department was not receiving adequate pay in order to enable the commissioners to secure the class of men which the police department should have and also to maintain its personnel. A bill was introduced by the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia at the request of the commissioners, the bill H. R. 7983, and in order to make inquiry into the question hearings were held. At a subsequent date it was decided that a subcommittee had better give it some further attention, and I may say to the Members of the House that the hearings as the result of the points raised relative to the conditions under which the policemen work and live and endeavor to support their families were fully investigated. The committee also conferred with the congressional committee which had charge of the reclassification of Federal employees, and considerable information was secured relative to the salaries which are paid in other cities of the country. Finally, after going through the whole question, it was decided, on the report of the subcommittee to the full Committee on the District of Columbia, to incorporate its recommendations to the House in a new bill, which was introduced on October 9, the bill H. R. 9821, and that is the bill under consideration to-day.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOULD. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. How many members are there on the police force now?

Mr. GOULD. The list is in the report. There are about 800 privates.

Mr. MADDEN. Does this increase the number?

Mr. GOULD. No, sir.

Mr. MADDEN. Are there still two superintendents in the police department?

Mr. GOULD. There are two assistant superintendents.

Mr. MADDEN. Have they been there all the time?

Mr. GOULD. The second was authorized in the District appropriation bill passed at this Congress.

Mr. MADDEN. In the great cities of the United States having three or four millions of people they have only one assistant superintendent.

Mr. GOULD. That was handled by the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations having charge of the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

Mr. MADDEN. I think it is absurd to have two assistant superintendents in a city like this. There is one commanding officer for every eight men.

Mr. GOULD. The matter of the assistant superintendents was incorporated in the appropriation bill approved July 11, 1919.

Mr. MADDEN. While we might need more men—privates—it seems to me the law proposed and as it exists gives a great many more commanding officers than there is any need for.

Mr. GOULD. That question was not considered fully by our committee. Our committee took the recommendation of the commissioners, as to what was necessary to give us an efficient police force in the District of Columbia.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman think that the best way to get an efficient police force in the District of Columbia is to have all the men at the top and none at the bottom?

Mr. GOULD. No, sir.

Mr. MADDEN. Then in that respect the recommendation of the commissioners would not seem to be very wise.

Mr. GOULD. That is up to the judgment of the House.

Mr. MADDEN. I realize that; but I thought, perhaps, the committee would have given some consideration to the proprieties of the situation, and that they would have put on patrolmen instead of commanding officers.

Mr. GOULD. We were assured that everybody does a full day's work, and that many of them are working extra hours.

Mr. MADDEN. The question is whether we have not a good many more commanding officers than we should have in proportion to the number of men employed.

Mr. GOULD. Well, that may be. The gentleman from Illinois ought to introduce a resolution calling for an investigation of these various points, where the matter could be decided.

Mr. MADDEN. I think that the committee having that matter under consideration would be the best qualified to deal with that.

Mr. GOULD. The committee was asked to take up the question of salaries, and was not asked whether the police force was sufficient.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOULD. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. May I ask the gentleman how long the District has had two assistant superintendents? How long have they had these? Or is this an innovation in the bill?

Mr. GOULD. It was carried on the appropriation bill. The statute up to this time has not provided for it.

Mr. RAMSEYER. So that under the statute only one is provided for?

Mr. GOULD. Yes; and the second was put on, subject to a point of order, in the appropriation bill.

Mr. RAMSEYER. In the bill now you provide for two assistants. If your bill passes, future appropriation bills providing for the pay of two assistants would not then be subject to a point of order?

Mr. GOULD. No.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOULD. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. Do I understand that this is now a three-platoon proposition—an eight-hour day shift for policemen?

Mr. GOULD. Yes, sir.

Mr. SNYDER. And are the salaries mentioned here fixed plus a bonus?

Mr. GOULD. Yes, sir.

Mr. SNYDER. So that a private of the first class instead of receiving $1,460 will actually receive $1,700?

Mr. GOULD. Yes, sir.

Mr. SNYDER. That, of course, applies to all up to $2,500?

Mr. GOULD. Yes, sir.

I might further say that the duty of the police requires seven days' service per week, with 22 days' leave per year, and that, based on an investigation in the conditions in the District of Columbia, led the committee to decide unanimously that the salaries as specified are not any more than adequate. I would bring to the attention of the House the fact that these are basic salaries, and that under the present law any man receiving $2,500 a year or less would be entitled to the bonus of $240 for this fiscal year.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOULD. I will.

Mr. GARD. What is the entire personnel? What is the number of the police employed here?

Mr. MADDEN. About 900.

Mr. GOULD. The committee embodied that in the report. It is about 903 as a total.

Mr. GARD. I note in the report that in New York City, which, of course, is a city hardly comparable with the city of Washington in police business, the highest paid private—and I am talking about privates under the police force—does not get as much as the lowest paid private in the District of Columbia with the bonus that we are adding of $240 a year.

Mr. GOULD. The gentleman is probably not informed that the board of estimates of New York City to-day has practically decided, according to information that we have received, to recommend an increase of $250 per year to all of their patrolmen, which would bring it practically to the same basis as we have provided here for the Washington police.

Mr. GARD. You want to put the Washington force on the same basis as the New York City force?

Mr. GOULD. Yes.

Mr. GARD. How about cities that are comparable with Washington, cities like Richmond, Va., Baltimore, Md., and cities of about 400,000? I saw the statement published in a paper the other day that the population of Washington was about 400,000, including whites.

Mr. BENSON. Will the gentleman allow me to answer for Baltimore?

Mr. GOULD. I think the gentleman from Ohio will find that as far as the cost of living is concerned, Washington is almost in a class by itself as compared with Richmond or Baltimore.

Mr. GARD. I agree that Washington is in a class by itself as far as the high cost of living is concerned, but are we to make a permanent increase based upon what we all know to be the inordinate demands of almost everybody connected with living in the city of Washington?

Mr. GOULD. The records of the committee and also the information given us by the commissioners lead us to the opinion that in order to procure in Washington the grade of men of which our police force should be composed the salaries must be as much as those recommended to the House by the committee.

Mr. GARD. I am thoroughly in accordance with the idea of paying these men an adequate salary so as to obtain good policemen. From what sources are the new officers recruited?

Mr. GOULD. Quite a few of them are discharged soldiers and other men are drifting in from other cities.

Mr. GARD. Drifting in?

Mr. GOULD. They hear of the life in Washington and want to come here and watch the National Legislature.

Mr. GARD. And as soon as they get here do they get on the police force?

Mr. GOULD. The requirements for the police force are very strict and they are required to pass a very severe examination, both physically and every other way.

Mr. GARD. I may cite the gentleman to an illustration of the kind of men we are getting. I live within two squares of Calvert Street. On my way home a few nights ago I saw a policeman under a tree trying to keep dry. The rain was falling. He asked me where Calvert Street was; said he had to go there, and wondered how he was going to get there.

Mr. GOULD. I think that ought to be reported to the superintendent of police. It was the gentleman's duty to report it.

Mr. GARD. I did not wish to report the matter. I am simply showing the gentleman what sometimes occurs when men from other cities are appointed on the police force. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman, What is carried in this bill about the woman's bureau?

Mr. GOULD. Nothing.

Mr. GARD. Is there any increase in the woman's bureau, or any provision for the employment of women as policewomen?

Mr. GOULD. No, sir.

Mr. GARD. What is it intended to do as to the employment of policewomen?

Mr. GOULD. We leave that in the discretion of the Commissioners of the District, as it has been handled in the past.

Mr. GARD. Can the gentleman advise the House what has been the recent provision for that?

Mr. GOULD. There has been a decision to the effect that the basic law does not specify as to whether a member of the force shall be a male or a female, and the District Commissioners and the superintendent of police decided that inasmuch as the act does not mention it, they were therefore empowered to employ policewomen if they so desired.

Mr. GARD. The report states that one of the commissioners seemed to think that the bureau of policewomen should be increased, for the protection of young girls in the city of Washington, and that for a time at least the committee acquiesced in this belief and thought that there should be an increase. The gentleman now states that there is to be no increase.

Mr. GOULD. The gentleman does not state any such thing. The gentleman states that the matter is up to the discretion of the commissioners and of the superintendent of police, and I have no doubt that if they desire to put in 40 or 50 additional policewomen, they will go ahead and do it under the act as it now exists on the statute book.

Mr. GARD. If they do, what is the compensation of the policewomen?

Mr. GOULD. The policewomen start as privates. The head of the policewomen's bureau serves as a detective sergeant.

Mr. GARD. And the pay is the same as that of a male sergeant?

Mr. GOULD. Yes.

Mr. GARD. Or of the class to which they belong?

Mr. GOULD. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOULD. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MAPES. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more?

Mr. SNYDER. Of course, this increase of salary is a very large increase?

Mr. GOULD. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. And it will establish a precedent practically throughout the United States that will probably lead to many increases in salaries for policemen and possibly for firemen throughout the United States. I do not want to make a speech in the gentleman's time, but I think this is important. Recently there was a dispute with the policemen in the city here as to whether or not they should be permitted to continue as members of the American Federation of Labor. Now, I want to know, and I think the public would like to know, how much bearing that particular issue had on these raises of salary?

Mr. GOULD. As to whether or not the commissioners were moved in that direction I do not know, and whether or not the requests of the District Commissioners were framed on any considerations of that kind I do not know; but I can say without reservation that the salaries recommended by the committee have not been influenced by the policemen's union.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOULD. I will.

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman is willing to state that this action was not hastened by reason of any difficulty that has been going on between the police department and the commissioners?

Mr. GOULD. The action of the committee was not hastened in any way by the action of the alleged police union.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOULD. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. I understand the purpose of section 2 is to prevent the Metropolitan police of Washington from affiliating with organizations like the American Federation of Labor.

Mr. GOULD. And similar organizations.

Mr. BLACK. The provision of section 2 is that they shall not affiliate with organizations who claim the right to demand a strike. It is my understanding that the American Federation of Labor has always claimed that it had no right or authority to call out any man in any industry to a strike or to send him back to a strike if he is striking. In other words, that they have nothing to do with strikes. Therefore, as I understand it, this provision would not prevent the Metropolitan police from affiliating with the American Federation of Labor.

Mr. GOULD. I am not informed on that point; but I would be inclined to say that, basing my opinion on the action that has been taken recently by the American Federation of Labor, this section would apply. I am not a lawyer and would not consider myself entirely competent in that regard.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOULD. Yes.

Mr. BEE. By what authority are the policemen appointed, and who controls them?

Mr. GOULD. The superintendent of police makes the recommendation and the commissioners make the appointment.

Mr. BEE. Is there an examination prescribed by the superintendent and commissioners?

Mr. GOULD. There is a civil-service examination and a physical examination.

Mr. BEE. Who has the right to discharge policemen?

Mr. GOULD. The commissioners are the final authority of discharge.

Mr. BEE. Is there a provision in the law of the District of Columbia in reference to the trial of a policeman before he can be discharged?

Mr. GOULD. Yes.

Mr. BEE. Is there any provision for a summary discharge without a hearing?

Mr. GOULD. There is not.

Mr. BEE. Is there a limit of time as to when the hearing shall be had after the complaint is filed?

Mr. GOULD. I can not tell the gentleman.

Mr. BEE. In the question of demotion, is that authority vested in the commissioners or the chief of police to demote a man without a trial?

Mr. GOULD. I imagine that that could be done by a transfer for the good of the service.

Mr. BEE. Either demotion or suspension without a trial?

Mr. GOULD. Yes.

Mr. BEE. But to discharge a man there must be a trial?

Mr. GOULD. Yes.

Mr. BEE. Is there a provision that only residents of the District can be appointed on the police force?

Mr. GOULD. I do not think there is.

Mr. BEE. A man from outside can come in any day and be examined and be appointed?

Mr. GOULD. Yes.

Mr. CARSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOULD. Yes.

Mr. CARSS. Does the provision in section 2 prevent the Metropolitan police in the District of Columbia from forming an organization for the purpose of collective bargaining?

Mr. GOULD. I should not think it would; no, sir.

Mr. CARSS. Provided they do not affiliate with outside organizations. The gentleman understands that that would not be a bar?

Mr. GOULD. At this time I wish to direct the attention of this House earnestly and seriously to a condition which threatens the deepest roots not only of our national American institutions but of our homes, our families, our lives, and the very structure of our civilization. And I wish in so doing to discuss a section of this bill, which strikes directly and tellingly at one of the most advanced and sinister phases of this menace, that phase which seeks to turn our police forces from their paths as pledged and trusted guardians of society into the paths of desertion and traitorous alliance with a movement one of whose fundamental principles involves repudiation of government by law and order.

Section 2 of this bill reads:

SEC. 2. That no member of the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia shall be or become a member of any organization, or of an organization affiliated with another organization, which holds, claims, or exercises the right to demand of any of its membership obedience to an order to strike or cease work for any cause. Upon sufficient proof to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia that any member of the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia has violated the provisions of this section, it shall be the duty of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to immediately discharge such member from the service.

That section had a twofold aim, an immediate local application to the District's police force, and a national application, a note of warning and advice from the Congress of the United States to State and municipal officers throughout the country who are faced with a similar menace and may not, perhaps, appreciate it at this time.

As it applies to the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia, section 2 seeks to keep members of the force, still as the trustworthy guardians of organized, God-fearing society, to prevent them from becoming unwittingly involved and engulfed in a movement which would seek ultimately to turn them from faithful protectors to dangerous assailants of civilized society.

That movement is called "syndicalism." Its leaders boast that—

Syndicalism has placed the anarchistic movement upon a practical, effective basis—and that the syndicalist—

is a radical opponent of "law and order."

Do you know what the movement to unionize the police of this country means when translated into terms of syndicalism? Let me quote you a brief passage from an authority on the subject, Mr. William Z. Foster, who, having written as a syndicalist, that "that natural course of evolution for a labor movement * * * is gradually from the conservative to the revolutionary" has become a leading figure in the American Federation of Labor:

They—

syndicalists in every country—

are teaching working-class soldiers * * * to shoot their own officers and to desert the Army when the crucial moment arrives.

The policeman, Mr. Chairman, is the doughboy of peace, the "working-class soldier" of law and order arrayed against the constant attack of criminal classes and lawless movements of unrest and malcontent. He has no more right to desert when his "crucial moment arrives" than has the khaki-clad soldier to abandon his arms on the eve of battle.

"Soldier" and "policeman" are but classifying terms; both designate public servants, warriors for and defenders of the laws and institutions of their country; both fight under one flag. The soldier protects from aggression from without; the policeman from aggression from within. The battle of the policeman is the harder and the more vital, because it is never ending, his enemies are never still, his campaign knows neither truce nor armistice, neither final victory, nor, so far in this country, thank God, final defeat. And the more constant the success of the policeman in keeping strong and firm our national institutions of democratic government, the less frequently is the soldier called upon for the bloody and costly battle against aggression from outside our borders.

The soldier in his infrequent campaigns deals with a foe, as a rule, who recognizes much the same laws of humanity as he does himself, an organization serving some national government. In dealing with criminal classes the policeman guards society against a body lost to the rules of honor, feeling neither pity for the weak nor respect for the strong.

In which case, then, think you, Mr. Chairman, is desertion "when the crucial moment arrives" more awful to contemplate? In which case—soldier desertion or police desertion—are our national destinies, our constitutional institutions, our very homes and families more terribly menaced?

Gentlemen, I am raising no straw man for the purpose of knocking him down. Let me read one more brief quotation from Foster's red-bound book on "Syndicalism," so ably and adequately exposed here recently by my distinguished and courageous colleague from Ohio, Mr. COOPER, before I seek to point out the present existence of this menace.

"To revolutionize the American labor movement," wrote Syndicalist Foster, as a prophesy of what Labor Unionist Foster would essay, "syndicalists must follow the course taken by successful syndicalists the world over, viz, develop the existing unions and organize unions for these workers for whom at present none exist. The natural course of evolution for a labor movement, even as for individual workers, is gradually from the conservative to the revolutionary. * * * By actively participating in the labor movement they (the syndicalists) can greatly hasten this evolution. They can best make their influence felt upon the labor movement through the medium of the organized militant minority." The italics are my own.

Now, then, what is the practical application of all this to our present-day problems? Gentlemen, the application is luminously clear and terrifyingly present. The syndicalist program for the overthrow of our democratic form of government by revolution involves two principal divisions:

Part 1: Prostituting the American Federation of Labor, Mr. Foster's "militant minority," into a syndicalist revolutionary movement and utilizing its machinery to involve unorganized labor, Mr. Foster's "vast majority," in the same movement.

Part 2: Organizing the police of the country and affiliating them with Mr. Foster's "militant minority" so that when "the crucial moment of revolution" arrives these "working-class soldiers" will be so ensnared and enmeshed in the anarchistic toils that they will be useless as protectors of law and order.

The working out of this program is well under way, both as to parts 1 and 2. It is strong and growing, and will reach for success unless the American spirit awakes in its might and crushes it with relentless heel.

Already, as you know, the author of "Syndicalism" has donned the sheep's clothing, entered the ranks, and become a member of his "militant minority" and as an authorized agent of the American Federation of Labor has brought on an upheaval among ignorant aliens in the steel industry which has seriously affected the industrial life of the country and has required the presence of United States troops in some sections to preserve constitutional guaranties. For the third time since January, without warning and in violations of agreements, people of the great city of New York and the traveling public are flouted and threatened with starvation by strikers in the marine departments of the United States Railroad Administration—a strike against the Government of the United States. Also, in violation of previous agreements, the head of an organization of 225,000 coal miners announced in Philadelphia Saturday his intention of calling a general strike on November 1 because of failure to obtain demands for a 60 per cent increase in wages, a 30-hour working week, and additional concessions. The threat comes hand in hand with winter's icy blasts to chill the body and soul of the general public. Throughout the Nation the conservative American voices in the American Federation of Labor are being hushed or thrust aside by the radical encroachments of syndicalist "educators." So much for progress in carrying out the first part of the program of revolution.

Now, to provide immunity for the "revolution" when the "crucial moment" may arrive to organize the "working-class soldier," the policeman of the city, and gradually taint him with syndicalism.

Do you know, or have you pondered the fact that police unions have been formed and affiliated with the American Federation of Labor in 37 cities of the United States, involving a total population of about 4,344,000, in 22 of our 48 States? In two of these instances the movement has failed—in Boston, after bloodshed and riot, and in Washington, because the Congress of the United States is still great enough, even in the view of radical agitators, to resist such an attack upon American institutions.

These cities, listed by the American Federation of Labor at its headquarters in this city, are as follows: Oklahoma City, Okla.; Knoxville, Tenn.; Peoria, Ill.; Washington, D. C.; Jersey City, N. J.; Macon, Ga.; Cumberland, Md.; Tulsa, Okla.; Fort Worth, Tex.; East St. Louis, Ill.; Norfolk, Va.; Pueblo, Colo.; Boston, Mass.; Warren, Ohio; Clarksburg, W. Va.; Portland, Oreg.; St. Paul, Minn.; Meridian, Miss.; Evansville, Ind.; Terre Haute, Ind.; Moberly, Mo.; Los Angeles, Calif.; Wheeling, W. Va.; Chattanooga, Tenn.; Hattiesburg, Miss.; Miami, Fla.; Superior, Wis.; Huntington, W. Va.; Portsmouth, Va.; Richmond, Calif.; Key West, Fla.; Zanesville, Ohio; St. Joseph, Mo.; Lynn, Mass.; Vicksburg, Miss.; Belleville, Ill.; Topeka, Kans.

Boston and Massachusetts met the issue with an unadulterated Americanism which did credit to their heroic sires of Lexington, Concord, and Bunker Hill. And the spirit of America in all parts of the country rose as from one sound, clean heart to cry shame on the deserting, striking policemen of Boston, and to acclaim, as with one voice, the courageous State and municipal officials who refused to make compromise with treason.

Boston and Massachusetts have struck the first telling blow against this Russianized program of syndicalist revolution, and the country has applauded to the echo. You gentlemen, like myself, must enter the lists in the second test of strength between the American Government and anarchy. Section 2 of this bill furnishes you with a weapon and a duty you can not evade, and which, as Americans, you must not repudiate. The policemen of Washington have proven that the threat of strike and desertion is not necessary to obtain justice and fair treatment for the servants of the people; and to their great credit be it said that they have evidenced their acceptance by voluntarily relinquishing their charter in the American Federation of Labor. But if they were misled once, may they not be misled again, unless the elements with allegiance divided between their organization and that of the American Federation be forced to come out in the open and confine their allegiance to one organization or another? That is all this section seeks to accomplish in so far as the Metropolitan police force is concerned.

But your responsibility as the aldermen of Washington is unimportant as compared with your responsibilities as Members of the Congress of the United States. And as Members of the Congress of the United States, faced at once with this grave menace against the Government of which you are a part and which you are sworn to uphold and with an opportunity to strike a telling blow against our common enemy, dare you withhold that blow?

This bill, through section 2, announces to the country which looks to the Congress of the United States for aid and guidance that the American Government recognizes no distinction between doughboy kakhi and police blue in the performance of duty by public servants; that the right of the people of the United States to protection of their lives and property from lawless aggression is greater than the right of any individual to traitorous idleness; and that the policeman who leaves his post and exposes the community he is sworn to protect to the anarchistic aggression of criminal hordes is on all fours with the soldier who deliberately abandons his post under fire for the purpose of aiding the enemy.

Is there anything in that message that you, as Americans and as members of the American Government, can not subscribe to? If there is, you can not vote for this bill in its present form. This bill merely gives legislative expression to the stirring platform of Gov. Calvin Coolidge, of Massachusetts, during the recent desertion of Boston policemen:

There is no right to strike against the public safety by anybody, anywhere, any time.

Mr. MAPES. Does the gentleman from Kentucky want to use any of his time now?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Under the suggestion that was made, I prefer to reserve my time until some other bill is up. I have had no requests for time on this bill.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That paragraph 8, of section 1, of the act entitled "An act relating to the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia," approved February 28, 1901, as amended by the act approved June 8, 1906, entitled "An act to amend section 1 of an act entitled 'An act relating to the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia,' approved February 28, 1901," is hereby amended to read as follows:

"PAR. 8. That the basic salaries of the officers and members of the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia, herein provided, shall commence August 1, 1919, and shall continue thereafter annually, unless changed by Congress, as follows: The major and superintendent shall receive an annual salary of $4,500; the assistant superintendents shall each receive an annual salary of $3,000; inspectors shall each receive an annual salary of $2,400; police surgeons shall each receive an annual salary of $1,400; captains shall each receive an annual salary of $2,300; lieutenants shall each receive an annual salary of $2,000; sergeants shall each receive an annual salary of $1,800; privates of class 3 shall each receive an annual salary of $1,660; privates of class 2 shall each receive an annual salary of $1,560; privates of class 1 shall each receive an annual salary of $1,460: Provided, That privates of class 1 shall serve one year on probation, privates of class 2 shall serve two years subsequent to service in class 1, and privates of class 3 shall include all those privates who have served efficiently three or more years; members of said police force who may be mounted on horses furnished and maintained by themselves shall each receive an extra compensation of $480 per annum; and members of the said force who may be mounted on motor vehicles furnished and maintained by themselves shall each receive an extra compensation of $480 per annum; and members of the said force who may be mounted on bicycles shall each receive an extra compensation of $60 per annum: Provided further, That patrol drivers of the Metropolitan police are hereby declared to be members of the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia, but shall not be rated above class 2 privates, and those patrol drivers who have been appointed since April 6, 1917, shall be required to pass the usual physical and other tests required for members of the regular force."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend on page 2, line 4, by striking out the word "superintendents" and inserting the word "superintendent"; and in line 5, strike out the word "each."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 4, strike out the word "superintendents" and insert the word "superintendent"; and in line 5, strike out the word "each."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I think the time has come when we ought to take into consideration the propriety of having a police force that is top-heavy in the District of Columbia. If there is anything the trouble with the police force here it is that it is top-heavy. We have a superintendent, we have 2 assistant superintendents, we have 3 inspectors, 12 captains, 4 police surgeons, 21 lieutenants, and 56 sergeants, while we have only 800 men. As a matter of fact, we have one commanding officer for every eight men. It is no wonder that the police department in the District of Columbia does not function. In the first place, we have a man at the top who ought not to be superintendent of police. He knows nothing about the conduct of a police force, and he does not function. I suppose we ought not to be surprised, in view of that fact, that we have to have two assistant superintendents. In the great city of Chicago, with 3,000,000 people, we have only one assistant superintendent. That seems to be enough, and we have about 4,500 men. Yet we have here two assistant superintendents.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The gentleman speaks about the police system being top-heavy. Is it top-heavy only in that it has one assistant superintendent too much?

Mr. MADDEN. It is top-heavy in that it has a hundred commanding officers and only 800 men.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Would the gentleman cut some of the lieutenants and the sergeants also?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know enough about the functions they perform to justify myself in offering an amendment to the bill in that respect, but I do know definitely and positively that there should not be two assistant superintendents.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BEE. I know nothing about this matter except as the bill reads, but is not the duty of the assistant superintendents one a day shift and the other a night shift?

Mr. MADDEN. What are the inspectors for?

Mr. BEE. Would the gentleman not have a superintendent there in full authority at night and one in the daytime?

Mr. MADDEN. They have their inspectors, who have complete authority over the territory. They have a certain number of stations under each inspector, and he is the superintendent of police to all practical purposes. That is true everywhere, and why should it not be true here? What is the superintendent of police doing?

Mr. BEE. Why not do away with the assistant superintendents altogether?

Mr. MADDEN. That is what we should do, although one assistant superintendent might be necessary—certainly not two. The bill provides, if I may be permitted to go outside of the amendment which I have offered, for the payment of $480 a year to a man who rides a motor cycle, because he owns the motor cycle. I do not know how much a motor cycle costs, but it certainly does not cost over $150.

Mr. GOULD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. GOULD. The hearings show that a motor cycle costs as high as $350.

Mr. MADDEN. Then let us say $350. How many years will it takes to wear out a motor cycle.

Mr. WHEELER. The evidence shows that it takes two years to wear out a motor cycle.

Mr. MADDEN. Then in those circumstances you give the man $960 for two years' use of a motor cycle which costs him $350.

Mr. WHEELER. And it costs him over $75 a year for repairs.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not believe that. Of course, with a man who has to ride a horse it is different. He has to pay $250 at least for his horse, and then he has to pay for the shoeing of the horse and the feed for it. The horse wears out very quickly, and after being ridden around for a year he is not worth very much; but when you pay $480 a year for a motorcycle policeman in addition to his pay, you are doing an injustice to the Treasury.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. WHEELER. Does the gentleman think that a man mounted on a motor cycle does not pay anything for gasoline?

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, yes; but we pay him for that. He incurs a cost in the purchase of gasoline and tires, but we pay him for his motor cycle and besides a profit on top of that under this scheme of paying him $480 a year for the use of the motor cycle. Why, we would better own the motor cycle and furnish it to the man than to have him pay for it and then pay him $480 a year for its use. A man who rides a motor cycle has an easy job That is one of the easiest jobs in the department.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. WHEELER. I will state to the gentleman that a policeman on a motor cycle has to buy one more uniform a year than does a regular patrolman.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not believe that; and, even so, the uniform of a motor cycle policeman does not cost as much as the uniform of a patrolman, because he does not wear the same kind of a uniform. He does not wear out the shoes that the patrolman wears out. Shoes are costing $10 a pair, and the patrolman wears out three or four pairs of shoes a year. Why not pay him for the extra shoes that he wears.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. Does not the gentleman think that a motor cycle might be rather hard on a man's trousers? [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, he might wear out an extra pair of trousers.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. GARD. Directly in line with what the gentleman is speaking of, I note that in bill H. R. 7983, formerly taken up, the increase pay for the man on the motor cycle is $360 per annum.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course. You are going ahead and increasing this pay without rhyme or reason. What is the matter with this District Committee? Is it afraid of the police force? [Laughter.] Why do we not run the police force instead of having the police force run us?

Why do not we put a superintendent in charge of the police force who knows how to direct a police force? Everybody you meet anywhere, except a few sissies, admits that the major and superintendent of police is totally unfit for the job he holds.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. WHEELER. I will state to the gentleman that the police force has no more influence over the Committee on the District of Columbia than the postal employees have over the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. Then they have a good deal of influence over the committee that you represent, I will say that. [Laughter.] And I hope that the influence the police force has over this committee is as salutary as the influence that the postal men have over the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. If it is as beneficent in its influence as that of the postal employees, it is well; but I fear it. Why should we now have two assistant superintendents? That is the thing that is before us. We ought to eliminate one, at any rate. I think we ought to eliminate them both, but I will be satisfied with a halfway measure now and cut out one.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. We ought not to have all of this police force at the top and then complain because we have not got police protection. These men do not give us police protection. They are sitting in easy chairs out of the light of day. They do not see the people; they do not know the crimes which are committed; they do not protect the property.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. There may be some other law that limits the number of assistant superintendents——

Mr. MADDEN. There is a law limiting the number to one.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. As this language seems to go, there can be as many assistant superintendents as somebody might wish to appoint——

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, you can have as many as you like.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. If there is no law prohibiting it.

Mr. MADDEN. There is only law for one, but there is an appropriation which provides for two. If you strike out the word "superintendents" and insert the word "superintendent," then you have complied with the law as it exists and appropriations can only be made for one.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I think the gentleman's amendment should prevail, unless there is some law that limits the number of assistant superintendents——

Mr. MADDEN. There is. It is limited to one, but there is an appropriation that provides for two, but not a law.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. We ought to provide for as many of them as the law provides.

Mr. MADDEN. There is only one provided for by law, and the superintendents ought not to exceed that.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. The committee report recommends increases based on present salaries. I would like to know how long since there has been a raise in salaries?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know anything about it; I do not know when they were raised; I only know the police force is too heavy, and I hope the committee will agree to strike out one of these superintendents.

Mr. BENSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. Mr. Chairman, if you will read the report you will find that many of the larger cities that do not have two assistant superintendents have a secretary, and you will find in Washington that there is not any secretary in the list. You will find in Detroit, for instance, three assistant superintendents. Now Mr. Chairman, we have gone over this question of the salaries of the police. My friend from Ohio said something about Baltimore. I want to tell him that both the Democratic and Republican conventions recently put in their platforms a promise for increase of salaries for the police of Baltimore. There has been no strike or threatened strike in Baltimore, but because there has not been is no reason why justice should not be done these men, but every reason why justice should be done. In the Democratic platform the language reads that the increase in salaries shall be commensurate with other wages and salaries paid in the community.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman tell us what a private gets in the city of Baltimore?

Mr. BENSON. They get about $1,200 at the present time, and that is ridiculously low. There is one good thing, I think, that has come out of this Boston strike of policemen. The people of this country, I think, realize the importance of the police force, and I agree that a strike of policemen is as reprehensible as a strike in the Army or the Navy, but at the same time the Boston strike has called attention to the fact that we do need a police force in every large community, and that those men as a class are loyal in performing those duties. Now, as to whether section 2 is effective, I believe if anyone will read carefully section 2 of this bill he will find that it not only provides against affiliating with other organizations that can call strikes, but it also provides against a formation of an organization of their own in which strikes can be called.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, the committee in reporting this bill did not take into consideration the number of men on the force of the Metropolitan police, either of the privates, the sergeants, the lieutenants, captains, inspectors, or superintendents. Furthermore, I would like to say now, once and for all, that the committee is in no way responsible for the personnel of the police department. It has no jurisdiction over the appointment or the selection of the superintendent, or assistant superintendent, or any of the other men on the force. It has nothing to do with the efficiency of the force. It has nothing to do with the selection of the patrolmen, or how they perform their duties. The committee interested itself in the question as to how much ought the members of the police force of the District of Columbia be paid in order to make it efficient; in order to have the proper men on it; and in fairness to all concerned. It took that into consideration in fixing the salaries of the superintendent; it took that into consideration in fixing the pay of the assistant superintendents and of the patrolmen. We are not responsible for the personnel of the department; we have no way of assuming that responsibility; we could not, if we wanted to do so, select the assistant superintendents, or the superintendent, or the patrolmen. We have no desire to assume the responsibility that we can not exercise.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. JUUL. The gentleman states that his committee has absolutely nothing to do with selection of the higher officials in the police force of Washington, and yet the gentleman's committee practically sits as a city council, running the affairs of this great city. Does the gentleman say that his committee, which through all the years has been substituted for the city council, has so far relinquished its hold upon the situation locally here that they have nothing to do with the picking of the men that are running things?

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois falls into the error which people often fall into who are not so familiar with the legislative procedure of Congress as the gentleman from Illinois is. The Committee on the District of Columbia does not act as a council for the District. The business of the Committee on the District of Columbia is to consider and report legislation introduced in the House of Representatives which pertains to the District of Columbia, and is referred to it. It has not administrative powers; it has not executive powers; it is a committee of the House of Representatives, and has the same jurisdiction and the same power, and none other, as any other committee has, dealing with like questions of legislation.

Mr. JUUL. Does the gentleman mean to tell this body that the power of his committee is to sit here and increase salaries?

Mr. MAPES. I do not mean to tell this body any such thing, and have not told it any such thing.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Will the gentleman from Michigan yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. How are the officers and patrolmen, and so on, appointed?

Mr. MAPES. A civil-service examination is provided for the men, which includes a mental and physical test, and they are appointed by the commissioners upon the recommendation of the superintendent after such examination.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The superintendent himself is not selected in that way, is he?

Mr. MAPES. I think the superintendent is appointed by the commissioners.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Who determines the number of men to be employed?

Mr. MAPES. Primarily, the Committee on Appropriations in Congress. None of these men can be paid except Congress appropriates for them, and that matter, as the gentleman knows, is taken up by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. And the number is limited by the lump-sum appropriation recommended by the committee and approved by the Congress, and there has been some authority by which that money could be distributed and by which it can be divided among the men as they wish?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

Mr. MAPES. The appropriation fixes the number, the same as the number of clerks in an executive department.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The number in each one of these positions as set out in this bill?

Mr. MAPES. Yes. This bill takes the number that was provided for in the last appropriation act. It follows the last appropriation act and does not attempt to reduce them or increase them.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Would the gentleman feel like acceding to the demands of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] and provide for only one superintendent? As it is here, the authority which appoints these men and distributes their salaries, as provided, could appoint any number of assistant superintendents.

Mr. MAPES. I will say frankly that I am not well enough posted on the duty of these assistant superintendents to be able to answer the question of the gentleman fully. But whether they have two assistant superintendents or one depends upon the Appropriations Committee, and the Appropriations Committee in the last Congress gave them two assistant superintendents.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. If this act remains as it is, if there is any money left anywhere, and those in authority can get hold of it, they will use it whether they need it or not?

Mr. MAPES. Oh, no. It is appropriated for the patrolmen and for the captains, and for the lieutenants, and sergeants, and so forth, and unless there is a specific appropriation for the assistant superintendents, it would not be possible to use it for that purpose.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. It seems to me one assistant superintendent would be enough, and I would be inclined to vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], unless the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES], who we all know has more information, advises us to the contrary.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from Michigan is willing to admit, is he not, that the basic law only provides for one?

Mr. MAPES. The basic law, that was passed in 1906.

Mr. MADDEN. Whenever it was passed; there is only one provided for in the law.

Mr. MAPES. It only provides for one.

Mr. MADDEN. And the other place was provided for by appropriation and is not the law except for the current year, and we ought not to let that exist.

Mr. MAPES. I would like to say further, Mr. Chairman, in answer to some of the criticism that has been leveled here at the police force, that it is the contention of those who are responsible for the efficiency of the force, that it has been impossible—and it seems to me that their contention has a great deal of force—under existing conditions to get men, proper men, or to get enough of any kind of men, to fill out the department and properly police the District.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. In a moment. This is to give them sufficient pay, so that they may get the men to take care of some of these things that you gentlemen are now criticizing them for not doing. The subcommittee went into the question very thoroughly and very carefully, and they feel that the amounts put into this bill are very conservative. They are to be the basic salaries, and, of course, there is a bonus for this current year; but nobody knows how long that will continue, and certainly the basic salary plus the bonus, under the present conditions, is not too great for a man living in the District of Columbia.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. Yes; I yield.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. To the gentleman from Texas, first.

Mr. BEE. Is not the trouble with the police departments all over the country, and is not the reason for the criticism the inadequacy of pay, that does not attract the right sort of men?

Mr. MAPES. Yes; and especially is that true in the District of Columbia.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Now, the gentleman just stated that the difficulty about the management of the police force and its efficiency is that they have not been able to get the kind of men needed, because the compensation is not adequate. I have no doubt but that the compensation should be increased. I am in favor of paying good compensation to men in important places. But the gentleman will not be willing to say that they have had any difficulty in getting captains and lieutenants and superintendents and men who do not do patrol duty. They had no difficulty there, did they?

Mr. MAPES. They have had difficulty all along the line. Of course, the men are not made captains until they have served for a number of years, and a man who has served for a number of years, even under present conditions, and has been promoted to be a captain, does not feel that he could afford to withdraw from the service. The difficulty is under the present salaries to get the right kind of men to start in as patrolmen, so that they can be promoted.

Mr. MADDEN. I am anxious to get the best kind of men, and I want the best kind of a police force; but I want to call attention to this fact, that in Chicago they have 27 captains with over 4,500 men in the police force, while in Washington they have 12 captains with only 800 men. In Chicago they have no inspector, and yet they have 4,500 men, and here we have 3 inspectors. In Chicago they have only 1 assistant superintendent over all the men that they have on the force, and here you have 2 assistant superintendents with only 800 men. Here you have 1 commanding officer over every 8 men. It is no wonder that the police protection here is inadequate.

Mr. MAPES. And Chicago has how many?

Mr. MADDEN. We have 1 for about every 15 men.

Mr. MAPES. Is it not for every 10 men?

Mr. MADDEN. No; 15 men.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

The question was taken, and the Chair expressed himself as in doubt.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 31, noes 19.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. Tellers are demanded. Those favoring a vote by tellers will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Not a sufficient number, and tellers are refused.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CLARK of Florida: Page 3, line 7, at the end of section 1, insert "Provided, That after the expiration of the present term no person shall be eligible for appointment as major and superintendent unless he shall have previously served at least three years as a patrolman on said Metropolitan police force."

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan makes a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman reserve his point of order?

Mr. MAPES. Yes; I will reserve it.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, in my judgment there is just one reason why Washington has not got a proper police force. That one reason is the present superintendent and major. The police force of this city is absolutely no protection, as we all know, to the people here.

There have been in the last few days 10 holdups and robberies on the streets of this city, and nothing has been done about them. We all remember the saturnalia of crime that existed here a few weeks ago. If anybody has been punished for that nobody has heard of it. Neither the crimes that were committed previously and subsequently nor the riotings have been punished, and if steps have been taken to punish them they have been very quietly taken.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the fact of the matter is this: Washington ought to have what almost every other city has, a practical and experienced man at the head of the police force. I have nothing against the present superintendent and major of police. So far as I know, he is a very nice gentleman. But his business was that of a newspaper reporter. He never had any experience at all in police affairs, and he had no connection with them, and it does seem to me that this Congress ought to provide so that these men who come from the bottom, who have had experience all along the line, may have an opportunity to become the head of the force. As it is now, these positions are given out as a sort of political proposition, and it is in all administrations just the same.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Under the gentleman's amendment only patrolmen could be promoted to the position of superintendent. That would exclude assistant superintendents, inspectors, captains, lieutenants, and sergeants.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. No. I think those are taken from the patrolmen.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Is that required in all cases under the law now?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I am not sure that it is. I do not know what the law is, but I rather think it is required. I think they all have to come up from those other positions, from patrolmen up.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. If that be true, then it would be all right; but on the face of it it would not seem so.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Now, this is a bill increasing salaries.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to interrupt the gentleman a moment. The Chair did not understand the gentleman from Michigan to state what his point of order was.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. If the gentleman from Michigan will state that I will be glad to discuss it.

Mr. MAPES. I assume that the gentleman from Florida will concede the point of order.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. No; I do not.

Mr. MAPES. I make the point of order, then, that the gentleman's amendment is not germane to this bill. This bill deals with the question of pay for the police department. The gentleman amends a certain paragraph in the act relating to the Metropolitan police force. The decisions are that amendments which go into the general subject matter on a bill which relates only to the amendment of a paragraph of a law are not in order.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill to amend an act entitled "An act relating to the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia."

Mr. MADDEN. If you can fix the salaries you can fix the conditions under which the salaries shall be paid.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Certainly. This being a bill to amend an act entitled "An act relating to the Metropolitan police force of the District of Columbia," any amendment which relates to the "Metropolitan police force of the District of Columbia" is clearly in order. The act itself undertakes to fix the compensation. Now, certainly anything which prescribes the manner in which that compensation shall be paid, or to whom it shall be paid, is germane and in order, and I contend that anything relating to the "Metropolitan police force" would be in order on this bill.

But, this bill undertaking to prescribe the compensation, my amendment relates to the eligibility of the persons to whom the compensation is to be paid. Therefore it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that it is clearly in order and absolutely germane. It can not be otherwise, because it relates to the police force, and this relates to the personnel.

Mr. MAPES. Does the gentleman want to take up the question of order now or does he want to discuss the amendment further?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I do not care to discuss the amendment further.

Mr. MAPES. I want to be heard further on the point of order before the Chair rules.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. MAPES. I yield to my colleague [Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan].

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, without expressing an opinion as to the merits of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida, I call the attention of the Chair to the portion of the bill on page 2, line 14, which prescribes the qualifications of men who shall be employed on the police force. It provides—> that privates of class 1 shall serve one year on probation, privates of class 2 shall serve two years subsequent to service in class 1, and privates of class 3 shall include all those privates who have served efficiently three or more years.

It goes on and provides the number of officers, those who can serve in one capacity and another, and provision is made as to the previous service that these men shall have given. So it would seem to me entirely proper to amend this bill in such a way as to provide that the superintendent of police himself shall have passed through such and such a course, as outlined by the amendment of the gentleman from Florida. It occurs to me that the amendment is in order.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, at first blush, perhaps, the statement which the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK]—and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] apparently subscribes to it—has made, that any amendment which relates to the Metropolitan police force of the District of Columbia is in order, would appear to be correct; but an examination of the rules and authorities on the subject will clearly demonstrate that that statement is too broad, and, as a matter of fact, there is no foundation at all for it in the rules.

The rules provide that an amendment to be in order must be germane to the particular section or paragraph which the bill before the House attempts to amend, and that an amendment is not necessarily in order because it relates to the general subject matter of the law which it is proposed to amend, or a subject which is under discussion in the public press.

Section 777 of the manual says that—

> No motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment.

Before I go further, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that this section in no way pertains to the appointment of the superintendent of the police force. There is an entirely different provision for his appointment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman just how the superintendent of police is appointed?

Mr. MAPES. The superintendent of police is appointed by the Commissioners of the District. I should like to read to the Chairman a digest of a few of the decisions that have been made on this particular subject. It seems to me that they are all so clearly one way that, by calling attention to them, anyone must conclude that this amendment is not in order.

It is not in order during consideration of a bill in the House to introduce a new subject by way of amendment. Whether or not an amendment be germane should be judged from the provisions of the text of the bill rather than from the purposes which circumstances may suggest.

The rule that amendments shall be germane applies to amendments reported by committees. Under the later practice an amendment should be germane to the particular paragraph.

I should like to have the Chair follow this particular statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. MAPES. Under the later practice an amendment should be germane to the particular paragraph or section to which it is offered. In support of that proposition several sections in Hinds' Precedents are cited.

An amendment inserting an additional section should be germane to the portion of the bill to which it is offered.

To a bill amending a general law on a specific point an amendment relating to the terms of the law rather than to those of the bill was offered and ruled not to be germane. That was held by Speaker Reed, also by Speaker CANNON and Speaker CLARK.

So to a legislative section in a general appropriation bill amending one section of the Criminal Code a provision amending the Criminal Code in other particulars was held not germane.

One individual proposition may not be amended by another individual proposition, even though the two belong to the same class. Thus the following are not germane:

To a bill proposing the admission of one Territory into the Union an amendment for admission of another Territory.

To a bill for the relief of one individual an amendment proposing similar relief for another.

To a resolution providing a special order for one bill an amendment to include another bill.

To a provision for extermination of the cotton-boll weevil an amendment including the gypsy moth.

To a provision for a clerk for one committee an amendment for a clerk to another committee.

All of those propositions were held not in order.

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MAPES. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ASWELL. Does not this bill provide for the increasing of the salary of the superintendent of police?

Mr. MAPES. It provides for the pay of the superintendent of police, but it has nothing whatever to do with his appointment.

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman please answer the question?

Mr. MAPES. The appointment of the superintendent is taken up in an entirely different section if not in a different law.

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman answer the question?

Mr. MAPES. This bill proposes to amend a certain section pertaining to the act of the Metropolitan police force.

Mr. ASWELL. The gentleman does not answer the question. It provides for an increase of salary of the superintendent, and if Congress has the right to increase the salary it has the right to prescribe the conditions under which the salary shall be paid.

Mr. MAPES. Congress has the right if it proceeds in the proper manner, but it can not do it on this bill, according to the precedents.

Mr. PARRISH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I will.

Mr. PARRISH. I notice that this is an amendment to section 8 of the act referred to in the bill. Can the chairman tell us where the qualification and manner of appointment of the chief of police is prescribed or provided for in the original bill, whether in section 8 or some other section?

Mr. MAPES. The other sections of the law provide for qualifications and manner of appointment. This section does not deal with those matters.

Mr. PARRISH. Or the appointments?

Mr. MAPES. No.

Mr. PARRISH. If I may offer the suggestion, if it does not amend the section dealing with the qualifications or appointment of the chief of police, it seems to me it would be clearly out of order.

Mr. MAPES. Under the decisions of the Speakers, that is clearly the case.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from Michigan whether the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida is considered as reached by the sentence on page 346 of the rules, as follows:

To a bill amending a general law on a specific point an amendment relating to the terms of the law rather than to those of the bill is not germane.

Does the gentleman from Michigan consider that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida comes within that description?

Mr. MAPES. I think so, if the Chair please. I think also that it comes within the further provision which provides that a bill amending a certain section of the law can not be amended, or that an amendment to such a bill which pertains to another section of the law is not germane, and that the whole subject matter of this amendment is not germane to this bill before the House.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, just a word on the point of order. It is not infrequent that we have a bill for amending a number of sections of an act. Quite recently we had a bill amending the War Risk Insurance act. A number of the sections of that act were included in the amending bill. It has been held, and I think without a break, that where a bill proposes to amend a number of sections of an act, then any other section of the act may be amended in the bill under consideration. On the other hand, where a single section of an act or a single paragraph of an act is the subject matter before the House for consideration in a bill, then in order to bring an amendment within the rule governing germaneness, it must be germane to the particular section or paragraph of the original act that the bill under consideration seeks to amend.

The bill before us undertakes to amend paragraph 8 of section 1 of "An act relating to the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia," approved February 28, 1901, as amended by a later act. It seeks to do nothing else but amend paragraph 8 of that section. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that if we would follow the line of precedents it must be held that if the amendment of the gentleman from Florida is in order it must be germane to some proposition in paragraph 8 of the original act, and that it can not be held in order unless it is germane to that paragraph.

In short, as I understand the situation, in the original act the qualifications of the superintendent of police are provided for in some other section and not in paragraph 8. For this reason I do not think the amendment of the gentleman from Florida is germane to a bill to amend paragraph 8 of that act, which alone is the subject matter for consideration in this bill.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill to amend an act pertaining to the Metropolitan police and increasing the salary of the superintendent. My amendment is a limitation upon that expenditure which comes directly within the Holman rule. It seems to me that if it is not admissible under anything else, it is admissible under that rule as a limitation upon the expenditure and tending to retrenchment of expenditure.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not consider the last point made by the gentleman from Florida is well taken, as the Chair is under the impression that the Holman rule only applies to general appropriation bills, and of course the bill under consideration is not of that nature. But the Chair will not make this as a basis of his ruling.

The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] made the point very clear and plain to the Chair that the amendment must be germane to the paragraph as submitted. Paragraph 8 is one having to do solely with the matter of salaries, and the limitation that the gentleman from Florida seeks to put on the salary is in the form of a qualification of the appointee for the position of superintendent. There is some embarrassment growing out of the fact as to whether a selection recommended by the President for a position of this kind should be limited by a legislative designation of this nature.

But, of course, that would not necessarily be involved in the point of order made against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK]. It would seem to the Chair that this matter is disposed of by two very recent rulings, especially the one made last week by the Chairman of the committee, Mr. ANDERSON, when the so-called magnesite bill was before us. There is also the clause in the citations to which the Chair referred in asking the question of the gentleman from Michigan, a matter that directly applies, that is, that to a bill amending a general law on a specific point an amendment relating to the terms of the law other than those contained in the original amendment reported by the committee is held not to be germane. That is a ruling made originally by Mr. Speaker Reed, and has been upheld by Mr. Speaker CANNON and Mr. Speaker CLARK.

The Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 4, strike out "$4,500" and insert "$4,000"; in line 5 strike out "$3,000" and insert "$2,500"; in line 6 strike out "$2,400" and insert "$2,000"; in line 7 strike out "$1,400" and insert "$1,800"; in line 8 strike out "$2,300" and insert "$1,960"; in line 10 strike out "$1,800" and insert "$1,600"; in line 11 strike out "$1,660" and insert "$1,400"; in line 12 strike out "$1,560" and insert "$1,300," and in line 14 strike out "$1,460" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,200."

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Texas yield for a moment before he proceeds?

Mr. BLANTON. Well, I have only five minutes.

Mr. GARD. It is right in line with the gentleman's amendment. I notice on line 7 that he raises the amount from $1,400 to $1,800. Did the gentleman intend that or $1,080?

Mr. BLANTON. I intended $1,800, for this reason: Much beyond an adequate salary has been provided for every single police officer in this District until we get to the police surgeon, a position which requires years of study in order to qualify the man who holds it to prescribe medicine for sick policemen and their families, and then you provide a salary of $1,400 only.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I regret that I can not yield, as I have only five minutes. When we come to school-teachers or police surgeons, positions requiring technical skill and training, in all of these bills their salaries are made nominal in amount, upon which sums they can not live; and so it is with all such technical positions. I know one of the best physicians in the District, who is a police surgeon, and who devotes night and day of his time to waiting upon policemen and their families when they are sick. He is paid a salary no greater than our negro janitors receive in buildings of this District to-day. Why is it that this discrimination is made so frequently? We provide a salary for the major in the police service at $4,500 a year; and I want to call my colleague's attention again to the fact that there are nine States in the Union which pay their governors only $4,000 a year, and every one of those nine governors can come here and visit the District of Columbia, and they have access to the floor of the Senate and the House, and can mingle and talk with the Members of Congress. Yet a police superintendent is paid more money than they are, and he has no such privilege. I think we have gotten up a little too high. Every single salary in this bill, from $2,500 down, draws, in addition to the amount stated in the bill, $240 a year bonus. Take, for instance, the captains, who in the bill are to receive $2,300. Do they receive only $2,300? No; under the law, as a matter of fact, they receive $2,540 a year; yet there are many cashiers in banks in this country, holding responsible positions, handling millions of dollars of the people's money every year, who do NOT receive as much as $2,540 a year.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. Perhaps the gentleman does not know that the police surgeons are not required to give all of their time to the duties of the office?

Mr. BLANTON. They may not be required, but in many instances they do it; and the chairman will admit that whenever a sick policeman or a member of his family sends for a police surgeon or goes to his house and asks for treatment that police surgeon must wait upon him, and he can not refuse to wait upon a sick policeman or members of his family.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I can correct one statement made by the gentleman. These physicians are not required to pay any attention whatever to the families of policemen.

Mr. BLANTON. But they do it just the same.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. They are not required to do so.

Mr. BLANTON. One of the finest men in this District has been my neighbor for three years, and he has told me repeatedly that it takes nearly all of his time to wait upon the sick policemen and members of their families.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In reference to these cashiers' salaries, does not the gentleman think it is quite possible that they are underpaid, in view of the dividends the banks are making?

Mr. BLANTON. I am not discussing that subject now. Take, for instance, the nine governors of the States that I speak of. Possibly they are underpaid, yet there are splendid men in every single one of those nine States who every two years seek to be elected to this office—the very best brains that the States can produce—and they spend money to get it, at $4,000 a year.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to pay to every single man a living wage. I want to see every policeman in this District have a living wage, but I want to say that, in my judgment, if you will take men who are holding similar positions in life, requiring the same sort of service to be performed, in many instances you will find good men who are giving the same or a better class of service for less money. The thing I am protesting against is the habit we Congressmen have fallen into of making special pets out of Government employees and paying to them salaries largely out of proportion to the salaries drawn by private employees in similar positions giving similar service.

Now, I think that the amount stated in this bill, every single one of these salaries, is an adequate salary without the $240 bonus, of which the people of the country know nothing. I want to say that in this graduated scale I have offered in this amendment I have sought to take off that bonus in so far as the maximum salary that is provided in this bill is concerned, and I think that when we talk to each other here and to our constituents about it being time for a retrenchment in the affairs of this Government that we ought to be consistent when we begin raising salaries time and time again of every single employee of this Government. I do not want to lower a man's salary, but during this emergency I think that we ought to stop raising them.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Texas. The gentleman from Texas is not very consistent in his amendments. He proposes to reduce the salaries of patrolmen $240 or $250 per annum and raise the salaries of surgeons an additional $1,000, or near that——

Mr. BLANTON. No; $400.

Mr. WHEELER. The gentleman said $1,400——

Mr. BLANTON. From $1,400 to $1,800, which is a $400 increase.

Mr. WHEELER. I am speaking of the present salary.

Mr. BLANTON. I am speaking of the bill, and it is only a raise of $400.

Mr. WHEELER. A surgeon now receives $840. They are not required to be on duty any specific number of hours, but it came out in the hearings they are not on duty over four hours a day, and they have an outside practice, and the committee thought that they had certainly increased the surgeons sufficiently when they increased their compensation from $840 to $1,400. Unquestionably, they can make anywhere from $2,000 to $2,500 a year additional in their practice outside, and they will receive the bonus in addition. Now, the committee went into the raise of salaries very carefully, and we had a number of patrolmen before that committee. This is a statement from one of the patrolmen, and in substance nearly all the patrolmen stated their expenditures per month are practically the same, depending upon, of course, the number in the family. In this particular instance there were three in the family—this patrolman, his mother, and one child. The salary was $113.64 per month. His expenditures were $125, and there is no doctor's bill and no dentist's bill. Unquestionably, the physician and dentist would add a further amount of $100 a year, so his expenses at the end of the year probably would be $130 to $140 a month. The salary proposed by the gentleman from Texas for a private of the first class would be $1,200, together with the bonus, and it would not pay his expenses.

Mr. BLANTON. None would receive under $1,400 with the bonus.

Mr. WHEELER. I am speaking of the gentleman's amendment, together with the bonus. It would not meet the expenses at the end of the year.

Mr. BLANTON. It would be more than $1,400.

Mr. WHEELER. Assuming it would be $1,500; $1,500 a year would not pay the man's expenses with a family of three, and the bonus, the gentleman is well aware, applies only to this year, and in all probability there will not be any bonus voted next year.

Mr. RICKETTS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHEELER. Prices are so abnormally high that the committee felt that they were entitled to this salary as proposed by the bill, together with the bonus, which probably would not more than meet the expenses this year.

Mr. RICKETTS. I wanted to ask the gentleman whether or not he does not think that the bonus proposition ought to be done away with entirely? Does not the gentleman think that the bonus is a sort of bribe for a fellow to do his duty?

Mr. WHEELER. The gentleman means here in Washington?

Mr. RICKETTS. A bonus to all officers, to all employees of the department. Ought not we do away with the paying of a bonus?

Mr. WHEELER. Not this year. I think the Congress was wise. I think they did the right thing when they voted it under existing conditions.

Mr. RICKETTS. Is the gentleman in favor of continuing the bonus?

Mr. WHEELER. But next year, when prices go down and the high cost of living is reduced very considerably, Congress in its wisdom undoubtedly will not vote a bonus.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] proposes to reduce the salary of nearly everybody connected with the police department except the one who is fortunate enough to enjoy his personal acquaintance. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. I am well acquainted with a great many patrolmen who are fine men, personally acquainted, from Maj. Pullman down.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Then, somewhat qualifying my statement, I will say that the gentleman's amendment proposes to reduce the salary of everybody except the particular one the gentleman from Texas has already announced enjoys his particular friendship or acquaintance.

These surgeons heretofore have been paid $840 a year. They have their regular office hours, and they have a practice entirely independent of the police department. When a patrolman meets with an accident, or is about to be taken into the service, and an examination is required, then these surgeons are called upon to pass upon his physical qualifications. It is entirely a mistake that they are paid out of the Treasury for medical attention given to the family of a policeman. This bill raises the compensation of these surgeons from $840 to $1,400 a year. The committee was loth to grant that increase, and I believe that every member of the committee would have objected most strenuously indeed to an increase of the salaries to the amount now proposed by the gentleman from Texas.

As to the superintendent of police, I have heard a number of complaints against him, and the principal ones are that he has been active, quite active indeed, in running down bootleggers and that on Sunday he teaches a Sunday school.

Only a few moments ago we heard an indictment of him presented by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK], wherein he asserted that arrests were not being made in holdup cases because of the inefficiency of the chief of police. In the same indictment we have heard that no one has been convicted of any of these holdups because of the inefficiency of the chief of police. Now, upon analysis, everybody knows that that statement has gone too far. Certainly no one will contend that the chief of police has given instructions to the patrolmen not to make arrests for holdups. The chief of police has not given instructions to the prosecuting attorney that indictments shall not be returned. The chief of police has not instructed grand juries that indictments shall not be returned. The chief of police has not given instructions to the courts that holdup men are to be turned loose in order that they may commit their offenses again.

These are unjust charges against a good officer and Christian gentleman, and he ought to be paid like the chiefs of police are paid in other cities. And these exaggerated charges—these charges which upon their face show they can not be sustained—ought not to be the reason or argument to this House that this officer's salary should not be in keeping with the salaries of the chiefs of police of other cities, even though he runs down bootleggers and bookmakers and teaches Sunday school in the churches.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, I have the highest opinion of the chief of police of this city, and I would not say anything against him personally. He is an elegant gentleman, but he is no more fitted to be chief of police of the city of Washington than he is to man a flying machine or run an Army tank, as shown by his record. There is not a city in this country half as large as Washington that has as inefficient a police force as we have here. The secret is the lack of supervision. To every man who has investigated this case it is evident that the morale of the police force has been destroyed. The men are without heart. There is no law enforcement here.

Last week my wife and daughter had an automobile tire sawed from the car. They appealed to a policeman to catch the thief, and he said that it was of no use; that, if captured, the judge would turn him loose. And that was the end of it.

The superintendent has singing contests in this city, while murder, rape, and other crimes are committed; the superintendent of police of this city has swimming contests for policemen, while murder and rape are being committed!

And in order to show the magnificent equipment and skill of the chief of police of the city of Washington, where robbery and every other crime is committed and not punished at all, I shall refer to a circular which I hold in my hand, which is called the "Morning Bulletin," issued on April 4, 1919. This he issues to the police force; it contains good doctrine, but it does not take care of the robberies and murders on the streets of Washington. I will read a few paragraphs. It is issued regularly to the police force of this city:

It costs nothing to stand erect and breathe and walk properly.

That is a good doctrine. It is a good thing to salute and stand at proper attention, but the protection of our citizens, the control and punishment of crime, are the main duties of this officer. Listen to this:

It costs nothing to cleanse the teeth thoroughly after each meal. By so doing you may save not only dentists' bills but surgeons' and doctors' bills.

It is a good thing to clean the teeth, of course, but what of the unpunished criminals? It says further:

It costs nothing to avoid eating between meals candy and sweets that have high fuel value, and are liable to irritate the stomach and otherwise affect the digestion and metabolism.

That is good philosophy, but he is talking this to the policemen of the city while women are being raped, homes broken into, stores robbed, and highwaymen appearing on the streets. He tells the policemen:

It costs nothing to keep serene and cheerful; to show "malice toward none and charity for all"; to keep out of the nervous system "grouches" that waste your energies and infect the lives of those around you.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ASWELL. I can not yield. Gentlemen of this committee, as a citizen of this city and this Republic, I protest against this Congress indorsing this superintendent of police by increasing his salary even one penny, because he is unfitted and should not be in charge of this great body of as fine policemen as can be found. They need and deserve a chief who has come up from the ranks of the force.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WHEELER. I ask that the gentleman may have one minute more. I desire to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The newspapers have told us that the Commissioners of the District have themselves recommended increases of salaries for the members of the police force, and that that recommendation went to the Committee on the District of Columbia. We learn also that the committee has not followed those recommendations, but in every instance, I believe, has recommended to this House an increase above those recommendations. I should like to have the chairman of the committee tell us what the recommendations of the commissioners are, so that we may compare them for our information with the recommendations made by the committee carried in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. We are passing on the question of the amount of the salaries, Mr. Chairman, and it seems to me we should have an answer to my question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan had yielded the floor.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I think we should have an answer to that before we vote on these amounts.

Mr. MAPES. I will say to the gentleman that if he will get a copy of H. R. 7983, he will find the recommendation of the commissioners.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Is it true that your committee has increased each amount?

Mr. MAPES. I think not. There are some which it did not increase, although it did increase the recommendations for all the patrolmen, including classes 1, 2, and 3, and perhaps some of those who are better-paid members of the force. The subcommittee went into this matter very carefully and held hearings so as to ascertain the condition of the men here on the force and compared the pay the men in the District receive with the pay that men receive on police forces in other cities and came to the unanimous conclusion that the amounts put into the bill we are now considering were proper and conservative.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I know the committee has given a lot of attention to this, and I have confidence in the committee, but it would seem to me that we should properly have the information I ask in order that we may know the difference between the recommendations of the commissioners and the salaries now put up to us by the committee.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Not inspectors but the commissioners.

Mr. MAPES. If the gentleman wants to know of any special member of the force, I would be glad to give him the recommendation of the commissioners.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Was it recommended that the superintendent's salary should be increased?

Mr. MAPES. Yes; in the same amount as carried in the bill.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. How much of an increase over his present salary?

Mr. MAPES. Five hundred dollars. He receives now $4,000. This proposes to increase his salary to $4,500. The committee was of the opinion that a man capable and qualified to be superintendent of the police of the District of Columbia should receive $4,500.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The report carries much of the information that I asked for. I was negligent in not reading it more carefully.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BEE. I just wanted to ask the chairman of the committee whether or not it was not a very unsafe proposition to fix salaries or to cut salaries upon a judgment of individuals who then happen to be in office. This gentleman, whom I do not know, but who has been so bitterly assailed, might die tomorrow and we might get a gentleman who would meet all the requirements of these objecting gentlemen and his salary would be too low. It occurs to me that Congress and other legislative bodies ought to fix salaries based on what the offices are worth and not upon their judgment of the individual at the time holding the office and who might have met the disapproval of gentlemen or somebody else.

Mr. MAPES. Yes; and the bitterest criticism against the present superintendent of police comes from members of the gentleman's own party. I wonder if they have taken the trouble to go to the commissioners and tell them their views. The only body who can change the personnel of the superintendent is the commissioners.

Mr. BEE. I appreciate that; and yet if this Congress cuts the salary of the chief of police because Members of this Congress do not happen to like this chief of police we are playing with fire and we will get a low standard of salaries.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEE. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I will state that I am not one of those who oppose the present chief of police, because there is no man in this House who thinks more of Maj. Pullman than I, and no man who would do more for him personally than I. I do not propose a decrease of salary in this bill because of any animosity to him. I approve of this bill from first to last.

Mr. BEE. I was not referring to the gentleman. I was speaking of speeches here on the floor in denunciation of a man unable to respond and reply to these charges. It occurs to me that it is not a fair deal.

Mr. WHEELER. Of course, this District Committee when appointed could only take into consideration the question of salaries.

Mr. BEE. That does not apply to the question of the individuals who fill the positions.

Mr. WHEELER. There was a resolution, I believe, introduced into this House relative to an investigation of the police officers and the police department, but that resolution is still pigeonholed somewhere and it has never been referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. Of course, the committee would naturally investigate the police department and the officials if such a resolution should be referred to that committee.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask the chairman of the District Committee what recommendation the commissioners made as to the compensation to be paid to the superintendent of police?

Mr. MAPES. I stated that they recommended a salary of $4,500 a year.

Mr. MADDEN. What recommendation did they make for the payment of assistant superintendents of police?

Mr. MAPES. Three thousand dollars.

Mr. MADDEN. And for inspectors?

Mr. MAPES. Two thousand five hundred dollars.

Mr. MADDEN. And what did the committee recommend?

Mr. MAPES. Two thousand four hundred dollars.

Mr. MADDEN. What recommendation was made by the commissioners as to a captain's salary?

Mr. MAPES. Two thousand five hundred dollars, and the committee recommends $2,300.

Mr. MADDEN. What recommendation was made as to surgeons?

Mr. MAPES. The commissioners recommended $1,080, and the committee recommends $1,400.

Mr. WHEELER. The commissioners afterwards recommended, as I understand, $2,500.

Mr. MADDEN. Not for surgeons.

Mr. MAPES. The commissioners in the original bill that they sent up recommended the amount which I have named. Afterwards, in the hearings before the committee and before the subcommittee, they said they would be glad to have the amount increased.

Mr. MADDEN. What recommendation was made with respect to the lieutenants?

Mr. MAPES. Their original recommendation was, I think, $2,000.

Mr. MADDEN. That is what the committee recommends?

Mr. MAPES. That is what the committee recommends.

Mr. MADDEN. What was the recommendation of the commissioners as to sergeants?

Mr. MAPES. One thousand eight hundred dollars, and the committee left it at the same figure.

Mr. MADDEN. What recommendation was made as to the first 493 first-class privates?

Mr. MAPES. The commissioners recommended $1,560, and the committee raised the recommendation by $100.

Mr. MADDEN. And as to the 86 privates, second class, what was the recommendation?

Mr. MAPES. One thousand four hundred and forty dollars, and the committee raised it to $1,560.

Mr. MADDEN. And the 225 privates, first class?

Mr. MAPES. The commissioners recommended $1,320, and the committee raised it to $1,460. The gentleman will notice that the committee has raised the recommendations of the commissioners in very few instances except as to the patrolmen.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 1, noes 44.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. GARD. I offer an amendment on page 2, line 23, to strike out the figures "$480" and insert the figures "$360."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 23, strike out the figures "$480" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$360."

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, it is one of the inalienable rights of all American citizens to criticize the police force, whether the police force be a metropolitan force of one man in the town of Squeedunk or a force of 10,000 men in the metropolis of New York, so that we always view very lightly criticisms made in a general way about different police forces. My observation of the police force in the city of Washington and its control is that, so far as the general average of police forces go, Washington has a good police force.

I would say that the question of the superintendent of police is a greater one than the average Member thinks it is. The superintendent of police is not an officer. He is not a man who goes out and individually makes arrests, but he is an executive. He is the man who dictates and maintains a policy, and so far as the present occupant of the position of superintendent of police in Washington is concerned, I think everybody must agree that he is a man of high character and of excellent moral standing. The fact that he was not previously a policeman does not enter so much into the question, to my mind, because I think there are many elements other than that of mere service on the police force which enter into the question of making a man advisable for the executive position of chief of police. The amendment which I have offered is founded upon the original bill as recommended by the commissioners, embodied in section 7983, and the argument of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]; because, while the amendment is inconsiderable in amount, it simply establishes a policy to increase without authorization. If I were disposed to make any criticism of the police force in the city of Washington it would be that it seems to me that their first occupation and, indeed, that of nearly every employee in the District of Columbia—their first and continuing occupation is to see how they are going to get more salary. This particular instance where a man received $480 per annum because he rides a motorcycle is not justified by conditions or circumstances. In other words, a man receives in a year probably what would pay for two motorcycles, certainly for a motorcycle and a half. There is no garage expense about a motorcycle. The expense incident to the upkeep of a horse is not present with a motorcycle. It is more nearly analogous to the upkeep of a bicycle, where $60 is allowed in the commissioners' bill and $60 in the bill as reported by the committee.

I do not desire to detain the membership of the House, because I realize that this is a small matter, but it is a matter where the question of policy is to be considered, and the policy to consider is the policy of service; and where it goes clear beyond necessities, it seems to me the amount in the original bill should be adhered to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. GARD] there were—ayes 15, noes 29.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That no member of the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia shall be or become a member of any organization, or of an organization affiliated with another organization, which holds, claims, or exercises the right to demand of any of its membership obedience to an order to strike or cease work for any cause. Upon sufficient proof to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia that any member of the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia has violated the provisions of this section, it shall be the duty of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to immediately discharge such member from the service.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, this is a very important section indeed. I think we ought to have the full membership here, and I raise the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Ninety Members present, not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, tellers have been demanded.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that tellers are not in order on a point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks he was too quick in declaring that there was no quorum present.

Mr. BLANTON. But having once declared it, does not that fix the status that there is no quorum present?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to think the gentleman is right, that having once declared there is no quorum present there is nothing to do except for the Clerk to call the roll.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Michigan rise?

Mr. MAPES. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. BLANTON. The Chair has already directed the Clerk to call the roll.

Mr. MAPES. But the Clerk had not begun to call the roll.

Mr. WALSH. He has been ordered to call the roll.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan moves that the Committee do now rise.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. The Chair having declared that there was no quorum present and having directed the Clerk to call the roll, I submit that it is too late now to make a motion that the committee rise, but that the Clerk must proceed with the calling of the roll.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, a motion that the committee rise is in order. It does not require a quorum for the committee to rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk had not begun the roll call. Therefore it is not too late to move that the committee rise. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] moves that the committee do now rise.

Mr. MAPES. On that, Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. MAPES and Mr. BLANTON.

Mr. BLANTON. I request the Chair to appoint some one else. I have a constituent here who wishes to see me on business.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will appoint the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BRIGGS].

Mr. MAPES and Mr. BRIGGS took their places as tellers.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 1, noes 106.

Accordingly the motion that the committee rise was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum is present.

Mr. GOULD. Has the reading of the section been completed?

The CHAIRMAN. The reading of the section has been completed.

Mr. GOULD. Since the request was propounded to me by the gentleman from Texas in regard to the wording of the section I have been investigating its scope, and I want to offer an amendment as an individual and not as a member of the committee or as a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report:

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GOULD: Page 3, strike out lines 10, 11, and 12 and all of line 13 down to and including the word "cause" and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Or any labor organization or trade-union, or a member of any organization or union which is affiliated in any manner, directly or indirectly, with any labor organization or trade-union."

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the amendment of the gentleman from New York meets the difficulty in this case. I want to subscribe to the doctrine that a member of the police force ought not to be a member of any organization which exercises over him a control superior to that of his Government. In other words, a man ought not to belong to the police force or any other governmental agency and at the same time be subject to an organization whose orders can take him away from his work. The objection I find to this section, which I have discussed with the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Texas, is that it is indefinite in its character and may have the effect of prohibiting members of the police force from belonging to an organization of their own.

Mr. GOULD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEE. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GOULD. I have a subsequent amendment which I propose to offer to cover that point.

Mr. BEE. I do not believe this Congress ought to pass a law specifying by name labor unions or trades councils. In the first place, I do not think that labor unions or trades councils are deserving of specific legislation to be directed against them by name.

Members of the police force should owe allegiance to no organization that is superior to the Government or that will interfere with the functions of the Government; but my objections to the amendment is that we ought not to direct that they shall not hold membership in a labor union or a trades council because it is possible that there may be men on the police force who have been for many years members of different labor unions and trade councils—and are not now active because of their membership on the police force—and the passage of this amendment would compel them to surrender their membership, to surrender inherent rights that have vested in them, their rights in insurance policies and protection which have come from their membership. I do not believe that the Congress of the United States ought by direct enactment to prohibit membership in labor unions or trade councils. The Congress of the United States ought to prohibit members of the police force and members of Government agencies owing an allegiance to the Government from belonging to any organization that makes that organization superior to their obedience to the Government and at the same time not limiting the right of members of the police force to join a charitable, social, or insurance organization or anything else, or, if need be, combining with a national or State organization of policemen all over the country for their betterment, for their upbuilding, for their usefulness, always with the cardinal principle as a beacon light that they shall not join or form any organization that interferes with their allegiance or obligation to the Government. For that reason I do not think the amendment of the gentleman from New York ought to be adopted.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from New York. I am a little surprised that a member of the committee should have offered an amendment, in view of the fact that I understood the committee had fully agreed on the language of this section. I think the language of the section is wise, proper, and well considered, and that it will accomplish exactly what we intend to accomplish without injuring the feelings of anyone.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. BLACK. As I understand the purpose of the section, it is to prohibit affiliation by the police force with the American Federation of Labor.

Mr. MONDELL. Not necessarily or exclusively.

Mr. BLACK. That is one of the objects.

Mr. MONDELL. Let us see what the object is; the gentleman need not ask my opinion. He can read the language of the provision.

Mr. BLACK. I am not asking the gentleman's opinion; that is a common understanding.

Mr. MONDELL. Let me read the section; the gentleman is a man of judgment:

No member of the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia shall become a member of any organization—

Now, for the purpose of clarity, let us drop a line—which holds, claims, or exercises the right to demand of any of its membership obedience to an order to strike or cease work for any cause.

And then go back to the parenthetical clause—or of any organization affiliated with another organization which holds, claims, or exercises the right to demand of any of its membership obedience to an order to strike or cease work for any cause.

What is it we seek? We seek to prohibit the police from belonging to any organization which in itself, or by or through another organization, is associated or affiliated with any organization that claims any right to call them from their service. In other words, we prohibit a divided control over the police. We are all, I take it, of the opinion that the guardians of the law should only have one allegiance and that is to the people, to the law, to the authorities; and we say that in order that their allegiance may be undivided they may not belong to an organization which itself claims the right to call them from their work, or any organization that affiliates with or is associated with an organization that claims that right.

We have accomplished in the language of the provision exactly what we all desired to accomplish. And what is more, we have taken the position that organized labor has always taken in this matter until very recently. For up to last June the great organized labor bodies of this country declined to grant charters to police organizations. They held—and I think the overwhelming majority still believe—that policemen should not be members of organizations that claim the right to order their members to strike.

The language of the section clearly prohibits the thing intended to be prohibited. It does it in a way that is definite and in a way that is not offensive, and I think that in itself is worth while. There is not a Member of this House or a Member of Congress but what is friendly to labor organizations properly organized and exercising control and authority within proper lines. We do take the position, however, and I assume we are united on that, the position that practically all good citizens have taken up, that the police organizations and policemen must not affiliate directly or indirectly with any who may claim the right to call them from their duty, that may claim authority or control over them to call them from their duty. The guardians of the law must have and hold allegiance to the law and to constituted authority, and to none other. They should have no affiliation that under any circumstances might embarrass them in the performance of their duty.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. SNELL having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendment joint resolution (H. J. Res. 151) to provide additional compensation for employees of the Postal Service and making an appropriation therefor, had asked a conference with the House of Representatives on the said joint resolution and amendment thereto, and had appointed Mr. TOWNSEND, Mr. STERLING, and Mr. BANKHEAD as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

METROPOLITAN POLICE OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I rise also in opposition to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULD], and I think it is well for the committee to understand just what we are doing. That which the committee originally had in mind, I take it, was to prevent strikes on the police force. What is done by this amendment offered by the gentleman from New York is to strike out that very beneficent provision and have nothing in the law about that at all, but to strike out on page 3, lines 10, 11, 12, and 13, including the "cause," so that it will read like this:

That no member of the Metropolitan police force of the District of Columbia shall be or become a member of any labor organization or trade-union, or a member of any organization or union which is affiliated in any manner directly or indirectly with any labor organization or trade-union.

You may just as well understand, once and for all, those who intend to support this, that no man can support this amendment unless he believes that no workingman has a right to belong to a trade-union. That is a proposition I dispute, because I say that every man within the law has a right to choose his own association, whether he be in labor or in capital. This amendment seeks to provide that if a man is a member of a labor union he can not get on the police force in the city of Washington, and where would you get your policemen? Nearly all of the good young men between 21 and 30 years of age, from which policemen should be recruited, members of the crafts and trades, belong to unions, and they take great pride in their trade-unions; and to say that because they belong to a trade-union, not because they hold the union greater than their police obligation or their obligation in employment in any sense, but because they belong to a trade organization, they shall not have a position on the Metropolitan police force of the District of Columbia would be an outrage. I am sure that the Congress of the United States is not now, when labor and capital are meeting down here in the Pan American Building in a sincere effort to reconcile differences, going to say that a labor man shall not have a right to employment under the Government of the United States, because, perchance, some years ago he belonged to a labor union, or, indeed, now belongs to a labor union—not going to penalize a man or close the door of honest and honorable employment because he belongs to a trade organization.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman is satisfied with the provision in the bill as it is?

Mr. GARD. The provision in the bill has for its purpose the prevention of strikes on the police force. That provision is stricken out in this amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, and language inserted that nobody, if he be or has been a member of a union, shall become a member of this police force.

Mr. CANNON. I do not so read it, but I want to ask the gentleman a question. He is satisfied with the bill as it is, without any amendment? So am I. What is the use of mentioning anybody, since the language covers any organization that has a right to command the action of the police?

Mr. GARD. The object is that when one takes an oath to support the Constitution of the United States and to carry into effect the laws of the city, that is a binding oath upon him, if he is a member of the police force, and he ought not to strike, and he ought not to quit his police employment and leave the public safety to the hazard of the criminal and the looter, but my strong objection is to the amendment which seeks to punish a man and restrict his employment on the sole ground that he belongs to a trade organization.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman may have further time.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARD. I am now speaking of the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, and I oppose the amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I am thoroughly satisfied with the bill without amendment, so far as my vote is concerned.

Mr. GOULD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I desire to offer.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard upon this bill.

Mr. MAPES. If there is an amendment to be offered, I withdraw the motion.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word or two, and I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment that I want to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas has a perfecting amendment, which takes precedence over a pro forma amendment. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 10, after the word "organization," insert "of police employees," and strike out "or of an organization affiliated with another organization," and on line 13, after the word "cause," insert "or of an organization affiliated with any organization not composed entirely of employees of municipal, State, or United States Government," so that the section as amended will read:

"That no member of the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia shall be or become a member of any organization of police employees which holds, claims, or exercises the right to demand of any of its membership obedience to an order to strike or cease work for any cause, or of an organization affiliated with any organization not composed entirely of employees of municipal, State, or the United States Government."

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, the section as it is now contained in the bill has two provisions.

In the first instance, it prohibits the Metropolitan police employees of the District of Columbia from belonging to an organization of their own which claims the right to call a strike; or, in the second place, it prohibits them from belonging to any organization that is affiliated with another organization that claims a similar right. Now, so far so good; but as I understand and interpret the criticism that has been voiced by thoughtful men all over the country it is that the peace officers of a municipality or a State or of the Federal Government ought not to be permitted to affiliate with organizations similar to the American Federation of Labor. Now, it may be the thought of gentlemen of the House that the provision of this bill in section 2 would prohibit the Metropolitan police from forming an organization and then affiliating with the American Federation of Labor. But I contend that the section has no such meaning as that. The only organization that would come under the ban of affiliation is the one that definitely claims the right to call a strike of its members, and Mr. Gompers has said repeatedly before Members of the House and the Senate, and Mr. Morrison, the secretary of the American Federation of Labor, has said repeatedly before committees of the House and Senate, that the American Federation of Labor has not the right to call a strike of any labor organization; that that is a matter left solely within the jurisdiction of the respective labor organizations, such as the Western Federation of Miners, the United Steel Workers' organization, or members of the different crafts. They are the ones who must call a strike, they are the ones who must call their members back to work, not the American Federation of Labor, and therefore this section 2 as written in the bill, we may as well understand now, will not prevent the affiliation of police organizations with the American Federation of Labor, and I desire to say that any representative of labor, if there be such that might be thus referred to in the House, will admit that proposition.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. I will.

Mr. TILLMAN. The gentleman quotes a labor leader as having made the statement to which he referred. I will ask if this leader has not also stated, as quoted in the press, that if there should be enacted a law against labor unions striking that the labor unions would not respect the law?

Mr. BLACK. Yes; and if I have time I will refer to that, not in criticism of Mr. Gompers especially but as bearing upon the question we have under discussion.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. I will.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will not the purpose of the gentleman be accomplished by omitting that part of the amendment following the word "cause"?

Mr. BLACK. I did not offer the same amendment——

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I understand that; but the gentleman has inserted a provision which would not accomplish his purpose, it seems to me; that is, he is proposing to insert certain words after the word "cause," and those words would operate to prevent a member of the police force who belonged to a trade organization—say, a carpenter who belonged to a trade organization—from becoming a member of the police force. That is not what the gentleman is after at all.

Mr. BLACK. No; I did not intend to do that, and I do not think that is what my amendment does. My amendment, in the first place, does this, and that is the intention: In the first place, it prevents them from belonging to an organization of their own which claims and asserts the right to strike.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLACK. I would like to have five minutes more to explain my amendment, and then I will have finished.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to speak for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BLACK. Now, I simply want the gentlemen to bear this in mind: My amendment adds "police employees" to the word "organization," in line 10, so that it applies only to an organization of police employees and applies to them only whenever they belong to an organization of their own that claims the right to strike.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. In just a moment. I think we are all agreed upon that. I do not think there is any difference of opinion that a police organization ought to be such as does not claim the right to order a strike. Now, upon the next proposition we may not be agreed, and that is as to their affiliations. Now, my amendment would strike out the words "or of an organization affiliated with any organization," in lines 10 and 11, and transpose them to after the word "cause," in line 13, so that it will read, "or of a police organization affiliated with any other organization not composed entirely of municipal, State, or United States Government employees." Now, I ask unanimous consent to add to my amendment, to the latter part of it, after the word "or," the words "of a police organizaion." My amendment as it now reads, if adopted, will prevent policemen of the District of Columbia from affiliating with any outside labor organization.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to change his amendment as indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, will the Clerk report the amendment as modified?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment as revised by the gentleman from Texas.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 10, after the word "organization," insert "of police employees," and strike out "or of an organization affiliated with another organization"; and on line 13, after the word "cause," insert "or of a police organization affiliated with any other organization not composed entirely of employees of a municipal, State, or the United States Government," so that the section as amended will read: "That no member of the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia shall be or become a member of any organization of police employees which holds, claims, or exercises the right to demand of any of its membership obedience to an order to strike or cease work for any cause, or of a police organization affiliated with any other organization not composed entirely of empoyees of a municipal, State, or the Government of the United States."

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. Would not the gentleman's purpose be accomplished if he would simply transpose the language "or of any organization affiliated with any such organization"; strike it out where it appears and put it after the word "cause"?

Mr. BLACK. No; it would be the same. The objection to that is this: The American Federation of Labor does not have the power to call a strike or stop one after it is called. And, therefore, if you leave that limitation in the bill as it now appears, then the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia could still affiliate with the American Federation of Labor. I have no fight to make on the American Federation of Labor within its proper sphere, but I am positive in my convictions that police organizations should not be permitted to affiliate with it.

Mr. BEE. I wanted to ask my colleague if the effect of this would not be to compel a man, suppose he has been a tinner or a plasterer for 10 or 20 years, and goes on the police force, and is invested with rights under his union, to surrender his rights, and after he had served as a policeman he would have to go all over the matter again in order to get into his trade?

Mr. BLACK. No; it would not. It first prohibits him from belonging to a police organization which allows him to strike. Bear in mind the language of my amendment refers to police organizations and not otherwise. Next it says that he shall not belong to any police organization which affiliates with any organization except one of Government employees. Now, is not that just what we want to do? It does not prohibit him as an individual from continuing his membership in a union when he has, for instance, insurance benefits which he does not care to relinquish, but it does say that he shall not be a member of a police organization which is affiliated with any organization except one of municipal, State, or Federal employees.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. I will.

Mr. REAVIS. The gentleman made the statement that Mr. Gompers is authority for the information that the American Federation of Labor has no power or authority to call a strike.

Mr. BLACK. I have seen where he stated that repeatedly.

Mr. REAVIS. An authority to call a strike would rest, say, with the Western Federation of Miners?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. And is the American Federation of Labor affiliated with that organization?

Mr. BLACK. It is the organization that grants them their charter as a member of the American Federation of Labor.

Mr. REAVIS. So it is affiliated with those different organizations.

Mr. BLACK. I think it would hardly be correct to express it that way.

Mr. REAVIS. Reading from section 2—

That no member of the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia shall be or become a member of any organization, or of an organization affiliated with another organization, which holds, claims, or exercises the right to demand of any of its membership obedience to an order to strike.

I was wondering if the American Federation of Labor, under the gentleman's construction, affiliated with an organization that has a right to call a strike, the language of the bill as now prepared would not prohibit a policeman from being a member of the American Federation of Labor?

Mr. BLACK. I will say that I read that language carefully, and I do not believe that the language of the bill as it now stands would prohibit a police organization from getting its charter from the American Federation of Labor. And as it is admitted that the American Federation of Labor has no power to call strikes within itself, then where is there any prohibition in this bill preventing the Metropolitan police from affiliating with it?

Mr. REAVIS. It would prohibit the policemen from being affiliated with any organization that is affiliated with an organization that has the power to call a strike, and if the American Federation of Labor has affiliation with an organization that has the power, under that power as now drawn the Metropolitan police could not belong to such an organization of labor, because it is affiliated with an organization having such powers.

Mr. BLACK. That is not the language. The language does not say it prohibits a policeman from entering an organization which itself is affiliated with an organization that is affiliated with still another organization that has the right to call a strike. The language is not so circuitous as that.

Mr. REAVIS. Permit me to read the sentence:

That no member of the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia shall be or become a member of any organization, or of an organization affiliated with another organization, which holds, claims, or exercises the right to demand of any of its membership obedience to an order to strike or cease work for any cause.

Now, if the American Federation of Labor is affiliated with other organizations that have a right to declare a strike, then no member of this police force can belong to the American Federation of Labor.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I would like one minute, to ask the gentleman from Nebraska a question. Does the American Federation of Labor order strikes, or does it hold it can order them?

Mr. REAVIS. I am accepting the statement of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] that it can not, although I have no information on it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN] permit me to ask him that question, because I do not know? Does the American Federation of Labor, as such organization, claim or exercise a right to demand of any of its membership an obedience to an order to strike?

Mr. NOLAN. It does not, either directly or indirectly.

Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the membership of the committee that, first of all, I do not believe any police organization or any organization of firemen ought to expect to have the right to strike or to exercise the right. [Applause.] I do not believe any governmental organization of men that has control of the interests of life and property ought to exercise the right to strike, and it should not do it either directly or indirectly. I do not think any organization of policemen in this country or any organization of firemen should do it. Recent history has shown us that outside of affiliation with the American Federation of Labor, and months before the American Federation of Labor admitted the police or firemen and similar organizations, there had been strikes of police and firemen in the larger cities of this country, and it did not seem to create the comment that was recently created by the Boston police strike or the organization of the policemen of Washington into the American Federation of Labor. Never until they were about to be affiliated with the American Federation of Labor did anyone pay any attention to police or firemen strikes.

Now, it did not make any difference; it did not make strikes any better or any worse. But that has been the history of these policemen's and firemen's organizations. My idea as to the police and fire organizations in their desire to affiliate is that when they were outside of the pale of organized labor they had these strikes, but they did not succeed in getting the conditions that they contended for, and they sought to affiliate themselves with some organization that in the municipality or in the State or nationally might be able to help them to secure the things they were contending for—to help them secure better conditions of labor and better pay and better treatment from the municipal authorities or other agencies who had authority over them. Now I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I would like to ask the gentleman for information. Has there ever been a strike among policemen except the strike recently in Boston?

Mr. NOLAN. Within the last eight or nine months the police force of Cincinnati went on strike. Last year for a period of several weeks the firemen of Pittsburgh were on strike. We have had a number of firemen's strikes throughout the country for wages and better conditions, so that the Boston police strike was not the first strike of policemen; it was the first strike after policemen were admitted to the American Federation of Labor; but the strike was not called by the federation, as they had no power over this police organization. I agree with the interpretation of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] that this section as written by the committee will not deprive the police of Washington of the right of belonging to an organization in affiliation with the American Federation of Labor. What the section as written will do will be to prohibit a member of the Metropolitan police force from belonging to any labor organization even though he was a member for years before joining the force. Some of the labor organizations have beneficial features, such as sick, death, disability, and insurance. Take, for instance, the railroad trainmen, engineers, and conductors. They have an organization which has a great beneficial feature attached to it. It has an insurance feature. A man withdraws from that organization, we will say, for the purpose of going on the Metropolitan police force here. Under section 2 of this bill it is provided that he must cease his membership and direct affiliation with such an organization. Even though he paid dues for years to obtain standing for these beneficial features, he must give them up, or else give up his place on the police force.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman no doubt listened to the reading of my amendment. Does the gentleman think that the amendment I offered would make it necessary for him to withdraw from a labor organization as an individual?

Mr. NOLAN. You leave language in this bill that would force him to give up his membership. I think a slight amendment here would clarify the situation. If you would take line 10 and strike out the rest of the line, after the word "organization," striking out the following language, "organization affiliated with another organization," and then go down to line 13 and after the word "work" insert the words "as a member of such Metropolitan police force," I think you would clarify the situation, and you would not leave in this section any language that would prevent a man from holding membership in a union of which he had been a member for many years before belonging to the police force, and it will not impose any obligation on him under his oath of office, and that will accomplish all you desire to accomplish.

Mr. BLACK. Let me interrupt the gentleman for one word more.

Mr. NOLAN. Let me read the paragraph as it would then read:

That no member of the Metropolitan police force of the District of Columbia shall be or become a member of any organization which holds, claims, or exercises the right to demand of any of its membership obedience to an order to strike or cease work as a member of such Metropolitan police force for any cause.

Mr. BLACK. That would not prevent their affiliation with this outside labor organization?

Mr. NOLAN. No; and these outside labor organizations would not impose upon them any obligation to cease work.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman looks at it from one viewpoint and I look at it from another. My amendment does not prevent him from belonging to one of these outside organizations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLACK. Both clauses of my amendment use the words "that he shall not belong to any police organization which has the right to strike or affiliate with any outside organization." It does not provide that as an individual he shall not be allowed to retain his membership in these different organizations.

Mr. NOLAN. I did not get that second part of it.

Now, let us see what the Congress of the United States is doing in this instance. When this subject first came up there was considerable discussion in the newspapers and it caused a lot of comment. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia gave the members of the Metropolitan police force a certain stipulated length of time in which to cease their membership in a certain organization. That time was about up. The members of the Metropolitan police force employed attorneys and they went into the courts of the District of Columbia and enjoined the District Commissioners from enforcing that order. Then, prior to the day upon which the order came up in court, or the case came to trial, the President of the United States intervened, and he asked the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and the superintendent of the Metropolitan police force to allow this thing to rest until such time as the industrial conference that is now sitting in Washington could take place, at which time he figured that this entire subject of police unions and their affiliation with the American labor movement could be discussed and some pronouncement made thereon.

Now, that was sufficient for the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. It was sufficient for the men themselves, and it was sufficient for Judge Gould, the judge of the court here in which that case was being tried, to suspend the trial of that case until such time as this industrial conference could be held. Now, if it is a good thing for labor in this country to obey the wishes of the President of the United States to declare a truce and suspend judgment—and they have done it in a number of instances—until the orderly processes of the Federal Government can function and this industrial conference can be held, why should the Committee on the District of Columbia of the House of Representatives meddle with this proposition at this particular time? If it was good for the policemen, if it was good for the District Commissioners, and good for the Federal judge to suspend their activities to settle this question, why can not we as a House of Representatives do the same thing? If we want to set a good example in the matter of orderly procedure, why can we not do it? Why can we not wait until this industrial conference gets through with its work, just as the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and just as the Federal judge are doing?

Mr. LAYTON. Why should not this lawmaking body pass laws without waiting upon other people who do not make laws? [Applause.]

Mr. NOLAN. I will answer that in this way: I expect, and I think everybody else expects, and we will all be disappointed if some good does not come as a result of that conference. I do not know whether it will come in the way of making recommendations, as far as legislation is concerned, to meet the industrial situation that is prevailing in this country to-day. I do know that this House of Representatives is doing nothing to meet that industrial situation. It might be that men who know both sides of this question, it might be that the great body that is in between the two conflicting parties, the public, may be able to make some recommendations to this House and to the Senate that may be the subject of legislation. I think if they do and they are agreed upon it, this House will do as it ought to do and will try to meet the recommendations of this industrial conference.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. NOLAN. May I have one minute more?

Mr. GARRETT. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Michigan). The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from California be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. NOLAN. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GARRETT. I understood the gentleman to say in the beginning of his remarks that he did not believe that policemen should have the right to strike or if they did have that right they should not exercise it.

Mr. NOLAN. That is true.

Mr. GARRETT. I understood the gentleman to say further that he thought all the Members of the House felt that way. I think so, too. Now, that being the case, and this bill being before us, why does the gentleman appeal that action be deferred upon this, since we are all agreed that the right to strike ought to be taken away from them? [Applause.]

Mr. NOLAN. I do that for the simple reason that I believe the House is going to do it anyway, but I want to call their attention to the facts in connection with the case. I call the attention of the House to the fact that this committee gave consideration to it, notwithstanding the request of the President of the United States that judgment be suspended upon this proposition until such time as the industrial conference could act. I had rather see the whole section stricken out and await the recommendations of the industrial conference.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. REAVIS. Would not the only practical effect of postponing action be to refuse these policemen the increase in salary?

Mr. NOLAN. No. I think they ought to have their salaries increased.

Mr. REAVIS. And if we postpone action their salaries will not be increased.

Mr. NOLAN. I had no reference to section 1 at all. I am referring to section 2, which relates to the right of these men to belong to an organization of their own choosing, no matter with whom they may be affiliated. That is why the injunction was issued and served on the District Commissioners.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I think it is highly essential that we get the facts about this section as they really are. I understood the gentleman from California to say that, in his understanding of section 2, it does not prohibit the policemen from affiliating with the American Federation of Labor.

Mr. NOLAN. I am inclined to believe that.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. As I read it, affiliation means association. The police organization of the District of Columbia would be associated with the National Association of Machinists, for instance, which has the right to order strikes. Therefore, under the reading of section 2, would not the policemen be prohibited from affiliating with the American Federation of Labor?

Mr. NOLAN. I do not believe it would go that far. It says:

SEC. 2. That no member of the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia shall be or become a member of any organization or of an organization affiliated with another organization which holds, claims, or exercises the right to demand of any of its membership obedience to an order to strike or cease work for any cause.

I think that means that they can not belong to the blacksmiths' union or any other union, no matter how many years any member may have belonged to it before he got on the Metropolitan police force, and that it would deprive any policeman of any right he has as a member of that organization, notwithstanding the fact that he might be a member of its benevolent feature.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. That is true; but at the same time they would be associated with the National Association of Machinists.

Mr. NOLAN. If that could be the construction placed upon it, yes; but that is not my interpretation.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. That is what I wanted to be sure about.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. Does the gentleman mean to say that an organization is not affiliated with its subordinate organizations? It is admitted by the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN] and by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK], I believe, that the American Federation of Labor is the parent of all the subordinate lodges or organizations. Does the gentleman claim that it is not affiliated with and has no relation with these others?

Mr. NOLAN. I do not think the language of this section would be interpreted to go that far.

Mr. LAYTON. Would you say that a father has no affiliation with his offspring?

Mr. NOLAN. If you want to bring up a hypothetical case, you can stretch your imagination to almost any extent.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. NOLAN. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a statement of the position of the American Federation of Labor on this subject of the policemen of the District of Columbia and their affiliation with the American Federation of Labor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by including the matter referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

HEARING BEFORE COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, SEPTEMBER 4, 1919. 11 A. M.

Mr. GOMPERS. I have asked for this opportunity of a hearing before the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for the purpose of presenting to you some thoughts and facts for consideration, with a view of having you, as Commissioners of the District, reconsider your action on the regulation which you recently adopted regarding the policemen organizing into unions, or becoming members thereof, or of remaining members of union organizations, or of belonging to any organization affiliated with a labor organization, and, upon failure to comply with this order or regulation of the commissioners, the men would be summarily discharged; and that compliance with this order or regulation shall be had individually by each member of the police force on or before Saturday noon or Saturday night, September 6. The regulation to which I refer, without my reading it, may be placed in the record.

Mr. BROWNLOW. Sunday night, September 7. Perhaps it would be just as well to put this amended regulation in the record if you want to.

Mr. GOMPERS. The amended regulation—it may be an amendment to other regulations.

Mr. GARDNER. That is the amended regulation.

Mr. GOMPERS. But this is the one that burst upon the people of the District and which seemed to have no connection with any other arrangement or regulation. It is absolutely new and unprecedented.

"General Order No. 56.

"Circular: The following copy of an order of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia is published for the information and guidance of members of the Metropolitan police department. Pursuant to their statement of policy adopted on August 22, 1919, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia hereby make and adopt the following rules and regulations for the government of the Metropolitan police department of the District of Columbia:

"1. No member of the Metropolitan police department shall join or become a member of any organization of policemen which is affiliated directly or indirectly with any other labor organization; nor shall any member of the Metropolitan police department retain membership in any organization of policemen which is affiliated directly or indirectly with any other labor organization after September 7, 1919.

"2. Every member of the Metropolitan police department shall make a statement in writing on a form prepared for the purpose and shall file the same with the commanding officer of the precinct, division, or bureau to which he is assigned not later than 12 o'clock midnight, September 7, 1919; such statement to contain a categorical answer to the following inquiry: Are you a member of any organization of policemen which is affiliated directly or indirectly with any other labor organization?

"3. Each and every such statement as filed with the several commanding officers shall at once be sent to the major and superintendent of the Metropolitan police department.

"4. Any member of the Metropolitan police department who joins or becomes a member of any organization of policemen which is affiliated directly or indirectly with any other labor organization, or who retains membership in the same after September 7, 1919, or who fails, refuses, or neglects to make and file the written statement hereinbefore required, shall be deemed guilty of willful noncompliance with the rules and regulations adopted by the Board of Commissioners for the government of the Metropolitan police department, and upon conviction thereof shall be removed from the said Metropolitan police department."

Mr. GOMPERS. For years many policemen, many policemen's organizations which had been formed—providential, beneficial, and societies of that kind—by personal appeals, by correspondence with officers of the American Federation and with representatives of the American Federation in many of the cities of the country, have asked us to recognize them as unions and to organize them into unions and to issue charters to them as affiliated with the American Federation of Labor. For years we have held off. The requests and applications became so widespread and from so many sources that at the convention of the American Federation of Labor, held at Atlantic City June 9 to 26, 1919, or just about two months and a week ago, a resolution was adopted to issue charters to all bona fide organizations of policemen. That resolution was adopted during the last days of the convention. And within that period we have received 36 or 37 applications up to last night at the closing hours of our office. I have not seen the mail this morning and do not know what it contains—how many applications, if any—but 33 charters have been issued to 33 bona fide local unions of policemen in various cities; in nearly every one of them the membership is a hundred per cent.

Mr. GARDNER. A hundred per cent of the force in the city?

Mr. GOMPERS. In the city; yes, sir. I am perfectly willing to leave the list of the organizations of policemen to whom we have issued charters for the record. You will see we have not anything to hide; nothing to disguise. I just want to read the names of the cities where we have issued charters to unions of policemen in order that you may see the tremendous spread of territory between the local unions which have been organized.

No fees paid; no tax paid.

Mr. GOMPERS. I want you to note the distances between the cities where they have been organized.

Now, there must have been something in the minds of you gentlemen, as commissioners, as to what you thought good and sufficient reasons for your taking this action—forbidding policemen to organize a union or to have that union affiliated directly or indirectly with any other labor organization——

Mr. BROWNLOW. Not forbidden to organize a union, but organizing one which was affiliated and would embarrass——

Mr. GOMPERS (interposing). One which was affiliated with any other labor organization?

Mr. BROWNLOW. Yes.

Mr. GOMPERS. There must have been some thought behind which prompted that action, and that thought could be no other than that the affiliation of the policemen's union to any other labor organization would be detrimental to the force in the performance of the duty of the force; that it was violating the fundamental principle of civic duty and responsibility. Now, there are but two organizations known in America which are regarded as labor organizations; one is the American Federation of Labor and the other is the Industrial Workers of the World—the I. W. W.'s.

Mr. BROWNLOW. I may say that at the time we had no thought of the I. W. W.'s. We did think of other local organizations, particularly the City Employees' Association, not necessarily affiliated with the American Federation of Labor.

Mr. MORRISON. That is the Federal employees?

Mr. BROWNLOW. No; the City Employees' Association, which is not affiliated with the American Federation of Labor.

Mr. MORRISON. Oh, yes.

Mr. BROWNLOW. Which is an organization——

Mr. MORRISON. You mean Mr. Hurley's organization?

Mr. BROWNLOW. Yes.

Mr. MORRISON. Oh, I see.

Mr. GOMPERS. Such an organization, which has neither backbone nor the temerity to speak for itself. I do not know what the commissioners had in mind when they adopted this resolution. I only know what the record shows and what the regulation shows.

Mr. BROWNLOW. Did you read the statement of policy which the commissioners adopted and issued on the 22d of August?

Mr. GOMPERS. I did not. On the 22d of August I had not arrived in the United States from my most recent trip.

Mr. BROWNLOW. I know you had not; but that was the first statement of policy that we made when we first asked these gentlemen to withdraw from their affiliations.

Mr. MORRISON. Pardon me, Mr. Gompers. The statement was made—set forth, as I read it—that you did not want to have a division of authority, and that you thought if they organized into a union and affiliated with the American Federation of Labor in the event of a strike that they would not perform their duties as policemen and would be friendly to the strikers.

Mr. BROWNLOW. I think I had better read what I said, Mr. Morrison. [Reading:]

"The commissioners, after careful consideration of the whole question of the organization of a policemen's union affiliated with any other labor organization, have reached the conclusion that they must take the necessary steps to assure entire and complete independence of the police department.

"They approve heartily of the principle of collective bargaining, and they welcome the organization of members of the police force for the purpose of collective representation, mutual support, and organized effort to increase their salaries or improve their working conditions.

"They must, however, withhold their consent from any project to connect such an organization of members of the police department with any other labor organization.

"The fact that the policemen's union is bound by a 'no-strike' provision is an earnest of the intention of its members not to resort to a strike as a weapon of compelling its demands. But if it be affiliated with other organizations which do contemplate the use of the strike in an emergency, every member of the police force who is a member of the union would be liable to the charge, however falsely made, of favoritism in the performance of duty in the event of industrial trouble involving the organization with which it is affiliated.

"Authority, especially here in the National Capital, at all times must be represented by a police force that has no connection with any organization but the constituted agencies of the Government.

"This decision must not be interpreted to mean that the commissioners are opposed to labor organizations, nor must it be taken to mean that they are unwilling to meet representatives of any organization of policemen. It is only what it purports to be—a statement of the decision of the commissioners that the organization of policemen, a body of men sworn to enforce the law impartially under all circumstances, must be an organization of policemen and nothing more; that it must not be connected with any other labor organization."

Mr. BROWNLOW. That was the statement of policy adopted on the 22d of August and given out to the press on the 23d.

Mr. GOMPERS. The statement of policy just read simply accentuates what I desire to impress upon the minds of the commissioners. There are but two labor organizations in the United States—one the American Federation of Labor and the other the I. W. W.'s. The American Federation of Labor, with organizations affiliated, has nearly 4,000,000 members and the I. W. W.'s with perhaps 25,000 or 30,000 members. The policemen have chosen to become affiliated with the American Federation of Labor. The statement of the commission as to its policy justifies my statement that the Commissioners have no knowledge of the actual character of the American Federation of Labor. In one part of that statement of policy there is contained the statement that the policemen's union can not be affiliated, directly or indirectly, with any other labor organization that has for its purpose the strike.

Mr. BROWNLOW. It does not say that has for its purpose the use of the strike in an emergency.

Mr. GOMPERS. It implies the use of a strike in an emergency. The fact is that the American Federation of Labor has never in its existence of 39 years, directly or indirectly, ordered or carried on or had for its purpose a strike.

Mr. BROWNLOW. I know that.

Mr. GOMPERS. I have been president of the American Federation of Labor for 35 of the 39 years of its existence. Mr. Morrison has been secretary for 23 years. Mr. Duncan has been vice president for 26 or 27 years. There are other members of the executive council who have been there for from 15 to 20 years. Notwithstanding the unsupported opinion which many have as to the power of the executive council of the American Federation of Labor or the power of the president of the American Federation of Labor, neither I, as its president, nor the executive council ever ordered, directed, or authorized a strike of two men or more or one man. May I call your attention to a few of the matters which I think you will find of interest?

Mr. ROBERTS (reading). "The object of the American Federation of Labor, section 1"——

Mr. GARDNER. Is that your by-laws?

Mr. GOMPERS. It is the constitution of the American Federation of Labor.

Mr. ROBERTS (reading). "The object of this federation shall be the encouragement and formation of local trade and labor unions, and the closer federation of such societies through the organization of central trade and labor unions in every city, and the further combination of such bodies into State, Territorial, or provincial organizations to secure legislation in the interest of the working masses.

"SEC. 2. The establishment of national and international trade unions, based upon a strict recognition of the autonomy of each trade and the promotion and advancement of such bodies.

"SEC. 3. The establishment of departments composed of national or international unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, of the same industry, and which departments shall be governed in conformity with the laws of the American Federation of Labor.

"SEC. 4. An American federation of all national and international trade unions to aid and assist each other, to aid and encourage the sale of union-label goods, and to secure legislation in the interest of the working people, and influence public opinion, by peaceful and legal methods, in favor of organized labor."

Mr. GOMPERS. Those are the objects of the American Federation of Labor which have been set forth in that instrument since the formation of the federation.

Mr. GARDNER. May I examine that, Mr. Gompers?

Mr. GOMPERS. Yes, sir [handing paper to Mr. Gardner].

Mr. GARDNER. This, I assume, contains the by-laws?

Mr. GOMPERS. It is the constitution. We have no by-laws, except the resolutions adopted from time to time.

I hold in my hand here a little pamphlet called "Manual of Common Procedure for the Use of Local and Federated Labor Unions Affiliated With the American Federation of Labor. Washington, D. C., 1918." This has been the common manual used by the American Federation of Labor for local unions unattached to any international union for more more than 30 years. I drafted it, secured its indorsement by the executive council, and printed it. It is supposedly a secret document. Indeed, it is nothing more or less than a bit of information for the ordinary common procedure for local organizations which have been organized for the first time and the membership of which their minds are verging into an ability to conduct the affairs of a local organization. I think it will show you the character of this work. Mr. Morrison, will you kindly read this through?

Mr. MORRISON. I will read it, because we have had occasion to administer it once in a while. Do you want me to read the obligations?

Mr. GOMPERS. Read it through. I think the Commissioners want to hear the ringing of the innermost soul of the American Federation of Labor.

Mr. MORRISON (reading as follows):

"Manual of common procedure.

"It being desirable that a feeling of reverence should be cultivated for the noble aspirations underlying the labor movement, it is important that the lines and obligations herein contained should be committed to memory and delivered in a respectful and impressive manner. It is also desirable that this manual shall be kept under lock and key in the meeting room and not be exposed or submitted to the inspection of any person not a member in good standing of the American Federation without authority of the president.

"NOTE.—This procedure is not intended for local unions having a national or international head. Local unions may suspend this procedure by the president of the union making a declaration of the expediency of so doing immediately upon taking the chair.

"OPENING.

"The hour of meeting having arrived and a quorum being present, the president of the union shall call the body to order, upon which all officers and members shall be seated and a general silence observed.

"President: 'Brothers, the guardian being at his post to defend us against all intruders, the secretary being prepared to record the proceedings, and a sufficient number of brothers being present, I declare this meeting duly convened and qualified to consider and transact such business as may come before it that is recognized by the American Federation of Labor. All who are not members of the Federation will please retire.'

"President: 'By the authority vested in this union by the charter in our midst, and the formal consent of our members, we are pledged to the emancipation of our class from poverty, ignorance, and selfishness. This can best be accomplished by organization, education, and fraternity. Organization is necessary for the sake of education; education is necessary to organization; and fraternity is the cause and effect of unity. In union there is strength, so while we can not hope to be successful when working individually, by combining our efforts the most skillful and beneficent results may be attained.'

"If desired, the following ode may then be sung:

"OPENING ODE.

"(Tune: Auld Lang Syne.)

"Shall song and music be forgot
When workingmen combine;
With love united may they not
Have power almost divine?
Shall idle drones still live like kings
On labor not their own;
Shall true men starve, while thieves and rings
Reap where they have now sown?

"No! by our cause eternal, No!
It shall not forever be;
And union men will ere long show
How workers can be free.
No! by our cause eternal, No!
It shall not forever be;
And union men will ere long show
How the workers can be free.

"President: 'I now declare this meeting open for the transaction of such business as may legally come before it.'

"The president will then conduct the meeting according to the laws governing the union.

"On the occasion of the installation of newly elected officers, or the initiation of candidates for membership, the following ceremonies shall be observed:

"INSTALLATION.

"The newly elected officers will take their places in front of the president's chair; the president elect on the right, and the vice president, secretary, treasurer, guardian, and guide elect in the order here stated. All members will rise and remain standing while the presiding officer administers to the officers collectively the following obligation:

"'INSTALLATION OBLIGATION.

"'I, ———, do hereby sincerely pledge my honor to perform the duties of my office as prescribed by the laws of this union; and to bear true allegiance to the American Federation of Labor. I will deliver to my successor in office all books, papers, and other property of this union that may be in my possession at the close of my official term. I will also deliver all property of the American Federation of Labor to the president of the same upon demand. All of this I solemnly promise, with the full knowledge that to violate this pledge is to stamp me as a man devoid of principle and destitute of honor.'

"President: 'You will now proceed to your respective stations and perform the duties devolving upon you.'

"The outgoing president then surrenders the chair to his successor.

"INITIATION.

"President: 'Brother Guide, see that the candidates in waiting have been duly elected, and introduce them for initiation.'

"When the guide arrives with the candidates at the inside door he will give the alarm. The members will rise to their feet, and when the door is opened the following ode may be sung:

"ODE OF WELCOME.

"(Tune: Marching Through Georgia.)

"Start the music, brothers, we will sing a labor song,
Sing it with a vim that will speed our cause along;
Let it ring throughout the world, in chorus full and strong—
Yes; we are the members of the union.

"Chorus.

"Hurrah! Hurrah! Union makes us strong;
Hurrah! Hurrah! It helps our cause along;
So we'll sing the chorus wherever we may throng,
As we march onward in union.

"During the singing the guide and candidates start from the door to meet the president, who joins them at the corner of the room. If the ode is not used, the ceremony is as above after the alarm is given. The guide will have the candidates at his right and left, and when the singing is ended will say:

"Guide: 'Brother President, permit me to introduce Mr. ———, Mr. ———, all wageworkers of good character, and duly elected in regular meeting, who now come of their own free will to be admitted to the privilege of membership in the American Federation of Labor.'

"President: Fellow workmen, it is my duty to inform you that the American Federation of Labor requires perfect freedom of inclination in every candidate for membership in its body. An obligation of fidelity is required, but let me assure you that in this obligation there is nothing contrary to your civil or religious duties. With this understanding, are you willing to take an obligation which binds you upon your honor as a man to keep the same as long as life remain?'

"(Answer.)

"President: 'You will now, each of you, place your right hand upon your left breast while I recite the obligation.'

"INITIATORY OBLIGATION.

"When there is but one candidate use the singular instead of the plural, and in the case of the candidate being a woman or girl use the term 'sister.'

"'You, of your own free will, do sincerely promise to abide by the laws of this union?

"'You also promise to bear true allegiance to the American Federation of Labor, and never consent to subordinate its interests to those of any labor organization of which you may now or hereafter be a member?

"'You also promise to keep inviolate the traditional principles of the American laborer, namely, to be respectful in word and action to every woman; to be considerate to the widow and orphan, the weak and defenseless; and never to discriminate against a fellow worker on account of creed, color, or nationality. To defend freedom of throught, whether expressed by tongue or pen, with all the power at your command?

"'You further agree to educate yourself and fellow workers in the history of the labor movement, and to defend, to the best of your ability, the trades-union principle, which guards its autonomy and which regards capital as the product of the past labor of all toilers of the human race; and that wages can never be regarded as the full equivalent for labor performed; and that it is the mission of the trade-unions in the present and the future to protect the wage earners against oppression and to fully secure the toilers' disenthrallment from every species of injustice?

"'You further promise that you will never knowingly wrong a brother or see him wronged, if in your power to prevent it, and that you will endeavor to subordinate every selfish impulse to the task of elevating the material, intellectual, and moral condition of the entire laboring class?

"'You further solemnly promise on your word of honor that you will, whenever and wherever possible, purchase only strictly union-made goods, and that you will use your best endeavors to influence others to do the same, and never become faithless to your obligation?

"'To all of this you pledge your honor to observe and keep as long as life remains or until you may be absolved from this obligation by the American Federation of Labor?'

"PRESIDENT. 'Do you thus promise?' (Answer.)

"MEMBERS (in chorus). 'We bear witness.'

"PRESIDENT. 'You are now members of the American Federation of Labor, and I give you my right hand in full acknowledgment thereof. The vice president will give you further instructions.'

"The guide will then conduct the new members to the vice president, who will thus address them:

"VICE PRESIDENT. 'Brothers, to gain admission to the meeting room you must knock at the inside door. When the guardian opens the wicket you will give him the current password.' (Vice president gives current password.)

"'This will admit you to the meeting room, when you will advance to the center of the hall, facing the president, whom you will salute with your right hand extended before you, parallel with your shoulder and palm of your hand upward. The president will recognize you by extending his hand, palm downward. You can then take part in the meeting. Should you desire to leave the meeting before its close, you are required to ask permission of the vice president, when you will step to the center of the hall and repeat the salutation to the president as when entering, except that the palm of the hand must be turned downward. Upon the recognition by the president in extending his hand you will be permitted to retire.'

"The guide will then conduct the new members to the secretary, who will present them with their cards of membership, and then conduct them to reserved seats, where they will remain till the close of the meeting.

"CLOSING.

"PRESIDENT. 'There being no further business before the union, we will now proceed to close.

"'You will all bear well in mind your obligations. Cherish the union, for it teaches you how to live; have faith in the union, and it will comfort you in need; have zeal for the union, for in its growth you will find happiness for yourselves and your fellow men.'

"The following ode may then be sung:

"CLOSING ODE.

"(Tune, 'America.')

"Come, let our voices raise
In thankful songs of praise
For union's might;
May we as brothers kind,
In union strong combined,
United heart and mind,
Uphold the right.

"PRESIDENT. 'By virtue of my office, I now declare this meeting adjourned until our next regular session, unless specially called, when I hope to see you all present.'"

Mr. MORRISON. Then follow rules governing debate, motions, privileged questions, order of business, key to cipher, etc.

Mr. GOMPERS. In addition to that, I take you all into our confidence.

Mr. GARDNER. May I ask one question before you start? I learn from that that you will follow the pledges taken and do all you can for the working class, irrespective of whether they are affiliated with the American Federation of Labor or otherwise?

Mr. GOMPERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRISON. Oh, yes; we are not selfish.

Mr. GOMPERS. I also want to call your attention to the key to cipher for private and confidential communications. I want to show this to you. It is simply a code of A, B, C, D, etc., meaning certain letters—figures rather, for certain letters. I call your attention to what that is for. That is to convey the password for each quarter. And I want you to note the character of the passwords which have been given by me as president and sent in code—that code just mentioned. Will you kindly read those?

Mr. GARDNER [reading]:

"Labor and democracy is our fight."
"Labor and democracy is our fight."
"Fight and win for freedom."
"Fight and win for freedom."
"Fight on for freedom."
"Fight on for freedom."

Mr. GOMPERS. Those are the passwords during the war and before we entered into the war. I tried to make the passwords means something; a watchword and something that would make an impression upon the men to whom it was communicated in confidence and actually repeated by them before they could gain admission into the meeting rooms.

Mr. BROWNLOW. May I say to you, Mr. Gompers, what I have often said to other people, that no man in all the world has done more than you, and no man has aided our country more than you, and no man has done what you have done with the laboring classes of our country in the past three or four years. And I——

Mr. GOMPERS. I thank you for the compliment, but I am president of the American Federation of Labor and a member of one of its unions, and after all that our great rank and file has done in this great crisis I want to thank you for your appreciation of my efforts, not only to solidify the body of organized workers but to give tone and character and a watchword to the great mass of the workers of our country, because the organized workers are the leaders of the laboring forces of America, as they are of any other country, because the others are unorganized, have no voice, are inarticulate, and are lead by what we organized workers do for good or for evil. You have, Mr. Brownlow, taken occasion to express appreciation of the service that I have rendered, or tried to render, during this great crisis of our country and of the world. I am not vain a bit, but too great a modesty is a species of vanity. I have tried my very best, and I have felt it was the duty of every man in America, if he loved America, if he cared for himself, for his family, his descendants, that it was his duty to give his all, his very life if necessary, in order that America might triumph in this great cause, in this world struggle, and to give us an opportunity to live our own lives.

And then we find this and other things which I shall endeavor to lay before you in as concise a form as I possibly can. I find in the article that a stigma is placed upon the American Federation of Labor by the commissioners.

These people have not joined the I. W. W. They have joined the American Federation of Labor with a view only that we may be able to give them our moral support in every just claim they have for the consideration of the commissioners and of the other local authorities. We have seen, gentlemen of the commission, we have seen Presidents issue edicts forbidding men employed in the Government of the United States not only to organize, but also to petition Congress; to give information to Members of Congress, of the House or Senate, upon pain of demotion or dismissal. I say it with regret, certainly not with the purpose of saying anything derogatory to the great character of a former President, the former President of the United States, Roosevelt. I refer to his "gag rule," which was later supplemented by former President Taft. It was necessary that we go to the Congress of the United States in order to secure relief. It was done in the case of the employees in the Postal Department. We secured from the Congress of the United States a repeal of that order of President Roosevelt and President Taft. A provision in an appropriation bill and law of the land, approved by the President, made this provision.

Mr. MORRISON (reading):

"Act of August 24, 1912 (37 Stat., par. 555): Provided, however, That membership in any society, association, club, or other form of organization of postal employees not affiliated with any outside organization imposing an obligation or duty upon them to engage in any strike, or proposing to assist them in any strike, against the United States, having for its objects, among other things, improvements in the condition of labor and of its members, including hours of labor and compensation therefor and leave of absence, by any person or groups of persons in said Postal Service, or the presenting by any such person or groups of persons of any grievance or grievances to the Congress or any Member thereof, shall not constitute or be cause for reduction in rank or compensation or removal of such person or groups of persons from said service. The right of persons employed in the civil service of the United States, either individually or collectively, to petition Congress, or any Member thereof, or to furnish information to either House of Congress, or to any committee or member thereof, shall not be denied or interfered with."

Mr. GOMPERS. I hold in my hand a book, whose title is American Federation of Labor, History, Encyclopedia, and Reference Book. It is the only book of the kind issued by any organization of labor in the whole civilized world. It is a summary of all the actions for every convention as well as of the executive council and administrative officers of the American Federation of Labor. I submit this, not as a complete history and encyclopedia of the American Federation's activities, but as a summary we can submit and are willing to submit every official document printed or written, any documents official or otherwise. We challenge any man to show that there has ever been a strike ordered or directed by the American Federation of Labor or any of its officers. That will conclusively show you that the provision of the law just read contained that declaration not only at our instigation but with our absolute approval.

Mr. BROWNLOW. I did not understand that last sentence.

Mr. GOMPERS. I say that the provision of the law just read contains that the civil-service employees of the United States shall not belong to any organization which has for its purpose strikes, etc., and I say that the American Federation of Labor history demonstrates beyond question that the American Federation of Labor has never had the strike for its purpose or its activities, so that the regulation and the statement of policy of the commissioners has no application to the American Federation of Labor.

Mr. BROWNLOW. That statement of policy does not refer to the American Federation of Labor but to other organizations which are affiliated.

Mr. GOMPERS. But there are no organizations with which the policemen can become affiliated which order strikes. They can not join the machinists' union; they can not join the bricklayers', the molders', or carpenters' union.

Mr. BROWNLOW. What was meant was that through the American Federation of Labor they would be affiliated with various other bodies.

Mr. GOMPERS. The various other bodies are all affiliated through the American Federation of Labor.

Mr. BROWNLOW. That is what we meant.

Mr. GOMPERS. I want to call your attention to a law which has been upon the statute books since 1886. It provides for the incorporation of trade-unions and legalizes their actual existence and is recognized by the Government of the United States as such. It is the act of June 29, 1886. It is as follows [Aside: Mr. Morrison will you kindly read this?]:

Mr. MORRISON (reading):

"Incorporation of national trade-unions (p. 3204, act of June 29, 1886, U. S. Compiled Statutes).

"SECTION 1. The term 'national trade-union,' in the meaning of this act, shall signify any association of working people having two or more branches in the States or Territories of the United States for the purpose of aiding its members to become more skillful and efficient workers, the promotion of their general intelligence, the elevation of their character, the regulation of their wages and their hours and conditions of labor, the protection of their individual rights in the prosecution of their trade or trades, the raising of funds for the benefit of sick, disabled, or unemployed members, or the families of deceased members, or for such other object or objects for which working people may lawfully combine, having in view their mutual protection or benefit.

"SEC. 2. National trade-unions shall, upon filing their articles of incorporation in the office of the recorder of the District of Columbia, become a corporation under the technical name by which said national trade-union desires to be known to the trade, and shall have the right to sue and be sued, to implead and be impleaded, to grant and receive, in its corporate or technical name, property, real, personal, and mixed, and to use said property and the proceeds and income thereof for the objects of said corporation as in its charter defined: Provided, That each union may hold only so much real estate as may be required for the immediate purposes of its incorporation.

"SEC. 3. An incorporated national trade-union shall have power to make and establish such constitution, rules, and by-laws as it may deem proper to carry out its lawful objects, and the same to alter, amend, add to, or repeal at pleasure.

"SEC. 4. An incorporated national trade-union shall have power to define the duties and powers of all its officers and prescribe their mode of election and term of office, to establish branches and subunions in any Territory of the United States.

"SEC. 5. The headquarters of an incorporated national trade-union shall be located in the District of Columbia."

Mr. GARDNER. My mind is somewhat confused about something—it was always my impression that these strikes were either supported by the national body or rejected by them. I gathered this from newspaper accounts, because I never read or had read to me the constitution. Now, I note by a reading of the provisions in this little book which you have prepared for the individual council that they pledge themselves to support all labor alike. Now, with that pledge, also providing that the controversy is between union and nonunion men; now, with that pledge how could that exist? In other words, if they will stand by all labor alike, organized or unorganized, in a strike between union and nonunion labor, how can the union laborer injure the nonunion laborer? My impression had always been that there was always a difference between the union and nonunion men; efforts of the union men to drive nonunion men away. Under that theory I was wondering if that was correct.

Mr. GOMPERS. All that we ask of the police department is that they shall be perfectly neutral in any controversy between employers and employees. The controversy is not between union and nonunion men. It is a dispute between union and nonunion men on the one side and the employers on the other. Now, in my old trade—that of cigarmaker—there is now a strike of 125,000 members of my craft. There are, I think, 38,000 members in that organization and there are 125,000 men on strike at this time and undoubtedly for a better wage. Their wages have not been increased in the last few years in spite of the higher cost of living. They are engaged in a common strike, union and nonunion workmen. That is all. In any dispute which may arise between employers and employees, that is the best term, in any dispute between them, all we ask of the police is that they shall be impartial and not throw their full weight against the poor devil who is trying to get something to which he is justly entitled.

Mr. GARDNER. I was trying to clear this up. For instance, there is a strike in any department of the District; if our street cleaners should go on strike and they were union men affiliated with your organization, and there should be brought into the city a carload of men and put on the streets in their place—nonunion men—if they were injured by the union men, struck with a brick or run out of town, that would be contrary to that?

Mr. GOMPERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. Morrison, will you kindly read this section from the Clayton Act, which was passed in 1914 and signed by the President October 15, 1914?

[Mr. Morrison read as follows:]

"(Public No. 212—Sixty-third Congress.)

"SEC. 6. That the labor of a human being is not a commodity or article of commerce. Nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of labor, agricultural, or horticultural organizations, instituted for the purposes of mutual help, and not having capital stock or conducted for profit, or to forbid or restrain individual members of such organizations from lawfully carrying out the legitimate objects thereof; nor shall such organizations or the members thereof be held or construed to be illegal combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade under the antitrust laws."

Mr. GARDNER. What penalty is there for a member of the union, affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, violating his oath of allegiance?

Mr. GOMPERS. Such as a fine or reprimand, suspension from right to hold office or to attend meetings for a specific time, and some of them, I think, by expulsion. I am free to say that I am very much opposed to expulsion under any circumstances. I believe in the punishment of wrongdoers in any walk of life, in any sphere of activity. I am opposed to the expulsion of a member from the union by any of our organizations. The American Federation of Labor has no power to impose a penalty. The penalty is imposed by the organization itself upon its recalcitrant member or those who violate its obligations and rules. We have no power to pass upon it either favorably or otherwise. Now, my reasons for opposition to expulsion are somewhat as follows: The expulsion of a man from the union carries with it that these unexpelled men will not be working with him, otherwise where is the sense of expulsion? The simple privilege of being in the organization is nothing if it does not carry with it somewhat of a privilege or a right to work with his associates. If the organization has not the power to prevent this man working at his trade, then the punishment by expulsion is a farce. If, on the other hand, it has the power to enforce such a penalty, it means capital punishment; it means taking away the means by which the man may live, and I am opposed to either of these actions. I believe in the penalizing of a man by his organization if he does wrong, but I believe that that penalty should be within the limit; that he shall have an opportunity to make good some other time, either by fine, by a reprimand, that he may so live to overcome it, but never expel him and deny him either the farcical or the actual opportunity of earning his livelihood.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Gompers, if I may analyze this as I go, coming down to policemen, if they were affiliated with the union, as they now are, they would have the right alone to pass upon their misdeeds, and you would have no right or power to pass upon any misdeeds of theirs.

Mr. GOMPERS. So long as they retained their local existence; that is, as a directly affiliated union of the American Federation of Labor. The actions of these local unions in matters of that character would be subject to appeal; that is, review and modification.

Mr. GARDNER. You have no power in the matter?

Mr. GOMPERS. No initiatory power. Merely appeal power.

Mr. GARDNER. You have the appeal power?

Mr. GOMPERS. Yes; we have the power of appeal from any action of local unions which is contrary to the principles of the American Federation of Labor.

Mr. GARDNER. What by-law or what regulation do you have as your guide in passing upon these appeals?

Mr. GOMPERS. The rule of common sense and common decency. Simply that.

Mr. GARDNER. And no written rule?

Mr. GOMPERS. There is no written rule governing that.

Mr. GARDNER. I see. Excuse me for interrupting you, but I want to get that thing in my mind.

Mr. GOMPERS. Not at all, Mr. Commissioner. If there was anything to hide, I would not come here and throw myself wide open as to anything you may care to inquire into.

Mr. GARDNER. I am simply seeking information.

Mr. GOMPERS. I am glad to furnish information. I want to call your attention to the declaration of the American Federation of Labor convention of 1910 [reading]:

"Declaration of American Federation of Labor in convention of 1910.

"Organized labor contends for the improvement of the standard of life, to uproot ignorance and foster education, to instill character and manhood and an independent spirit among our people, to bring about a recognition of the interdependence of the modern life of man and his fellow man. It aims to establish a normal workday, take the children from the factory and the workshop and place them in the school, the home, and the playground. In a word, the unions of labor, recognizing the duty of toil, strive to educate their members to make their homes more cheerful in every way, to contribute an earnest effort toward making life the better worth living, to avail their members of their rights as citizens, and to bear the duties and responsibilities and perform their obligations they owe to our country and our fellow men. Labor contends that in every effort to achieve its praiseworthy ends all honorable and lawful means are not only commendable but should receive the sympathetic support of every right-thinking, progressive man."

Mr. GOMPERS. I hold in my hand a printed copy of the declaration of the labor movement by its representatives about three weeks before we entered the war, or three weeks before the President appeared before Congress. I am perfectly willing that you gentlemen have a copy of this, not necessarily to burden the record with it, but for your own information.

Mr. MORRISON. It is an excerpt from President Wilson's address and reads as follows:

"You have made the statement of the American's labor question in peace or war on March 12, 1917, and in which appears the following paragraph:

"'We, the officers of the National and International Trade Unions of America in national conference assembled in the capital of our Nation, hereby pledge ourselves in peace or in war, in stress or in storm, to stand unreservedly by the standards of liberty and the safety and preservation of the institutions and ideals of our Republic.'"

Mr. GOMPERS. Read the rest of it.

Mr. MORRISON. The rest of it?

"'In this solemn hour of our Nation's life it is our earnest hope that our Republic may be safeguarded in its unswerving desire for peace; that our people may be spared the horrors and burdens of war; that they may have the opportunity to cultivate and develop the arts of peace, human brotherhood, and a higher civilization.

"'But, despite all our endeavors and hopes, should our country be drawn into the maelstrom of the European conflict we, with these ideals of liberty and justice herein declared as the indispensable basis for national policies, offer our services to our country in every field of activity to defend, safeguard, and preserve the Republic of the United States of America against its enemies, whomsoever they may be, and we call upon our fellow workmen and fellow citizens in the holy name of labor, justice, freedom, and humanity to devotedly and patriotically give like service.'"

Mr. GOMPERS. That resolution was adopted by a unanimous vote, and at the subsequent convention of the American Federation of Labor adopted by a unanimous vote and, that is not all, the declaration was made good all through the war and since.

There is a declaration which was made in the convention, an excerpt from President Wilson's Buffalo address, which I should like you gentlemen to hear. President Wilson came to our convention—November, 1917—after we had been in the war about eight months and delivered an address, and among the wonderful things that he said was this tribute to the American Federation of Labor and its activities.

Mr. MORRISON (reading):

"While we are fighting for freedom, we must see, among other things, that labor is free, and that means a number of interesting things. It means not only that we must do what we have declared our purpose to do—see that the conditions of labor are not rendered more onerous by the war—but also that we shall see to it that the instrumentalities by which the conditions of labor are improved are not blocked or checked. That we must do. That has been the matter about which I have taken pleasure in conferring from time to time with your president, Mr. Gompers, and if I may be permitted to do so I want to express my admiration of his patriotic courage, his large vision, and his statesmanlike sense of what has to be done. I like to lay my mind alongside of a man that knows how to pull in harness. The horses that kick over the traces will have to be put in a corral."

Mr. GOMPERS. I could, gentlemen, go through much more in order to demonstrate the accuracy of the position and the justice of our protest against this regulation which you have adopted and promulgated to the police, but I have some consideration of time and your duties as well as my own, and therefore I shall desist from that feature of it, but I desire a few more moments to present a few more thoughts.

Gentlemen, after all, what have the people of the United States been fighting for? What have we been fighting for? Why did we organize this army of 4,000,000 men? Why have we made sacrifices of food and life; given our money in the drives; loaned our money for bonds, depriving ourselves of many, many of the things that make up the comforts of life? Why? Is it that after we have won a victory against militarism and autocracy and imperialism we shall have the rights which were exercised before taken from us? Autocracy does not merely exist in name. It exists as a fact; it is a state of mind; it is a state of fact. If the working people of the United States, policemen included, had the right before the war to organize and to affiliate with any lawful, honorable, patriotic body of people, surely, at the close of the war, when we have won against such great odds, a victory that will go down in history as the greatest struggle in the history of the whole world, then should not out of it, out of the glow, out of the glamor, out of the sacrifice, the denial of a right, come the right to organize, the right to affiliate with a bona fide organization of labor that has had a continuous and honorable existence for more than 39 years?

The declaration which you have adopted, the regulation which you have adopted, places a stigma on the American Federation of Labor, not upon any other organization. If the Commissioners of the District of Columbia can and they do adopt a resolution placing that stigma of making the American Federation of Labor anathema—what will the action be—what impression will it have upon the minds of employers generally? If constituted authority in the District of Columbia can say to these people, "You can have nothing to do with the American Federation of Labor," the only body with which they have been affiliated, then employers will say, "That is the official dictum; that is the judgment of the authorities in the Capital of our Nation and gives us the cue to follow in a like course." And we are not deserving of such characterization or of such a stigma.

Mr. BROWNLOW. No stigma was intended, and the proof of that is that our other employees are organized in unions that are affiliated with the American Federation of Labor.

Mr. GOMPERS. Mr. Brownlow, if I thought that the personnel of this commission was such that they intended to do that aforethought, cast a stigma upon the American Federation of Labor movement, and to do a wrong, I would not waste your time and my time to come here and make the statements that I have tried to make.

Mr. BROWNLOW. I am glad to have you say that; I am glad to be acquitted in your mind of any intent.

Mr. GOMPERS. It is because I have a respect for the personnel of the commission, and believe that they have gone further than they intended, further than they, in my judgment, have the right to go; further than is good for our Capital or good for our country that I have come here.

It is time that we take into consideration the situation which exists throughout the world. In no country on the face of the globe is there such tranquillity, such order, such a stablizing influence exercised by any labor movement as there is by the American Federation of Labor in our country.

Mr. KUTZ. I accept that statement without any question.

Mr. GOMPERS. And yet, because these men have become affiliated in their union with the American Federation of Labor you say to them that they must recede from that position or lose their jobs—be without employment.

Mr. MORRISON. And the pensions.

Mr. GOMPERS. Yes; and their pensions are forfeited.

The countries of the world are seething with revolution and revolutionary spirit. As I have indicated, have shown by proof beyond question, the American labor movement is of a constructive, not of a destructive character, going along within the law and within the rules, and within the Constitution and the guaranties of the Republic of the United States. We are engaged in this work, and it is no mean job, let me tell you, gentlemen; it is not and has not been any mean job to try to stabilize the activities of the working people of the United States. They have had great cause for dissatisfaction by reason of the fact that they are made the victims of the greed and avarice commonly known as food profiteering in one form or another. A large proportion of the workers of our country were engaged in the production of the things for war, engaged in the production of things for destruction. With the armistice and the practical ending of the war, all that species of industry came to a full stop. The employers and captains of industry and commerce have not been able to have the judgment or the enterprise to get back to something like normal conditions of industry. Large numbers of our people are unemployed. Many of them who are employed are not earning enough wages to insure them the opportunity to live decently because of the increased cost of living. Then to find opposition to the attempt to organize the policemen who seek organization, for the purpose of what? To seek here some relief from these grievances which they are required to bear in the service.

I assume, gentlemen, that you have read the statement made by the policemen in regard to the situation in which they find themselves and the grievances about which they complain. God knows they are hard enough.

Mr. BROWNLOW. We know that, and we want to do everything possible——

Mr. GOMPERS (interposing). Yes; I know, and you are the employers of these policemen of this city.

Mr. BROWNLOW. Not with respect to salaries, Mr. Gompers, because the salaries are fixed by Congress. The commissioners have not once, but every time that these conditions have arisen, sought increase in pay for the members of the police force, and are seeking it now. There is a bill for that purpose now before Congress, which has been approved by the District Committees in both the Senate and the House. We have recognized and have so stated publicly that the members of the police deparment are not sufficiently well paid. We have endeavored by every means within our power to secure from Congress the immediate change in legislation to ameliorate that evil.

Mr. GOMPERS. And thus far practically without success.

Mr. BROWNLOW. Thus far without success, in so far as this, the last measure, is concerned. Some very slight—I think insufficient—increase was granted by Congress in the last two years.

Mr. GOMPERS. These policemen are reasoning and patriotic men of families, as a rule. They find that all this is a slow process. They show by their affiliations, by their desire to have the support of the American labor movement, that they want the great mass of 4,000,000 workers to get behind their request and their applications and behind the commissioners in order that they may become of some assistance to the commissioners in that regard, and, as their reward, they have the alternative of resigning from the organization or seeing that its affiliation is withdrawn or lose their positions.

Now, gentlemen, I think you will find that the commissioners in the adoption of the regulation have acted without proper information. They have not acted in the interests of the citizenship of the District of Columbia or of our country. I have heard—I do not know of my own knowledge—that court proceedings have been taken or that they are to be inaugurated to secure relief from the order or regulation which you gentlemen have adopted. I prefer at any time, by conference with those who are responsible for actions, to persuade them of an error which they have committed and endeavor to have it corrected. I ask, gentlemen, that time be given to these men. The ultimatum that they must recede or quit or be discharged is unwarranted so far as the American Federation of Labor is concerned.

If governmental authority, if employers as a general rule will antagonize the American Federation of Labor and by their actions and tendency cripple its efforts you will have something to deal with, not with us. You will have the men flying where they think they can secure relief, and in each stage of their disappointment they throw themselves anywhere where some relief is promised, either immediate or in the future. For good order, for peace, tranquillity, progress, safety, I appeal to the commissioners to rescind that order.

I thank you for the patience of the hearing.

Mr. BROWNLOW. Mr. Gompers, the commissioners have heard with very great interest all you have to say and will take it all into very careful consideration.

I want to repeat again that this action was taken without any thought that it would be or could be interpreted as casting a stigma upon the American Federation of Labor. For the organization I, as one of the commissioners, entertain the very highest respect and regard, and I have so expressed that many times privately and to some degree publicly when there was any occasion for a public utterance. The motives that actuated the commissioners was a different one. It had for its concern keeping the police department quite independent, so that even the charge of partiality on account of any affiliation of its members with a body, with any other labor organization, could not be made. Indeed members of the police department are affiliated with unions which are affiliated with the American Federation of Labor—bricklayers and printers and carpenters. I merely mention some of which I know. No disturbance of that relation is contemplated by this statement of policy or the order made in pursuance of that statement. It was, we believe, necessary to protect the police department from any question, however falsely made, of allegiance.

And now we will take into consideration very carefully what you have said, Mr. Gompers.

Mr. GOMPERS. May I make this suggestion: I do not know how long you gentlemen, members of the commission, may desire to take for the further consideration of this matter, in view of what has been presented to you this morning—that, if in your judgment you shall require further time to consider it, we think it would not be amiss to extend the time of the ultimatum, so that both you gentlemen, as commissioners, have the time to consider it, and secondly, that these men may also have time to consider their position.

Mr. BROWNLOW. That also we will consider. The communication can be made to the men very readily.

Mr. GOMPERS. Thank you, sir.

(Thereupon at 12.30 p. m. the conference adjourned.)

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, the real cause and the only cause of any such thing as section 2 being brought before this House is the fact that the police union of this city joined the American Federation of Labor. That was the contest in Boston between the police union and the State and city authorities. That is the contest of the policemen's unions in over 35 cities in the United States. There is no doubt that the majority of the District Committee, when it reported this provision, intended and had the special purpose in view to prevent by law the police union organization of this city from becoming a member of the American Federation of Labor or of any union or organization that resorts to the strike as a weapon to enforce its demands. There is no use to disguise it, and we ought to employ such language in this bill that will clearly do what was really intended.

Now, I ask, and I will pause for the answer, is there a gentleman on the committee which reported this bill who did not intend by that section to prevent the police union of this city from becoming a member of the American Federation of Labor or of any union or organization that employs the strike as a means to redress its wrongs or enforce its demands? I assert that that was and is the intention of the committee. I see present the members of the committee, and if I am not correct in my statement some of them ought to correct me. The very object of section 2, the very object for which every man on the committee that voted for it, was to prevent the police union or policemen individually from joining the American Federation of Labor or any union or organization that resorts to the strike. Does any man deny that?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Was not the purpose to prevent the policemen from striking?

Mr. KITCHIN. It was to prevent their union or organization from joining or affiliating with the American Federation of Labor or any union or organization that employs the strike as a weapon.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. What does Congress care what organization they join so long as they do not strike but go ahead and perform their duty? [Applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN. One of the objects, of course, was to prevent a strike; but the American Federation of Labor says that they do not order a strike, they do not command a strike, they do not strike, but the commissioners said you must get out of the American Federation of Labor, and they got out, because, as gentlemen said, we were going to raise the salaries.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. What was the purpose of permitting them to become members of the Federation of Labor if it was not to prevent a strike?

Mr. KITCHIN. If the gentleman means only to prevent a policemen's strike, his vision does not go far enough. The purpose of this section was not only to prevent the policemen from striking but to prevent them and their union from belonging to or affiliating with any union or organization that or whose members did strike, because the committee knew and this House knows that if the policemen or their union belonged to or affiliated with any such union or organization, the policemen—the law enforcers—would be in sympathy with the strikers, with their fellow unionists. [Applause.] The committee, by this section, intended to prevent this. If I were a policeman and belonged to the trainmen's union, or if my police union belonged to or affiliated with such trainmen's union, and if the trainmen of my city were to strike by order of the union, just as natural as water flowing downstream I would be in sympathy with the strikers, whatever they might do. We did not want, and the committee did not want, and the American people do not want, the policemen, the enforcers of law and order, to be fellow unionists with strikers in any industry. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. The construction of the committee that reported out this section, the construction of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], is that this section as it is written will prevent the policemen or their union or organization from becoming members of the American Federation of Labor. At first glimpse the language would seem to bear out such construction, but when you analyze it such can not be put upon the section. It does not prevent the police union of this city from joining or affiliating with the American Federation of Labor. The language used in the section does not do it, gentlemen.

We want to get at the right of this thing; we are all after the same object; all of us want to prevent the police union of this city from being a member of or affiliating with the American Federation of Labor or belonging to any union that does belong to the American Federation of Labor. I say this section with its present language does not do it.

Let us get these two facts in our minds and it will appear clearly that it does not do it: First, the American Federation of Labor does not "hold, claim, or exercise the right to demand of any of its membership obedience to an order to strike or cease work for any cause"; second, a policeman or an individual as such does not or can not become a member of the American Federation of Labor. Such federation is composed of unions or organizations and not of individuals. A police union or organization, but not the individual policeman, can become a member of or affiliate with the American Federation of Labor. A moment ago I asked the distinguished gentleman from California if that was the case, and he said yes; that individually one could not become a member of the federation.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman be good enough to yield to me?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. REAVIS. Do I understand that the American Federation of Labor is composed of organizations or individuals?

Mr. KITCHIN. Organizations. Let us read the language of the section:

> That no member of the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia shall be or become a member of any organization, or of an organization affiliated with another organization, which holds, claims, or exercises the right to demand of any of its membership obedience to an order to strike or cease work for any cause.

Under this a policeman can join a police union or organization unless it "holds, claims, or exercises the right," and so forth. First, he is forbidden to become a member "of any organization" which "holds, claims, or exercises the right," and so forth. If his police union or organization at any time "holds or claims or exercises the right," and so forth, he must get out of it or be dismissed from the police force. The police union or organization in this city does not so "hold" or "claim" or "exercise the right," and so forth. Second, he is forbidden to "become a member" of "an organization affiliated with another organization which holds, claims, or exercises the right to demand," and so forth. But he can under this language become a member of "an organization" which is a member of or "affiliated with another organization" which does not "hold, claim, or exercise the right," and so forth.

Now, as has been shown and admitted here, the American Federation of Labor, "an organization," does not "hold, claim, or exercise the right to demand of any of its membership obedience to an order to strike or cease work for any cause." Its several members, the labor and trades unions or organizations, do, but the Federation of Labor does not. So, therefore, under the language of this section a policeman here can join the police union or organization, and such union or organization can join or affiliate with the American Federation of Labor, because the police union or "organization" does not "hold, claim, or exercise the right," and so forth, and the police union or "organization," being a member of or affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, is not "an organization affiliated with another organization which holds, claims, or exercises the right," and so forth.

Therefore the very minute this bill becomes law the policemen's union can join the American Federation of Labor, and neither the policemen nor their union will violate the provisions of this section if no change or amendment is made to its language. I am in favor of changing the language so that the section will clearly express the intention of the committee and the House.

Mr. BLACK. But if my amendment be adopted——

Mr. KITCHIN. If the gentleman's amendment be adopted, that would cure it.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, there seems to be a curious divergence of opinion with regard to the language of this section, language which was very carefully considered before it was adopted by the committee. Some gentlemen think that it does not go far enough and some think that it goes too far. After having listened attentively to all of the arguments that have been made, I believe that it does exactly what the committee intended to do, and what we all, or the great majority of us, believe ought to be done, and that is to prohibit the police from having an organization of their own claiming the right to strike, or from having an organization that is affiliated with another organization that claims the right to order its men to strike.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I think, if the gentlemen will permit me to elaborate, I can convince them that I am entirely right. Let me speak on the two amendments that have been offered. The amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] would prohibit a policeman's organization that claimed the right to strike, but it would not prohibit the police, from affiliating with another organization that claims the right to order its members to strike. Let us not lose sight of this fact. There are two things that we seek to prohibit. First, we seek to prohibit the policeman from himself striking or claiming the right to strike. Second, we seek to keep him from affiliation, directly or indirectly, with any other organization the members of which might strike, and for the very excellent reason that we do not want to embarrass him in the performance of his duty by affiliation with men belonging to another organization who may strike.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. In just a moment. The amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] clearly would prohibit a police organization from the right to strike, but it would not prohibit affiliation with an organization that might claim the right to order its members to strike.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman allow me to call his attention to the specific language of my amendment, which says that he shall not belong to any organization which is affiliated with any other organization not composed entirely of employees of a municipal, State, or Federal Government.

Mr. MONDELL. After reading the gentleman's amendment I wondered whether he could belong to a church or lodge, whether he could be a Mason or a Knight of Columbus, whether he could join a building and loan association, whether he could affiliate with any one of the thousand and one different classes of organizations that have nothing to do with the question of the right to strike. I am of opinion that the amendment of the gentleman from Texas would prohibit him from belonging to such organizations.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman certainly loses sight of the fact that my amendment contains specific words that he shall not belong to a police organization that affiliates with this other organization.

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, yes; under the gentleman's amendment the policeman can not belong to a policeman's organization that claims the right to strike. That is the gentleman's language; but then he proceeds to prohibit him from belonging to the Knights of Columbus, to the Baptist Church, to a Liberty bond association, and to a few other things.

The gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN] is afraid that under this language a man who has been a member of a beneficial order or beneficial organization of a labor union might be deprived of the privilege of obtaining benefits after he became a member of the police force. I am not entirely clear that somewhere sometime something of that kind might occur, but I doubt it, but I do not know the exact character of these beneficial organizations.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. I will yield to the gentleman later. I do not know the exact character of beneficial orders connected with labor unions, but I assume that like the beneficial orders connected with other organizations one may retain the benefits of such insurance without retaining active membership in the order. I presume that is true of practically every labor organization or the beneficial organizations connected with every labor union. If that is not true, I do not know that we ought to make the exception, because if we are to divorce the police from organizations that claim the right to order their members to strike, we must do it rather clearly and definitely. Let us not lose sight of the fact that the police force of the District of Columbia are retired at a certain age on a very good pension. How much is that?

Mr. MAPES. One-half of the salary.

Mr. MONDELL. So the policeman is very well taken care of, and even though there was some one case somewhere, sometime, where a man would have some difficulty about the beneficial features of a labor organization, I do not think, in order to meet some one case of that sort, we ought to break down this entire prohibition. The language was very carefully thought out, and the danger in amending it on the floor without full consideration is the danger that always attends that sort of thing. We do not know very clearly, can not tell very clearly, what the amendments mean. It is very clear what the original language means. You shall not organize the police force into an organization claiming the right to strike; the police shall not be affiliated with an organization any member of which or an affiliated organization of which claims the right to strike.

The gentleman says that the American Federation of Labor, for instance, claims no right to order a strike. Well, everybody affiliated with it and every union affiliated with the bodies affiliated with it all claim the right to order their members to strike, and so if a police organization is affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, then through that federation they would be affiliated with these organizations claiming the right to order a strike. When you use the term "affiliated" here it not only means affiliated with some central organization, but affiliated through that central organization and other organizations affiliated with or attached to that central organization. I think that meets the contention of the gentleman from North Carolina. This language accomplishes in words that are simple, direct, and easily understood what we propose to accomplish, and in my opinion it is very dangerous to amend it in any way.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Illinois yield long enough to see if we can not agree upon time for debate upon this section and all amendments? Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto shall close in 15 minutes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman provide that five minutes of that time shall come to me?

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman make it 25 minutes, so that I may have five minutes?

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, there has been a very liberal amount of discussion already this afternoon on this question. There is only one amendment pending now, and I imagine that nearly every Member of the House has his mind made up as to how he is going to vote, and it seems to me we are taking a good deal of time, and I think we ought to get through in 15 minutes more, the Chair to have control of the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. MAPES. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be closed in 15 minutes, the time to be controlled by the Chair.

Mr. GARLAND. I want three minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. The Chair recognized me before the gentleman from Michigan made his request.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Illinois, and he yielded to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MAPES. Including the five minutes of the gentleman from Illinois make it 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, I object unless I can get an opportunity to speak on this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan, who asks unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and all amendments to this section close in 15 minutes following the time assigned to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, how do we understand we will get an opportunity to speak if one gentleman takes up all the time? A number of us have asked for a few minutes; I want three minutes; and if I understand I will have that three minutes I will not object.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I want three minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I object, and I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BEE. What is the motion pending before the House?

The CHAIRMAN. It is a unanimous-consent request, and objection has been raised, and therefore the gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I will amend my request by asking unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 25 minutes after the five minutes of the gentleman from Illinois, which will make it half an hour, the time to be controlled by the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 25 minutes following the time of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I object, and demand the regular order.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 30 minutes, the time to be controlled by the Chair.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield further.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois declines to yield further.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, we are dealing with a serious problem which affects the peace and the welfare of the Nation, the protection of life and property from one end of the country to the other. The policeman is the country's civilian soldier, and I maintain that he ought not under any circumstances to belong to any organization which claims the right to direct his official acts. [Applause.] We are here to speak for America and we ought to have the courage to do it. The time has come when we must speak and we must not wait for any conference anywhere to tell us what to do. [Applause.] The American people are watching and they are waiting for a display of sufficient courage on the part of their representatives to protect them in their life and property. [Applause.] The Congress has displayed a cowardice in the past that is inexcusable, and the time has come, the issue is here, we are facing a crisis and we must meet it, and for one I am ready to meet it no matter what it may be, and I propose to say to the policemen of the District of Columbia, aye, to the policemen of America, if you please, that as law officers of America we propose to say that they shall execute the law and shall have no right to strike. [Applause.] And any man, a citizen of America, not willing to meet the issue has no business to make application for a position on the police force, and if he does his application should be refused. I do not care how you word the language of the bill, but it should be so worded as to leave no doubt as to what our attitude is. [Applause.] The people of America are looking to us to-day; we should set the pace; we should make a model of the police force of the District of Columbia for every police force in every city in this Union.

I was in Boston the day the police force struck. I saw the riots; I saw the mobs. I saw them break into the stores and loot the property of the people there. I saw the murdered men. And I said then that if God would permit me to live long enough to get an opportunity to place myself on record I would say to the people of America that no man should be employed anywhere as a law officer in the land who joined any organization that claimed superior power over his official action. [Applause.] The men and the women of the Nation have the right to the protection of their lives and property, and they have a right to demand of us who speak for them that we shall have the courage of our convictions; that we shall so enact the laws of the land as to protect them in their rights; and that we, no matter what may be the result of our action, when we leave this official place in which we are temporarily serving, may have the right to walk the streets of the land among our fellow citizens in the assurance that we as Americans are safe in our life and in our property. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I will be glad to see if we can fix the time for debate. I ask unanimous consent that the debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes, the time to be controlled by the Chairman.

Mr. QUIN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I would like to drop a few remarks on this matter. I think it is very important.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I object, and I ask for the regular order.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. O'CONNOR] is recognized.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I will.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan moves that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

Mr. MAPES. Make it 30 minutes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, it is very evident that all of us who want to speak on this question can not get an opportunity to do so, and therefore I amend the motion by moving that all debate on this subject close now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio moves an amendment to the effect that the debate be closed now.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that a gentleman has been recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman had been recognized, but he yielded to the chairman of the committee in an endeavor to fix the time.

Mr. REAVIS. The gentleman can not lose his recognition or right to the floor by a motion that the debate close now.

I make the point of order that there has been a gentleman already recognized for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The point is well taken.

Mr. KEARNS. I move to amend the motion.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I do not yield to the gentleman who has the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman does not yield for the purpose of allowing an amendment.

Mr. KEARNS. I do not understand that when a gentleman has yielded the floor for a motion he has the right to object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yielded out of courtesy to the chairman of the committee only.

Mr. KEARNS. After he has yielded to the chairman to make a motion he certainly can not preclude other Members from making a motion to amend the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. No.

Mr. KEARNS. Therefore I move to amend the gentleman's motion by making it read that the debate close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio moves an amendment that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close at the end of the time controlled by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. O'CONNOR].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in 30 minutes, the time to be controlled by the Chair.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in view of the tremendously wide range of discussion that has taken place to-day in connection with this bill, even though my observations may be irrelevant, I hope they will prove sufficiently interesting to be worth while.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] said facetiously that it was an inalienable right of the American people to criticize their police establishments and constabularies, whether that police establishment or constabulary was located in some little village or hamlet or in the great metropolis of this country. I might add that it is not only an inalienable right of the American people, but it appears to be the favorite pastime of the English-speaking people.

I know that sounds strange as coming from a fellow that bears the name of O'CONNOR, and is presumably of Celtic origin, and therefore apparently hostile to police establishments. As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I understand that the hostility that has from time to time broken forth furiously against police establishments during the last three centuries of English-speaking history has for its psychology, its genesis, the exacting nature of what corresponded to a constabulary under Cromwell, which aroused such a spirit of furious hostility in the minds of the English-speaking people, and particularly those of London, that they never forgot it, and transmitted it with their blood. The hostility is of Anglo-Saxon and not Celtic origin. But I believe at heart the American people really love their police establishments, and as one of the people that love them I am against the police becoming—and pardon this apparent abruptness in getting away from one subject and onto another—I am against a police establishment becoming a part of the American Federation of Labor, for the reason that it has done the police establishments more harm than good, and has resulted in the disadvantage to the wage earners of this country by arousing a spirit of hostility in the minds of patriotic American citizens against them as a general proposition. It has been a very unhappy union and should be dissolved in the interest of policeman and wage earner. I hope the measure will go through as it is written in the bill.

I want it distinctly understood, Mr. Chairman, that I am not unmindful of the sacrifices made by the police establishments of this country. Last year I had the honor of addressing the police chiefs of the United States and Canada, and of recounting the number of fatalities that occurred in our police department from the memorable day on which Chief of Police Hennessey was assassinated in New Orleans, a few years ago—an affair which shocked the people of this country and brought about international complications. I had to show that in our city alone our police establishment had given up 51 lives, and I was told on the floor that the police establishments of the United States of America during those years, year after year, had given up as many lives proportionately to the number engaged as were given up by our American Army in France.

I pay them honor. I say that I believe it is in their interest, I believe it is in the interest of the wage earners and of the laboring people of this country, that the police establishments and the wage earners' organizations shall be kept separate and apart. Policemen may organize for benevolent purposes and to aid and assist each other mutually, but I will take my stand with Mr. KITCHIN and Mr. MADDEN and say that it is against the best interests of this country, it is against the best interests of organized labor, for the police establishments to be affiliated with labor unions. It antagonizes them in the minds of the fair-minded American people to have the police establishments as a part of the American Federation of Labor, and it antagonizes the police department itself in the minds of fair-thinking people. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has expired.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I believe that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] has correctly voiced the purpose of this section of the bill. We want to pass a law so that policemen will not strike and leave the city unprotected, and when we accomplish that we have done all that, it seems to me, fair-minded Congressmen ought to be trying to do. That, I am sure, is the only purpose that I have in mind. I do not want to strike a blow at the American Federation of Labor. Is that what some gentlemen are trying to do by this measure? Are they trying to strike the American Federation of Labor a "side swipe"? I hope not. I do not think any such purpose would be legitimate or fair.

I myself want to sustain the American Federation of Labor in every proper and appropriate way. I am for it. I know that it does a world of good. I know that it represents the great moderate force in the labor movement in this country; that it stands for the rights of the great masses of the toilers; and that its principles and activities are consistent with the American Constitution and American ideals. [Applause.]

Some gentlemen of reactionary instincts, perhaps, do not realize it, but I want to say to them that the American Federation of Labor stands as a great bulwark against extreme radicalism and direct action in America to-day. [Applause.] As we love our country, we ought to hold up this great organization which stands for the legitimate aspiration of the workers and give it respect. I do not want to strike a single blow at it.

The purpose of gentlemen—the proper and legitimate purpose—of preventing strikes among members of the police force is fully carried out by the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK]. I hope that those who are real friends of labor and at the same time who want to protect the rights of the public and to insure that no strike of policemen will be possible will stand by that amendment and carry it through.

There is a great deal of misapprehension among Members, it seems, and a good deal of this argument is caused by the use of the word "affiliate" in the proposed law. Gentlemen use that word as though it had a certain legal significance. It has a certain meaning as applied to the American Federation of Labor, because labor organizations are affiliated with that organization upon definite terms; but it has no recognized or certain meaning whatever when applied to labor organizations not "affiliated" with the American Federation of Labor. It is then a word of vague, indefinite meaning. To say merely that "a policemen's union shall not be affiliated," and so forth, means nothing in itself. It depends altogether upon the terms of the affiliation. You might as well say that no police organization shall make any contract with any organization or with a certain organization. What would it mean, gentlemen? It would not mean anything. The trouble with the jealousy against "affiliation" is that gentlemen who do not know anything about the labor organizations or labor unions, or what their policies, practices, and ideals are, use this word and think it means some particular or definite relation. It does not, and any member of a labor union will tell you so.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

Mr. BEE. I wonder if the amendment of the gentleman from Texas would not compel a man who belongs to a labor organization, temporarily a policeman, to cancel his membership in that labor organization?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Quite to the contrary. It will permit a member, we will say, of the carpenters' union to go on the police force and yet retain his membership in his carpenters' organization. I will say for myself that is what I want done. [Applause.]

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed as much as anyone to a policeman having the privilege of striking while in the employ of a municipality, but I do not think that this provision will keep him from doing so. I have seen a number of strikes in my time that were not declared strikes. The men simply got together and quit, and it was just as effective as though a declaration of a strike had been made.

The way to settle this matter, to my mind, is that you provide in the contract of every policeman employed or that comes to take employment a provision that he shall not strike while in the employ of that municipality. By this plan you do not provide against any organization. You should also provide that he give two weeks' notice of a desire to leave the employment of that municipality.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARLAND. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. I think a better way to protect——

Mr. GARLAND. Oh, I do not yield for that. I have only three minutes.

Mr. RUCKER. But the gentleman——

Mr. GARLAND. Well, make it short.

Mr. RUCKER. No; go ahead. I will not ask anything.

Mr. GARLAND. The fact is that more than half of the policemen, I will venture to say, in this city and three-fourths of those in Pittsburgh and other cities carry union cards in their pockets. A number of Members of Congress carry union cards in their pockets. We do not have to provide that they shall not belong to a labor organization for fear of a strike. We have been trying to operate here in Congress departments where unfit individuals have been put in charge of them for the last eight years, ever since the Democratic administration went into power. The administration selected men with no knowledge of and no ability to command men, and have set them to run the departments. Then they come in here when a difficulty occurs and try to take away a God-given right, a constitutional right, of a man to belong to any organization he sees fit. You can not curtail him of that right.

My friends, I can have as much sympathy for the iron and steel workers with a card in my pocket as though I was in the organization here. All of these men who carry cards are in sympathy with the union movement. Their organization may strike, and you can not take away from them the right to belong to some home or trade organization, although you provide that while in the employ of the Government they shall not have the right to join any organization. There is only one way to control them, and that is to make the contract that I speak of.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, this in my judgment is more far-reaching than appears on its face, applying simply to the policemen of the city of Washington. This is an act of the American Congress that I believe the people of this country will construe as fundamental. I can not understand why the police force of a city has any more right to go on a strike than has the Army. To me the action of the police in the city of Boston and the contemplated action of the police right here in this Capital City of the Government is incomprehensible and horrible to contemplate. With Bolshevism running through all Europe and a part of this country, it is time that Congress takes this stand. Notwithstanding the gentleman from Alabama has said that there is no Bolshevism in the American Federation of Labor, the activities of such European poison manifests itself in the I. W. W. and many of the men belonging to organized labor. The good, law-abiding element in the unions oftentimes can not control the radical and lawless element, especially the dangerous foreigner. When union workers in this country defy the President of the United States and say that if they can not have their way they will strike and starve the people of the United States that is a flagrant disregard of the constituted authorities and an absolute disregard for the great unorganized mass of people who observe all law.

Now is the time for the Congress of the United States to take a firm stand. Do not be afraid of the few wild radicals among the many good men of organized labor who hold union cards who want to trample the rights of the American people under their feet, men who only work a few hours a day and then come around and grumble because some dairyman with a wife and family who all work 7 days a week and 15 hours a day charges a decent price for his milk. And yet these fellows want every holiday, half of Saturday, and all of Sunday, and come down here and ask for 44 hours to constitute a week's work. The bituminous coal miners, in utter disregard of their contract with the mine owners, now demand 30 hours to constitute a week's work. They demand, on top of that, 60 per cent increase in wages. They even say they will strike November 1 and freeze the women and children to death. Now is the time, gentlemen, to take a firm stand and say that the police shall not join a union that affiliates with the American Federation of Labor. Those men are officers of the State and take an oath to uphold the law. If some other union violates the law on a strike, the police must be free to handle them. Let them belong to their own union, but under no circumstances should they be allowed to be connected with the American Federation of Labor. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, every Member of this House who has spoken, I believe, except one, has expressed his opinion that the time has come for Congress to prevent police organizations from joining unions that affiliate with other unions that could bring about a sympathetic strike. If that is the object of Congress, what is going to sidetrack or sidestep us? I believe that the amendment of the gentleman from Texas, my colleague, Mr. BLACK, does not go quite far enough, because it permits the police organizations to affiliate with other organizations of Government employees. Every single Member of Congress knows that every Government employees' organization—in other words, the national organization of Federal employees of this Government—is already affiliated with the American Federation of Labor. Under my colleague's amendment this police organization could affiliate with other employee organizations, and they are affiliated with the American Federation of Labor. Any other organization so affiliated could bring about a sympathetic strike and you would have the same condition that exists in New York City to-day.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I regret that I can not yield, because I want to bring this thought before the House. We have been talking about relieving the high cost of living and we have wasted many days. Yet to-day, because of a sympathetic strike among the longshoremen and expressmen in New York, the morning paper tells us that 5,000 tons of food are rotting in New York to-day because of that sympathetic strike. We are going to have a duplication of the Boston police strike unless we remedy it by this legislation. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I am very much interested in this matter and I am interested in the substance a great deal more than I am in the form. So far as I have been able to gather in listening to the amendments read and to the analysis of them that has been made, it seems to me that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] comes nearer reaching the solution than does the proposition in the original bill; that is to say, the proposition we desire to attain.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. Yes; for a question.

Mr. SNYDER. Does the gentleman think that this amendment would permit a man who belongs to the carpenters' union and joins the police force to retain his membership in the carpenters' union?

Mr. GARRETT. I do not think so. That is a construction others place upon it. Let me hasten to say that the thing I am anxious to obtain, and if this amendment that is proposed does not do it I hope we can have other amendments offered until we reach the result, is to absolutely prevent the police force in the District of Columbia from affiliating or being connected in any sort of way with any kind of a labor union. [Applause.]

In this period of unrest when every citizen of this Republic is trembling for the future because of the activity, not of the reasonable officials of the American Federation of Labor, but because of the action of a number of other irresponsible members of some of the affiliated organizations, with that occurring everywhere, the time has come when the Congress of this Republic should speak in a determined, plain, and unmistakable way a word in favor of law, law, law. [Applause.]

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RUCKER. Is the time all consumed or all promised?

The CHAIRMAN. All promised.

Mr. RUCKER. There is no chance for anyone else to get any time?

The CHAIRMAN. Not under the action of the committee in limiting the debate.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I desire to offer.

Gentlemen of the committee all seem to desire that this act be so framed as to prevent members of the police in the District of Columbia from joining a union so affiliated with other unions as to make it possible that the police may be called out on strike. I submit the following amendment, which, I take it, in connection with the language of the bill, will accomplish that purpose:

After the word "which," in line 11, insert the following: "itself or any subordinate, component, or affiliated organization of which."

Mr. RAMSEYER. That does not come in line 11, does it?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes; there are two prints of the bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, if you adopt this amendment it makes absolutely clear what the committee says is intended by this section.

It has been urged by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] that section 2 would not permit the police union from affiliating with the American Federation of Labor, because the American Federation of Labor in itself neither strikes nor calls strikes, but the subordinate unions of the American Federation of Labor do that. If you adopt this amendment, it provides that the police shall not join a union of their own which advocates strikes. It provides that they shall not join another organization nor shall affiliate with another organization which advocates strikes. My amendment provides that they shall not affiliate with another organization any component part of which or any subordinate part of which or any affiliated organization which, in turn, advocates the right to strike or to demand of its members that they strike. So I take it that if the committee means what it says the adoption of my amendment will clarify the language and make it plain that this Congress is determined that the police of the District of Columbia shall not owe an allegiance to any such organization which is higher than that they owe to the Government which they are sworn to support.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. BLACK. Offer it as a substitute for mine.

Mr. CONNALLY. I offer it as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK], at his suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CONNALLY as a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. BLACK: On page 3, line 11, after the word "which," insert "itself or any subordinate, component, or affiliated organization of which."

The CHAIRMAN. This amendment is read for information.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I call attention to the fact that that should be in line 14, instead of in line 11.

Mr. RAMSEYER. There are two different prints of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] is recognized.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I think this section is just right without any amendment at all. Various amendments are offered, one from one angle and another from another angle. Section 2 provides first:

That no member of the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia shall be or become a member of any organization, or of any organization affiliated with another organization, which holds, claims, or exercises the right to demand of any of its membership obedience to an order to strike or cease work for any cause.

Now that covers the whole ground. He shall not belong to a union of policemen that can order a strike under an order of that organization. He shall not belong to any organization that is affiliated with any organization that can order a strike. They say the American Federation of Labor can not order a strike, but that it is composed of a number of organizations, many of them scattered throughout the country, either one of which can order a strike. That is affiliation, isn't it? Now, the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK], if it should be adopted, would allow membership with the Government clerks, with the postmasters, with rural-route carriers, who are affiliated with the American Federation of Labor. I will not discuss that now, but at the proper time and occasion I will. Their first loyalty ought to be to the Government. I am not speaking of that, but they are just as much affiliated as the steel strikers are affiliated with them.

Now, this only prohibits the policemen in the District of Columbia, who might be said to be the civil soldiers of the District of Columbia, from belonging to an organization which has a membership that would strike when ordered to strike. Ah, but that does not touch the American Federation of Labor. No, but the American Federation of Labor is affiliated with scores and scores of people who do order strikes. In fact, it charters them. The American Federation charters the clerks, charters the postmasters, charters the rural-route carriers. But they are not policemen. This only touches the civil soldiers of the District of Columbia—the policemen. I think it should not be amended in any respect.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has expired. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON].

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I believe in the right of laboring men to organize, and I believe in their right to strike in order to secure better wages and working conditions; but I do not believe that the members of any police force ought to belong to any police organization which believes in or exercises the right to strike or affiliates with another organization which believes in or exercises the right to strike. I do not think that men in any essential employment ought to exercise the right to strike against the Government, either State, National, or municipal, or against any agency that, under our form of government, essentially exercises the functions of government. Therefore I shall support this bill. I did think that there ought to be a slight amendment made to perfect the text and make clearer its meaning, but there have been so many amendments offered here that I do not think I will offer it. I think the words "either of" ought to be inserted in front of the word "which" in line 11 on page 3, so that it will read "either of which holds, claims, or exercises the right to demand of its membership obedience to an order to strike or cease work for any cause," and so forth, in order to make the meaning absolutely clear; but after hearing the remarks of members of the committee and after conferring with others who feel reasonably sure that the meaning is clear enough as it is, I shall not offer the amendment. Personally I think it would make the meaning of the bill clearer if those words were inserted.

Mr. Chairman, I think the city of Washington ought to have a police force that would be a model for the entire Nation. And the police force of the Nation's Capital ought to have the privilege of serving under model conditions. There should be no necessity or occasion for their having to organize or affiliate with any other organization in order to secure adequate wages or proper working conditions. And this ought to be true of all American cities as well as of Washington. But certainly those who are intrusted with the duty and responsibility of preserving the peace and protecting the lives and the homes and the property of the people of our American cities ought to owe allegience and obedience to none except the governments that employ them. In that respect they should be absolutely above suspicion or doubt, in order that they may under all circumstances have the confidence and the respect of the public. This is fundamental, and to the extent that this bill will help to promote that end, I think it should receive the hearty support of all the Members.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me this debate has pretty clearly demonstrated that the language of this section covers the situation which the membership of the House thinks ought to be covered, and that it would be dangerous to amend it in the confusion which exists here this afternoon.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] has introduced an amendment which some Members think means one thing and some Members think means another. Some say it goes too far and others say it does not go far enough. The gentleman's colleague [Mr. CONNALLY] has offered a substitute which, it seems to me, comes right back to the language of the bill.

If we stick to the language of the bill, I believe that the situation will be taken care of and that it is better than anything that has been proposed here this afternoon. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the substitute amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] be again read for the information of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the substitute will be reported.

There was no objection, and the Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CONNALLY as a substitute for the amendment of Mr. Black: Page 3, line 11, after the word "which," insert "itself or any subordinate, component, or affiliated organization of which."

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I accept that as a substitute for my amendment.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MANSFIELD], from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN], from Texas [Mr. PARRISH], from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH], and from Nevada [Mr. EVANS]?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 40, noes 59.

So the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I understood that he withdrew that.

Mr. BLACK. Oh, I did not withdraw it. I said that the substitute was acceptable to me, but I did not withdraw mine.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLACK) there were—ayes 40, noes 59.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas demands tellers. All in favor of ordering tellers will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Thirteen Members have risen, not a sufficient number, and tellers are refused.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON: Page 3, line 10, after the word "any," strike out the words "organization, or of an organization affiliated with another organization, which," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "police organization which affiliates with the American Federation of Labor or which."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 2, noes 75.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with the amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TREADWAY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 9821, an act relating to the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendment to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the bill was passed.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is any gentleman on the committee opposed to the bill? Is the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] opposed to the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. I am opposed to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] opposed to the bill?

Mr. CONNALLY. I am against the bill as it stands.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. The Chair announced that the bill was passed.

Mr. BLANTON. I was trying to get recognition.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman states that he was trying to get recognition, the Chair thinks he ought to be recognized.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following motion to recommit, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Motion to recommit offered by Mr. BLANTON:

"Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit this bill to the Committee on the District of Columbia, with instructions to report the same back to the House forthwith with the following amendment, to wit:

"On page 2, line 4, strike out '$4,500' and insert in lieu thereof '$4,200'; in line 5 strike out '$3,000' and insert '$2,750'; in line 6 strike out '$2,400' and insert '$2,160'; in line 7 strike out '$1,400' and insert '$1,600'; in line 8 strike out '$2,300' and insert '$2,000'; in line 9 strike out '$2,000' and insert '$1,760'; in line 10 strike out '$1,800' and insert '$1,560'; in line 11 strike out '$1,660' and insert '$1,420'; in line 12 strike out '$1,560' and insert '$1,320'; and in line 14 strike out '$1,460' and insert in lieu thereof '$1,220.'"

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves the previous question on the motion to recommit——

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. The gentleman from Texas is asking recognition to offer a substitute motion.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman can not do it as long as the gentleman from Michigan moved the previous question.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas to recommit.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Division, Mr. Speaker, and pending that I make the point of order that there is no quorum present, the House having divided.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman makes the point of order of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After having counted.] One hundred and fifty-nine gentlemen are present, not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 2, nays 249, answered "present" 2, not voting 177, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 222, noes 8.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. MAPES, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

COMPENSATION FOR POSTAL EMPLOYEES.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House joint resolution 151, the post office salary bill, and disagree to the Senate amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON], chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House joint resolution providing additional compensation for the Postal Service, to disagree to the Senate amendments, and to agree to the conference asked for by the Senate. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution 151, to provide additional compensation for employees of the Postal Service and making appropriation therefor.

The SPEAKER appointed the following conferees: Mr. STEENERSON, Mr. MADDEN, Mr. GRIEST, Mr. MOON, and Mr. BELL.

Mr. STEENERSON. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask to have a reprint of the joint resolution with the Senate amendments included.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that a print of the resolution be made with the Senate amendments numbered. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. DOWELL. Reserving the right to object, on what subject?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. On Theodore Roosevelt.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by printing a short address of Secretary Wilson at the opening of the industrial conference.

Mr. GOULD. I reserve the right to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by inserting an address of Secretary Wilson at the opening of the industrial conference. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Well, Mr. Speaker, there were a whole lot of addresses made down there. I do not think that has any place in the records of Congress. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that immediately after the reading of the Journal to-morrow morning and the disposition of matters on the Speaker's table the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM], chairman of the Committee on the Investigation of Expenditures in the War Department, may have the opportunity of addressing the House for one hour on the work of that committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the request of the gentleman from Illinois as submitted by himself on Saturday was in its final form that there should be an hour's time, one half to be controlled by himself and the other half by the minority of the subcommittee. I know in a general way the subject he desires to discuss, although I do not know what he desires to say. Does the gentleman from Wyoming agree to that?

Mr. MONDELL. Whatever is agreeable to the gentleman from Illinois in the matter will be agreeable to me.

Mr. MADDEN. I was here when the colloquy occurred between the gentleman from Tennessee and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM], and it was understood that the time should be divided equally between the two gentlemen.

Mr. MONDELL. Very well. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that to-morrow, immediately after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of matters on the Speaker's table, the Select Committee on Expenditures in the War Department may be given one hour, the time to be controlled equally by the chairman of that committee and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, let me ask the gentleman from Wyoming whether, in view of the fact that the rehabilitation bill has been put over twice, and to-morrow was set for final discussion, there would be any objection to the request that we meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow?

Mr. MONDELL. I have discussed that with the gentleman from Ohio, and I think there would be. I would have no objection, but I think there would be objection in other quarters.

Mr. KITCHIN. We would save no time, because a point of no quorum would be made.

Mr. FESS. Is it the gentleman's idea that after these addresses are over the rehabilitation bill will go on?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming?

There was no objection.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION AND BILL SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled joint resolution and bill of the following titles:

S. J. Res. 90. Joint resolution to readmit Frances Scoville-Mumm to the character and privileges of a citizen of the United States; and

S. 633. An act extending the provisions for the regulation of steam vessels to vessels owned or operated by the United States Shipping Board, and for other purposes.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. OLIVER, for one day, on account of official business with the naval subcommittee.

To Mr. HICKS, for to-morrow, on account of official business.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, October 14, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Clerk of the House of Representatives, transmitting testimony, papers, and documents relating to the contested-election case in the seventh Missouri district (H. Doc. No. 265), was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Elections No. 1, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. GOODALL, from the Committee on Elections No. 2, to which was referred the contested-election case of Peter F. Tague v. John F. Fitzgerald, submitted a report (No. 375) thereon, which said report was referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. MILLER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 9112) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan Army rifles to posts of the American Legion, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 376), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON: A bill (H. R. 9899) to provide for the disposition of abandoned portions of rights of way granted to railroad companies; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. KAHN: A bill (H. R. 9900) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes," approved July 11, 1919, so as to authorize travel allowances to persons discharged from disciplinary barracks and other places of confinement other than honorably, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. LANKFORD: A bill (H. R. 9901) to increase appropriation for the purchase of site and erection of a building for a post office at Douglas, Ga.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. HULINGS: A bill (H. R. 9902) for the protection and encouragement of the American merchant marine; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, October 14, 1919.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we thank Thee for the freedom which wraps us as with a mantle of glory, for freedom of speech and of council and freedom of conscience and thought. We desire to bring our free thought and conscience into harmony with Thy will to accomplish Thy great purpose in us as a Nation. Guide us this day to this end. We ask it for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Vice President being absent, the President pro tempore took the chair.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. SMOOT and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-nine Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

VOCATIONAL REHABILITATION (S. DOC. NO. 133).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the vice chairman of the Federal Board for Vocational Education submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation in the sum of $20,000,000 required by the board for carrying out the provisions of the vocational rehabilitation act during the current fiscal year, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

CIVILIAN EMPLOYMENT OF COMMISSIONED OFFICERS (S. DOC. NO. 132).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of August 23, 1919, statements relative to the administration, organization, and personnel in or attached to the office establishment of the Chief of Staff of the Army, Washington, D. C., which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8624) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," approved August 10, 1917.

The message also announced that the House agrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7972) to improve the administration of the Postal Service in the Territory of Hawaii.

The message further announced that the House agrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9203) to punish the transportation of stolen motor vehicles in interstate and foreign commerce.

The message also announced that the House disagrees to the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 151) to provide additional compensation for employees of the Postal Service and making an appropriation therefor, agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. STEENERSON, Mr. MADDEN, Mr. GRIEST, Mr. STERLING, and Mr. BANKHEAD managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 9821) to amend an act entitled "An act relating to the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia," approved February 28, 1901, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution, and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

S. 633. An act extending the provisions for the regulation of steam vessels to vessels owned or operated by the United States Shipping Board, and for other purposes; and

S. J. Res. 90. Joint resolution to readmit Frances Scoville-Mumm to the character and privileges of a citizen of the United States.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 9821. An act to amend an act entitled "An act relating to the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia," approved February 28, 1901, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MYERS. I present a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Montana, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

House joint resolution 9.

A resolution to the Congress of the United States from the Sixteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, in special session, relating to the highway system running from the south boundary of the Blackfeet Reservation to Glacier Park and to the Canadian border.

Whereas there is an important road in the highway system of Montana running from the south border of the Blackfeet Indian Reservation to Glacier Park, and from the town of Babb on the Blackfeet Indian Reservation straight north to the Canadian line, a total distance of about 50 miles; and

Whereas this road is now in very bad condition and some of it practically impassable; and

Whereas the improvement of this highway is essential to the development of commercial relations with Canada, and is necessary for the encouragement of travel into Glacier National Park by automobile; and

Whereas the Province of Alberta has just completed a good road from Banff Park to the Montana line, it being evident that the improvement of the road from Babb to the Canadian line would make the most accessible highway to connect Glacier National Park, in the United States, with the Rocky Mountain Parks in Canada: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana in special session, That the Department of the Interior of the United States Government be, and is hereby, urged to build and maintain a highway north and south across the Blackfeet Indian Reservation; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States from the State of Montana, requesting them that they take such action as may be necessary and proper for the purpose of securing to the State of Montana equal terms and prices to those similarly situated for petroleum and its by-products.

Speaker of the House.

Mr. MYERS. I present a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Montana, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

House joint resolution 11,

Relating to the independence of Ireland.

Whereas the people of Ireland for 750 years have been struggling to maintain their national independence and during that time have suffered the oppression that always follows where a people are compelled to live under a government not founded upon the consent of the governed; and

Whereas the United States of America fought and assisted in winning the war for the establishment and preservation of the principle of the right of self-determination; and

Whereas the people of Ireland have determined for themselves the form of Government under which they propose to live: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the House of Representatives of the State of Montana, the senate concurring, do urge that the Congress of the United States by resolution ask the President of the United States to use all peaceful means to secure the general recognition of the republic of Ireland as a member of the nations of the world; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded by the secretary of state to the Secretary of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, to the Secretary of the Senate of the United States, and to the President of the United States.

Mr. MYERS. I present a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Montana, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate joint memorial 5.

A memorial petitioning Congress to enact legislation for the prevention of monopoly control and the reduction of the price of farm implements and machinery.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Whereas as has been demonstrated by Federal investigation, the production of farm implements and machinery is wholly controlled by the few private interests who conduct and operate said industries; and

Whereas the said price of said farm implements and machinery has for the past two years or over been steadily advancing; and

Whereas said increase in price has been wholly out of proportion to the legitimate operation of the laws of supply and demand but has been and is in a large measure the result of monopoly price control; and

Whereas said products enter into interstate commerce and are of necessity universally purchased by all engaged in farming and thereby rendering impossible and ineffective any attempt at price regulation by the several States; and

Whereas in connection with the sale of farm implements and machinery in particular, grave abuses have arisen and exist resulting from the practice of said manufacturers in selling their products on commission, and thereafter dictating the price at which said products shall be sold by the persons to whom the same have been consigned, and often enormously increasing said prices without any economic reason for so doing; and

Whereas all the people of the United States are the victims directly or indirectly of unwarranted and extortionate profiteering in the industry hereinbefore mentioned: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, your memorialists, the Sixteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, in extraordinary session convened, do earnestly petition the Congress of the United States to enact with all possible expedition and dispatch suitable laws to control and regulate monopoly in the industry hereinbefore mentioned and to effect a reduction in the price at which farm implements and machinery are now sold to the public; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of the State of Montana be, and he is hereby, directed to forward a duly authenticated copy of this memorial both to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, and like copies to each of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from Montana, with the request that they use their best endeavors to bring about a speedy consummation of the relief herein petitioned for.

Mr. MYERS presented a petition of sundry citizens of Melstone, Mont., and a petition of sundry citizens of Thompson Falls, Mont., praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty without amendment or reservation, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of Baltimore, Md., and a petition of the faculty and students of Hood College, Frederick, Md., praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Wheeler, Mich., remonstrating against atrocities of the Turks against the Armenians, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PAGE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2746) to amend the act of June 3, 1916, entitled "the national defense act," adding section 15½ thereto, and for other purposes, submitted an adverse report (No. 267) thereon, which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 1300) to authorize the sale of certain lands at or near Minidoka, Idaho, for railroad purposes, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report (No. 261) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 2188) to amend section 3 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1901 (31 Stat. L., p. 1133) (Rept. No. 262); and

A bill (S. 2379) to provide for the disposition of certain public lands withdrawn and improved under the provisions of the act of Congress approved June 25, 1910 (36 Stat. L., p. 847), as amended by the act of August 24, 1912 (37 Stat. L., p. 497), and which are no longer needed (Rept. No. 263).

Mr. CAPPER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 5818) for the retirement of public-school teachers in the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 264) thereon.

OFFICERS OF NAVY AND MARINE CORPS.

Mr. PAGE. From the Committee on Naval Affairs I report back favorably with an amendment the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 112) continuing temporarily certain allowances to officers of the Navy and Marine Corps, and I submit a report (No. 266) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. NORRIS. Let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Whereas since it now appears that peace has not been declared by October 1, 1919, on which date officers of the Navy, by operation of law, will cease to receive the benefits prescribed in the act of April 16, 1918 (Public, No. 129); and

Whereas said benefits will accrue to officers of the Army until peace shall have been declared: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the paragraph in the act of July 11, 1919 (Public, No. 8), which reads as follows: "The act of April 16, 1918 (Public, No. 129), granting under certain conditions to every commissioned officer of the Army the right to quarters in kind for their dependents or the authorized commutation therefor, including the allowances for heat and light, shall hereafter be construed to apply to officers of the Navy and Marine Corps only during the period of the war and in no event beyond October 1, 1919," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, at the end of the joint resolution, on page 2, line 3, after the word "repealed," to insert a colon and the following proviso:

Provided, That officers of the Navy and Marine Corps shall be entitled to all the rights and benefits under said act of April 16, 1918 (Public, No. 129), from and after October 1, 1919.

Mr. NORRIS. Will it be the effect of the joint resolution to continue these allowances without limit?

Mr. PAGE. No; the effect of it will be to place the Navy on the same basis as the Army until the conclusion of hostilities or the end of the present emergency.

Mr. NORRIS. Is there a law applying to the Army which provides that the allowances shall cease?

Mr. LODGE. There is. This puts the sailors and the Marine Corps on the same basis as soldiers in the Army.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

POCOMOKE RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. CALDER. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (S. 3190) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Pocomoke River at Pocomoke, Md., and I submit a report (No. 265) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the State roads commission of the State of Maryland, its successors and assigns, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Pocomoke River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, and at or near Pocomoke City, in Worcester County, State of Maryland, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXTENSION OF CLAYTON ACT.

Mr. KELLOGG. From the Committee on the Judiciary I report back favorably with an amendment the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 46) extending until July 1, 1920, the effective date of section 10 of an act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution which he has just reported. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. GRONNA. Let the joint resolution be read.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the effective date on and after which the provisions of section 10 of the act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914, shall become and be effective is hereby deferred and extended to July 1, 1920: Provided, That said section shall become effective on March 1, 1919, as to any corporations hereafter organized.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. SMOOT. Let the Senator from Minnesota first explain the joint resolution, Mr. President.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, the joint resolution relates to the provision of the Clayton Act as to common directors of railroads. The Interstate Commerce Commission first recommended that the date when section 10 of the act referred to should become operative be extended, and then recommended that the time of its operation be extended during the war, because all of the railroads are in the hands of the Government except certain short lines, and section 10 would work to their disadvantage. Now, the Interstate Commerce Commission have recommended the extension of the act until after the war is over. I think that, perhaps, it should be extended a little longer, but the Committee on the Judiciary concluded to make the extension until the 1st of July, 1920.

I do not know of any objection from anybody to the joint resolution. The short lines have asked for the extension of the act; the railroads generally do not object, for they are in the hands of the Government; and the Interstate Commerce Commission think it should be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, do I understand that the joint resolution applies only to railroads?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes; I believe it applies only to railroads.

Mr. GRONNA. If it does, I shall have no objection to its consideration, but if it does not I shall object.

Mr. KELLOGG. I have not the original act before me, but my recollection is that it applies only to railroads.

Mr. GRONNA. I think I shall ask that the joint resolution go over, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota objects to the present consideration of the joint resolution, and it will go to the calendar.

Mr. KELLOGG subsequently said: Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from North Dakota is willing to withdraw his objection to Senate joint resolution 46, for which I asked immediate consideration.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution formerly read. Is there objection?

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, a moment ago I objected to the consideration of the joint resolution because I did not know at the time that it had reference only to purchases by the railroads. The Senators from Minnesota have explained to me what it contemplates, and I have no objection.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 46) extending until July 1, 1920, the effective date of section 10 of the act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment, on page 1, lines 8 and 9, to strike out the proviso and to insert:

Provided, That said section shall be effective as to all corporations organized after January 12, 1918.

So as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That the effective date on and after which the provisions of section 10 of the act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914, shall become and be effective is hereby deferred and extended to July 1, 1920: Provided, That said section shall be effective as to all corporations organized after January 12, 1918.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. DILLINGHAM:

A bill (S. 3222) to amend sections 4 and 10 of the act of June 29, 1906, as amended, relating to naturalization, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Immigration.

By Mr. NORRIS:

A bill (S. 3223) authorizing the Federal Trade Commission to accept and administer for the benefit of the public and the encouragement of industry inventions, patents, and patent rights, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. WADSWORTH:

A bill (S. 3224) relating to the creation in the Army of the United States of the grade of lieutenant general; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. KENDRICK:

A bill (S. 3225) for the relief of bona fide settlers who intermarry after having complied with the homestead law for one year; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. CHAMBERLAIN:

A bill (S. 3226) for the relief of Herbert M. Friendly and Archibald E. Burns and each of them; to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. TOWNSEND:

A bill (S. 3227) to carry into effect the findings of the Court of Claims in favor of Myron C. Bond, Guy M. Claflin, and Edwin A. Wells; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. PHELAN:

A bill (S. 3228) granting a pension to Harry L. Dean (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 3229) granting a pension to Margaret Scholton (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. McNARY:

A bill (S. 3230) to provide for the national welfare by assuring an adequate supply of sugar for the people of the United States for the year ending December 31, 1920; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

AMENDMENTS TO DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. POMERENE submitted an amendment proposing to repeal the limitation contained in the legislative act of March 1, 1919, relative to the number of persons employed by the Bureau of Efficiency at rates of compensation in excess of $3,000 per annum, intended to be proposed by him to the first deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment authorizing the Bureau of Efficiency to use not more than $5,000 of its current appropriation for the payment of rewards to Federal employees for suggestions or inventions which result in material economy or increased efficiency in handling Government business, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the first deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment authorizing the Bureau of Efficiency to establish and conduct a service school for employees of the Federal Government and for the District of Columbia in such Government buildings as may be available, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the first deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment providing that in order to facilitate the Bureau of Efficiency's investigation of duplication of work in the several executive departments and independent establishments as now authorized by law it is directed that before any Government department or independent establishment shall undertake any new activity, inquiry, or investigation, the Bureau of Efficiency shall be informed of such action, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the first deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

COLD-STORAGE REGULATIONS.

Mr. McNARY submitted amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 9521) to prevent hoarding and deterioration of and deception with respect to cold-storage foods, to regulate shipments of cold-storage foods in interstate commerce, and for other purposes, which were referred to the Committe on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

SHORTAGE OF SUGAR.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I desire to have inserted in the RECORD a clipping from the Washington Star of yesterday with reference to the sugar situation, and especially stating that the Hawaiian sugar crop has not been sold to Japan but to the United States.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"DENIES HAWAIIAN SUGAR SOLD TO JAPANESE.

"Judge Sidney Ballou, attorney for the Hawaiian Sugar Planters' Association, in a statement here last night denied that next year's Hawaiian sugar crop had been sold to Japanese interests, as stated by Senator SMOOT, of Utah, Saturday during the course of debate in the Senate on the sugar shortage.

"'The entire Hawaiian crop,' said Judge Ballou's statement, 'has been sold to two sugar refineries in California, the California & Hawaiian and the Western. It will be refined on the Pacific coast and distributed to American consumers. No sale to the Japanese has ever been contemplated. The Hawaiian planters would consider it an act of disloyalty to divert their supplies from their own country in time of need, and there is nothing in their record of unswerving support of the Food Administration during the war which would justify the circulation of such a report.'

"Senator GAY, of Louisiana, made a similar denial of the information which Senator SMOOT said had reached him, in debate which followed the Utah Senator's address."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in connection with the article presented by the Senator from Florida I wish to say that a number of the papers have stated that I said that the Hawaiian sugar crop had been sold. I did state on the floor of the Senate that I was told by one of the leading sugar men of the United States that the Hawaiian sugar producers had contracted for the sale of their sugar for this year. My informant was a gentleman who has been in the sugar business for a long time; he came direct from Chicago and stated that he had just left a meeting at which that statement had been made. It was upon that statement that I said if such was the case we would have a shortage of sugar.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am only anxious to see that a correct statement is given to the people of the situation.

ARTICLE BY ALFRED B. WILLIAMS.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the New York Times of Sunday published a very instructive and interesting article entitled "When Real Bolshevism Was Here in 1793–1796." The article is by Mr. Alfred B. Williams, whose account of the insurrectionary character of the mission of "Citizen" Genet during the administration of President Washington affords a parallel to some of the excitements and conditions of the present time with which the public is not generally familiar. I think it would be most useful and instructive to insert this article in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and I ask that it be inserted in the next issue of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the article referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Oct. 12, 1919.]

"WHEN REAL BOLSHEVISM WAS HERE IN 1793–1796—THAT WAS WHEN THE 'REDS' DRANK DEEP AND LOUDLY DEFIED THE GOVERNMENT, PARADED AND DENOUNCED GEORGE WASHINGTON, CHEERED 'CITIZEN' GENET, AND ADVOCATED THE BOMB AS A PANACEA.

"(By Alfred B. Williams.)

"Bolshevism and revolutionary tendencies as we have them now compare with the frenzies with which President Washington had to deal as a mild attack of dyspeptic irritation compares with a roaring case of delirium tremens.

"From April, 1793, well into 1796 rabid anarchy swept over the baby Republic, from Boston to Savannah, like prairie fire. Comparison with delirium tremens is right, because, so far as we may judge from the scraps of history available, the little Nation was wildly drunk the greater part of the three years. Certainly liquor was sprinkled, poured, and soaked throughout the orgy. The reek of it comes to us strongly across more than a century and a quarter of time in the frantic speeches, toasts, printed articles, and crazy, limping versification vociferously applauded by crowds at banquets spread to glorify the red cap and the guillotine.

"Cities, sections, and classes seem to have vied with one another in howling threats to destroy our own Government and all government and to make here a reign of terror in faithful imitation of the worst excesses of the French Revolution. The thoughts, the talk, and the songs of men and the columns of newspapers and pages of pamphlets bristled and burnt with 'Ca ira,' with la lanterne for the bourgeoisie, the capitalist and the stock jobber, tumbrils and the ax for all aristocrats, with daggers for the hearts of Senators and rulers, the torch for the homes of wealth, the tumbling over and tearing down of authority.

"This was in the happy, simple, and sturdily patriotic early days of our land which orators lament with pathetic glibness and extol with blatant belittling of the present. The school histories, and most of the others, cater to national vanity and ancestral pride by gliding over this period of contagious lunacy and treason with dutiful daintiness. Apparently it has been thought not good to inform oncoming generations that so many of those we are taught to revere as the founders had their desperate spree, tried to fire the temple before it had been completed, and were far more dangerous than all the wild-eyed and wild-ideaed foreigners we are denouncing and dreading.

"INSANITY NOT NEW HERE.

"Yet the effects of a good tonic are valuable, however unpalatable the taste of it. It is easy to find in the records of that old time the tonic of confidence for the present. When we are frightened by ugly symptoms it is reassuring to remember that like symptoms appeared long ago far more virulently and subsided, with no harm done and leaving no traces. We may find substantial comfort in the thought that if a frail, unfinished structure endured a worse shock than is possible now, there can be no reason to fear for the Nation as it is. Really, we need go back in our history no further than 55 years to understand that if the numbers, the power, the brains, organization, and courage enlisted in the Southern Confederacy failed to dismember or destroy this Union no other force now imaginable can disturb it seriously, but the earlier test was severe undoubtedly. It is worth recalling, at least as evidence, that temporary insanity is not a new disease in this country and that its occasional and sporadic appearance does not prove decadence.

"Further, we may find in it cheering demonstration of the conservative influence of American institutions and surroundings. 'Citizen' Genet, agent of the new and crazy French Republic and the provocation and center of the storm, lived to be a peaceful and prosperous gentleman farmer, busy and active in trying to promote cultivation of the silkworm in this country. Twenty-five years after he was threatening to overthrow Washington and the entire United States, he was reading essays to his fellow farmers in northern New York, telling them how to restore our lost balance of trade by growing more wool and flax to increase our exports. He was a valuable and enthusiastic helper of DeWitt Clinton in building the Erie Canal, and his great-great-grandson, by curious coincidence, was the first man to die under the American flag in France in 1917.

"The 'Red' destroyer not only became a constructive patriot, but founded a line of good and patriotic citizens. Brockholst Livingston, chosen and approved mouthpiece of one of the most furious mobs New York City ever saw, when Hamilton was stoned at the Tontine Coffee House because he dared to talk plain common sense, lived to become an honored and faithful Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.

"Possibly the most really humiliating element of what we would call now 'Bolshevism' in 1793–1796 were the absurdities and incongruities it developed. Genet came accredited by the persons calling themselves the French Government—in many respects the exact model for the Trotski and Lenin control now in Russia. He landed at Charleston April 8, 1793, three months after the execution of King Louis, head filled and perhaps hands stained with slaughter, intent on rushing this country headlong into alliance with the French and war against Great Britain. His ship carried at her masthead the bonnet rouge, the red cap itself, emblem of the ideas of liberty then prevailing in Paris and of the flow of blood so ardently demanded by the patriots there.

"It was on the same day that President Washington issued his proclamation of neutrality as between France and Great Britain, omitting, however, the word 'neutrality' in deference to the scruples of Jefferson, who feared that the American public would be driven to uncontrollable rage by the sight and sound of it.

"'RED CAPS' IN THE SOUTH.

"Then the grim and ugly fun began. The 'Citizen' and his red cap were received by throngs of South Carolinians, headed by Gov. Moultrie and welcomed with an ecstacy of acclamation. His progress toward Philadelphia, capital of the country, was a long triumph, a series of ovations. Church bells were rung everywhere in honor of the representative of the nation that had just repudiated all religions and desecrated such churches as it had not destroyed. The Carolina gentry rode long distances in his train, shouting for liberty and fraternity, the rights of man, and the equality of all men, fuddling themselves continually with toasts to the same great principles. Virginians, priding themselves on descent from the British nobility, tossed off bumpers and tossed away costly hats in enthusiastic honor of the unbreeched and for the damnation of England and all aristocrats and aristocracy. Communities in which proposals to celebrate Washington's Birthday had been met by bitter and enraged protests as savoring of monarchistic customs, cheered stormily for Danton and rejoiced over massacre.

"It was no upheaval of the proletariat, the workingman, or the peasantry. All these were elbowed aside and consigned to silence by lordly planters, untitled aristocrats, politicians, lawyers, even preachers, monopolizing leadership and craving prominence in denunciation of their own Government and its policies and praise of the commune and anarchy. The murder of the King who 14 years before had sent troops, ships, and money to help us win the War for Independence seemed to be approved universally by the same people to whom he had given timely help. Those who had cut off his head were welcomed as benefactors and blood brothers.

"Philadelphia was a riot of joy over the arrival of Genet, of seething hate of Washington, and tempestuous love for Danton and his party. Banquets were given the agent by the 'German Republicans,' the 'French Republicans,' and the 'American Republicans.' At each of these, according to the publications of the day and the intrinsic evidence of surviving records, whisky punch and Madeira flowed copiously. At each a huge red cap was set aloft on the table, and the company joined hands and danced around it fraternally, singing 'Ca ira' and the 'Marseillaise,' and a song improvised and much in vogue for such occasions beginning 'Freedom's sons are Frenchmen all.'

"PROLETARIANS WERE OUTSIDERS.

"Crowds of the excluded proletariat surrounded the scenes of these festivities, 'huzzaed' vociferously, and attended Genet on the streets, shrieking for him and against the Government. The welcome culminated, but did not abate, with a grand affair June 1, for which 600 patriots contributed $4 each, preceded by a succession of Republican parades in the streets, the most notable fact of which was that at every step there were damns and groans for Washington and neutrality.

"The name 'Republican' was dropped quickly as suggestive too much of an organized, orderly, and established Government, authority, and peace. The souls of the noisy and apparently prevailing throngs sickened at the thought of such trammels. So far as can be gathered now, nobody was to be accepted as leader or ruler. Any man assuming to direct or control his fellow man was to be decapitated. 'Democratic societies' were organized, modeled after the Jacobin societies of Paris. The chief officers of these, in Philadelphia, bore names now associated with conservative tendencies as Rittenhouse, Biddle, Dallas, and Sergeant.

"Even then New York was not to be outdone by Philadelphia, though the latter city was the capital. The New Yorkers not only rang their church bells and packed the streets to welcome the 'Citizen,' but they inaugurated something Philadelphia seems to have overlooked—fired cannon in his honor. Nothing that could be devised to infuriate Great Britain and stimulate her to war against us or to insult the President was omitted. The same New York that 19 years later, in 1812, opposed war with Great Britain with all the power of its unanimous press and the overwhelming majority of its citizenship, met 'Citizen' Genet with howled challenges to Britain to battle and demands for its overthrow as the most formidable of all tyrannies and foes to liberty, always then begun with the biggest 'L' that could be made.

"No wonder the Frenchman was convinced he owned and could rule America as firmly as the Kaiser believed six years ago. No wonder he believed himself to be a bigger man than Washington! At Charleston, quickly after his visit, privateers had been fitted and armed for the French service, named Citizen Genet and Sans Culotte, and, manned by American sailors, started on their way to prey on English commerce. Gov. Moultrie, promptly and sternly ordered by the President to recall them, resorted to the trick of sending after them vessels so notoriously slow that the pursuit appeared to be hopeless. The privateers, putting into North Carolina harbors, were hailed as the representatives of liberty and the officers and crews exalted as heroes, lawbreakers, and rebels against their own Government, as they were. The British man-of-war Grange was seized in Philadelphia Harbor by the French l'Ambuscade and held insolently and with the loudly proclaimed approval of the populace until it became evident that Washington had his back to the wall and was set and ready to make an issue which would involve something more than exchange of words and the hurting of somebody in more ways than through the sensibilities. Later when the Grange was beaten in a fight outside and chased away by l'Ambuscade Philadelphia went wild again, and all her poets tuned up and heralded the affair as the most momentous naval victory of all time.

"DEMONSTRATIONS IN BOSTON.

"At Boston the demonstrations were immense and long continued. The people swarmed to the water front to cheer a French vessel which put in under the red cap and with a placard nailed to her mainmast denouncing the city and State governments as composed of aristocrats, because they had prevented the fitting out of privateers. The infection spread to the farthest frontier. In Kentucky an expedition was formed to float down the Mississippi and seize New Orleans, and in the Carolinas agitators busily promoted plans to attack Florida and rout the Spanish there. All kings were declared to be enemies of humanity, and the American democracy and their possessions were to be lawful prey for any who could take them.

"All titles, terms, and phrases supposed to be even remotely suggestive of the recognition of the superiority of anybody to anybody else were denounced by the patriots, and, so far as they had the power, abolished. 'Sir,' 'madam,' and even the general and mild 'mister' were rejected as remnants of aristocracy. No sound American was to subscribe himself as 'your humble servant' or 'respectfully,' because such tokens of subserviency were not to be tolerated by a free spirit.

"Washington looked on at all this with tolerant disgust and with unwavering faith that beneath all the froth and trash the real ballast and substance of the American people lived and was ready to function when it was needed. It seems to be certain that he understood there was grave danger, but that he was more concerned lest England be exasperated to action than by the internal disorders, threatening as they presently became. Every callow, gun-shy, and silver-tongued politician in the country professed to be spoiling for a fight, while boasting that England dared not attack us and would be impotent if she did, her days being numbered. The foremost fighting man of his time was contriving anxiously to avoid entangling alliances on the one side or fighting on the other. He was as firm then as when he wrote his Farewell Address a few years later against mixing in European quarrels. As a practical soldier, he knew what his countrymen discovered, to their mortification, in 1812—that the Nation was not prepared for war with anybody. He applied to every situation his farm-bred common sense, and his army learned self-command and cool courage in emergency. In private he allowed himself now and then the luxury of letting go of his temper and engaging in monologues which included some robust profanity and frank expressions of opinion, especially when imported editors of yellow 'red' newspapers accused him of having stolen money from the Continental Congress and intending to steal the continent for a kingdom for himself. Before the public he stood unperturbed. He held steadily to the view that the treaty between this country and France had been made with a King who was dead and a Government which was extinct, and that before a new treaty was made there must be a responsible government with some promise of stability and definite policies. He declined to be enthusiastic, sympathetic, or responsive to Genet's grandiloquent adjurations, and listened coldly when besought 'to forget the buried jurisprudence of Grotius, Puffendorf, and Vattel and their worm-eaten writings' and join the new and glorious brotherhood of man.

"SOME RUSSIAN PARALLELS.

"Messages which have come here from Russia the last two years might have been copied from some of Genet's appeals to Washington, who, however, continued to insist, with diplomatic politeness but increasing sternness, on deciding for himself with whom he would hold fraternal relations and on knowing with whom he had to deal.

"With each rebuff and postponement he met Genet was comforted by louder and more menacing shrieks against the President from the 'red' elements, from which he deduced new assurance that he really was the boss of the situation. When he threatened to appeal from Washington, first to the sovereign State of Massachusetts and then to the sovereign people, many thousands of Americans applauded the threat and his course was commended by press and pulpit. The Pennsylvania State government was 'red' from governor to constable, and all the local courts were under the same influence. When Gideon Henfield, American, was caught in the act of serving on a French privateer, in defiance of the laws and the President's proclamation, a Philadelphia jury unanimously and promptly acquitted him, amid the triumphant uproar of the crowds in and around the courthouse.

"Through the nine months of 1793 and into 1794 the frenzy became louder, wilder, fiercer. At Philadelphia the authorities of Christ Church were compelled to tear out a bas relief of George II, placed when the church was built, on the ground that true Americans could not worship in an edifice desecrated by the image of a king—even a dead one. At Charleston a statue of Lord Chatham, placed there because of his friendship for the Americans, was pulled down, by order of city council, because it represented one who had been a lord and therefore might be an offense to the susceptibilities of the new brothers. In the same city use of 'his honor' and 'esq.' in legal documents was forbidden as flavored with hideous memories of titles of nobility and indications of differences among men. At Pittsburgh recent attempted demonstrations are not without local precedent. A democratic society there in 1794 formally adopted resolutions and had them published demanding immediate use of the guillotine for all holders of stocks in joint-stock companies because their possession was proof conclusive that the owners had more money than they needed to live and such offense merited the death penalty. In Wythe County, Va., Washington's own State, the assembled citizenry on the Fourth of July drank toasts to the guillotine, sang with presumably tipsy and hiccoughing hurrahs, 'Bright Flame of Liberty,' alluding to France, and that 'Here the Despot Prevails,' and sent accounts of the exploit for publication and perpetuation.

"WHISKY AS CURRENCY.

"The same year came the whisky insurrection in Pennsylvania, and involving parts of Virginia and Maryland. In all that country a quart of whisky had been circulating currency and practically legal tender for a quarter of a dollar through generations, and 6,000 armed men assembled to resist collecting of the excise tax that would increase the price. Local demagogues and agitators were in their glory. They inflamed listening and liquor-maddened crowds with confident predictions that the Government intended, if this tax was submissively paid, to seek further revenue by levying 15 shillings on every newborn baby and to hold the baby for collateral in case of nonpayment. They subsided when the President actually began to send a force of loyal Virginians under Lee, who was known to be an awkward man in a row, and to have little consideration for the graces of popular oratory or the exigencies of neighborhood politics. The insurrection faded bloodlessly, but it looked so serious that Edmund Randolph, of Virginia, confided to a French agent and propagandist the fear that it was the beginning of the explosion that would wreck the Republic finally.

"When somebody by night stole a French flag from a wall of the Tontine Coffee House in New York City a roaring riot followed in the morning. It became so widespread and dangerous that all dealings in stocks and business generally were suspended and conditions seemed to promise a reproduction of the experiences of Paris. Here, too, when it became known that Jay had been sent to negotiate a treaty with England an effigy of him was put in a pillory, borne through the streets thronged with shouting people, and burned amid joyous tumult of execration and denunciation to the limits of available vocabularies.

"Having raged nearly two years the fury of incendiarism seemed to reach its climax in 1795. The English treaty was put before the Senate, in secret session, in March. It was ratified, after more than three months of secret debate, in June, 30 to 10, exactly the necessary two-thirds, and most of the Senators promptly departed for home. Mason, of Virginia, leaked its contents to the virulently antiadministration Aurora five days later. New York, Philadelphia, and Boston howled, then, sure enough. They surged like the sea in a typhoon; Faneuil Hall was packed by a meeting of screaming protest against any treaty with England, home of tyranny and foe of our partners in the brotherhood of man and the destruction of all governments, aristocrats, and capitalists. Orators and editors saturated their orations and editorials with blood. Bache and Freneau, through their papers in Philadelphia, told the world that none but cowards and traitors would pretend to believe that England could or would resent any insult we might offer, because in the sight of all men she was beaten, rotten, torn to pieces, and impotent, the failing prop of antiquated and crumbling systems and methods.

"OPPOSITION TO 'THE TREATY.'

"The treaty had been arranged by the enemies and oppressors of the people, the aristocrats and the stock jobbers—'Wall Street' as a political issue and convenience had not been invented then—as a barrier to defeat the new internationalism, the unity of all nations with no laws or governments to trouble them. From which we learn that a good deal of the cant of the present day lacks the merit of originality and that the parlor Bolshevist is not even new.

"At New York the meeting of protest was held in the open and was said to have covered acres. Brockholst Livingstone, who had been aid on Washington's staff, led and voiced the most extreme and violent radical element. Hamilton, attempting to reply, was stoned, but stood dauntless, blood trickling down his face from a wound on his head. He had been writing and printing arguments for government and order and peace which the ablest of the contemporary 'reds' could not answer successfully and which were planting thoughts dangerous to the children of liberty. Perhaps there was a feeling that a well-directed stone might be as effective, for practical purposes, as the guillotine itself. Veterans of the Revolution marched to this meeting amid wild enthusiasm carrying the French and American flags intertwined and the British flag reversed. Shrieks that Jay and every other man concerned in the ratification of the treaty, including Washington, were loaded with British gold sounded from end to end of the country and were repeated, so far as type could be made to shriek, in the 'liberal' press. At Charleston and Savannah all flags were hung at half-mast and stentorian talkers of Virginia openly announced that the State would secede from a disgraced and degraded Union.

"Nobody was hurt and nothing was destroyed. Demagogues mouthed; mobs howled; violent and drunken reformers shrieked for gore; moody beggars, starving for a time of pell-mell havoc and confusion—just such as Shakespeare knew and pictured in his day—thronged in the wake of every fool who thought he had something to say, no matter how foolish. People with heads filled with vapor emitted fantastic theories and the parlor revolutionists adopted and promulgated them eagerly. 'Red' propaganda was scattered thick as snowflakes, sent broadcast through publications, posted on the walls. Genet in his exultation, like the conservative elements in their fright, mistook all this for the spirit of the American people.

"The Frenchman found Washington a massive mass of adamant, unshaken by flatteries, eloquence, cajoleries, or popular rage. The President dismissed French consuls and vice consuls who made themselves offensive and became obtrusively active in stirring tumult. Genet failed at every point. He did not go home. He had received clear intimations that the guillotine, invariable reward of the unsuccessful under his home administration, awaited simply his presence to begin operations on his person. In his view blood was fine fertilizer for the seeds of liberty, but he did not care to contribute any of his own. The guillotine as a patriotic institution was beautiful—at a discreet distance. As a practical instrumentality for the correction of diplomatic mischances it failed to appeal to him. He remained in this country, married the daughter of Gov. Clinton, of New York, and, like most of the Russian and other foreign reformers we have with us to-day, concluded that a government under which life and property are reasonably safe is, on the whole, preferable to conditions under which bullet and blade are likely to act rather at random.

"SOUND AT THE MIDDLE.

"Apparently the reaction took its first visibly definite shape among the business men of Boston, but it is evident that even in the cities the great quiet middle class had remained stanch, sound, uninfected, had retained its profound affection for and confidence in the President and its faith in the United States, its form of Government and Constitution. In the country districts, as tests seem to show, the disturbing elements were from the two extremes of society—those not required to earn their own livings, and therefore free to allow their brains to harbor and their acts to express political fantasies and phantoms, and those unable or too slothful or negligent to earn their livings, and therefore welcoming any upheaval, because they had nothing to lose and possibility of acquiring some of the other men's goods they coveted. Violent thoughts expended their force in words and sounds. No guillotine was built, no tumbrils rumbled; no patriot dagger found the heart of any ruler. No home of wealth was destroyed; no 'stock jobber' was executed or assassinated. The storm blew itself away. The Government was left undisturbed. The English treaty stood, and a few years later the American representatives, headed by John Marshall, reported, confidentially, that the first suggestion made to them by the transcendental Government of liberty, in Paris, was that they should offer to liberty a liberal bribe.

"President Washington was never a man to keep his ear to the ground. In fact, the Revolutionary caricatures, articles, and orations of the time represented him as keeping his head too far from the ground and holding in contempt the desires of the masses. He was a practical man who knew men, human nature, and his own country. He could not be made to mistake the clamors of mobs for the voice of the people and obey them as mandate from the Deity. He knew the great underlying power of conservatism and real patriotism which lay beneath the tumult and the shrill shouting. He knew well the difference between the thin whey of effeminized reasoning and the good cream of conclusion based on knowing things themselves. He knew that the dreams of impracticable doctrinaires, the more robust desires of the blackguards and criminals, the sickly cravings of the disappointed and the covetous vain, and the vagaries of fuddled or inflamed gentry were apart from the sober thought and the long and fixed purposes of the real, working, producing, American people—the people whose slow wrath crushes butterfly and scorpion alike and whose stolid determination is impregnable.

"The people President Washington trusted stood true against false philosophy, alluring propaganda, foreign pressure, cunning appeals to the resentments and cupidity which tempt all men. Review of those critical three years of more than a century and a quarter ago seems really to give assurance that there is no need for hearts to be troubled concerning a Nation a thousand times better organized, stronger, richer, and more firmly established."

CONTROL OF FOOD PRODUCTS.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, in the food-control and rent bill it seems that there were two typographical errors. I simply seek to correct them, and also to have one other correction made. The phrase "Treasury of the District of Columbia" was used, and we should have used the phrase "Treasury of the United States to the credit of the District of Columbia."

I send to the desk a concurrent resolution, and I ask for its present consideration.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 12) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That in the enrollment of the bill (H. R. 8624) entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel,' approved August 10, 1917," the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to strike out the word "an," in line 31 of section 106 of the bill as agreed upon in conference and to insert in lieu thereof the word "on"; a so

In section 112, where they twice appear, and in section 114, where they once appear, strike out the words "Treasury of the District of Columbia" and insert in lieu thereof the words "Treasury of the United States to the credit of the District of Columbia"; and

In section 118, line 5, of the bill as agreed upon in conference, strike out "for" where it first occurs and insert in lieu thereof the word "or."

DISPOSITION OF GOVERNMENT-OWNED VESSELS.

Mr. EDGE. I present a resolution and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 212), as follows:

Whereas from time to time public announcement has been made of the placing of orders by private American companies for the construction of cargo ships by private yards; and

Whereas, as a specific instance, during the past week a statement appeared in the public press to the effect that the Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies Steamship Co. had ordered by private yards the construction of eight tank ships; and

Whereas the United States Shipping Board, or Emergency Fleet Corporation, has full authority to dispose of ships now under their jurisdiction and control and included in this fleet are many tank ships apparently of the general type being obtained by private concerns from other sources; and

Whereas in the one instance cited approximately $18,000,000 could have been obtained by the Shipping Board through the sale of such ships to private concerns; and

Whereas one of the practical, effective methods for reducing the exorbitant taxation now prevailing is by covering back into the Treasury the hundreds of millions of dollars now tied up in the operations of the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation; and

Whereas it now is high time that the Government be released from competition with private business, and that business be restored to private hands: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the United States Shipping Board be instructed herewith to advise the Senate as to whether any effort was made to dispose of Government-owned ships to fill the order herein cited; and if so, what prices were offered and asked for the same; and, further, to advise the Senate as to the number of ships that have been disposed of to private interests, with a description of the same and the prices received, and whether any offers have recently been received or are at present pending and the quotations involved, as well as to inform the Senate on the policy being followed in endeavoring to dispose of this type of Government property.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I just want to supplement that resolution with a brief word and will ask unanimous consent that it be considered at this time.

As we well know, ships will obtain a very much higher price if they can be delivered at the time—what is termed "spot delivery"—and by these frequent articles appearing in the public press it is clearly established that ships are being ordered from private yards by various shipping concerns. It does seem to me that if the policy of the Government is finally to be that we should dispose of our merchant fleet, it is very important that we should take advantage of the opportunity to secure very much higher prices at this time by making spot delivery.

However, the resolution in no way establishes a policy. That, of course, is a matter for Congress finally to determine. It simply is a resolution of inquiry to ascertain from the Shipping Board or the Emergency Fleet Corporation just what their present policy is, in view of the authority they have to dispose of these ships. We have heard from time to time that they have disposed of a few small ships. It seems to me the country would like to know, and I am sure the Senate would like to know, just how far that has gone.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. EDGE. I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. Has the resolution which was just read been considered by any standing committee of the Senate?

Mr. EDGE. I might say, Mr. President, that as a member of the Committee of Commerce I have discussed the matter with the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], and he acquiesces with me, as I understand, that this would be the best means to bring the matter to a quick head.

Mr. GRONNA. As I understand, it has not been considered by the committee.

Mr. EDGE. Oh, yes; the committee have given a great deal of consideration to the question, but they have not adopted a policy. This does not establish a policy. It simply asks for information.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask that it go over.

Mr. EDGE. Then I will ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I understand present consideration of the resolution offered by the Senator from New Jersey was objected to and he has asked to have it go to the Committee on Commerce. Is that correct? Has it been referred to the committee? I think it should go to the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It may be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, may I have the attention of the Senator from North Dakota a moment? This is simply a resolution to ascertain what policy the Government is going to adopt with all these merchant vessels we have constructed. The Committee on Commerce has practically considered it, and I think the resolution ought to be adopted.

Mr. GRONNA. Does the Senator refer to the resolution of the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. NELSON. Yes; the resolution offered by the Senator from New Jersey. The committee has practically considered it. I think it will approve of it, and we are very anxious to know where we are in this matter.

Mr. GRONNA. Of course, if it is only a matter of inquiry——

Mr. FLETCHER. I shall object, Mr. President, to the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. GRONNA. And if the committee has considered it——

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not think the committee has considered it.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, have I the floor?

Mr. FLETCHER. I am simply saying that I shall object.

Mr. GRONNA. But I had not finished the sentence. I simply wanted to say that so far as I am personally concerned, if it is only a resolution of inquiry, and if the committee is anxious to have it passed, I shall not object.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understood the Senator to say that, or to be about to say it, and I wanted to say that I do object, so there is no use of losing time over it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida objects to the present consideration of the resolution, and under the rule it goes over until to-morrow.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understood the Chair held that it was to go to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not so hold.

Mr. EDGE. If the Senator will yield, I was going to suggest that instead of having it referred to the Committee on Commerce, as it can not be of any particular use to have it considered by that committee, it lie over under the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that under the rule of the Senate, upon an objection by any Senator to the present consideration of a resolution, it goes over until the following day, and that is the disposition of this resolution.

SEDITIOUS ACTS AND UTTERANCES.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I offer a Senate resolution and ask that it be read, and I also ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 213), as follows:

Resolved, That the Attorney General of the United States is requested to advise and inform the Senate the reason for the failure of the Department of Justice to take legal proceedings for the arrest and punishment of the various persons within the United States who, during recent days and weeks, and for a considerable time continuously previous thereto it is alleged have attempted to bring about the forcible overthrow of the Government of the United States, who it is alleged have preached anarchy and sedition, who it is alleged have advised the defiance of law and authority, both by the printing and circulation of printed newspapers, books, pamphlets, circulars, stickers, and dodgers, and also by spoken word; and who in like manner, it is alleged, have advised and openly advocated the unlawful obstruction of industry and the unlawful and violent destruction of property, in pursuance of a deliberate plan and purpose to destroy existing property rights and to impede and obstruct the conduct of business essential to the prosperity and life of the community.

Also the Attorney General is requested to advise and inform the Senate why the Department of Justice has failed to take legal proceedings for the arrest and deportation of aliens who, it is alleged, have, within the United States, committed the acts aforesaid.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I have no objection to the resolution, but I do not think the Senator ought to offer it in a form by which the Senate finds as facts some of the things recited in it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, there is no doubt, in my opinion, that these are the facts. There is overwhelming evidence to that effect. Everybody is familiar with the existence of the facts. There might be some difference of opinion as to the extent to which these facts exist; but there can not be any difference of opinion that there are being committed by numbers of people the things that are recited in the resolution.

I read into the RECORD here a few days ago from a pamphlet which is in common circulation in the country, with the names of the authors attached, the very things that are recited in the resolution. One of the authors of that pamphlet was afterwards examined as a witness before a committee of the Senate, and admitted in substance the advocacy of the views there expressed. One of those views is the opposition to any government at all. Of course, that includes the Government of the United States. Furthermore, this is not a finding of fact. It is merely in the form of a question to the Attorney General, and asks him to give the reason why these things have not been stopped. If, as one reason, he claims that the evidence does not exist, that is a good reason.

Mr. LENROOT. But, if the Senator will yield, if the resolution passes in this form, the Senate has found as facts these things. It is only a question of the form. I should object now, but I should not object if it were put in the form merely of asking for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Wisconsin to object.

Mr. LENROOT. If the Senator from Washington will modify the resolution and bring it up a little later, I shall have no objection.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, personally I do not object to the consideration of the resolution, although I am disposed to question the need for it. Its recitals of fact disclose nothing that is new or recent, except that the propaganda—if I may use a much-abused word now so generally prevalent—is merely a continuation of the same conduct that has been tolerated in the United States for a great many years.

The organization known as the I. W. W. is founded upon defiance of the Government of the United States—in fact, of all governments—upon the assertion that all property belongs to one class of society, and that it is the mission of this class to possess itself of that which belongs to it, to take charge of the Government, and to do away with, by extinction if necessary, all other classes. The sort of literature at which this resolution is aimed, to my certain knowledge, made its appearance in certain parts of the United States in 1906, since which time it has been printed and circulated contemporaneously with verbal campaigning, and all directed to the same end.

The only difference between this condition prior to the war and the condition at the present time lies in the fact that it is now more general in character and accompanied by a greater number of and more widely extended suspensions of labor and interferences with individual initiative in the United States.

The resolution logically, therefore, should embrace an inquiry why this evil was not proceeded against in its inception and the law vigorously enforced at that time. It is true we had no espionage act prior to our entry into the war, but it is equally true, if the acts are legally punishable, it should be so without such an act, since it constitutes an appeal to lawlessness, crime, disorder, incendiarism, and to all the other offenses against which society must, upon the principle of self-preservation, protect itself.

If the Attorney General is expected to utilize the machinery of his department in the apprehension, indictment, and punishment of this class of people, it will be necessary for Congress to clothe him with power to do so by appropriations of proper amounts and by the authority to employ for that purpose a great many more officials than are now allowed by law, because I conceive that it would be impossible for him to get anywhere without such supplementary authority.

I have felt, and I am more than ever convinced as time goes by, that the remedy for these evils, and they are very sinister ones, lies entirely in the hands of the American people, and unless and until they exercise their undoubted power no interferences of a semilegal nature will do more than temporarily suspend the operation of these conditions in one or two localities of the country.

There are 110,000,000 people in the United States, and there are, perhaps, less than 250,000 of these agitators and lawbreakers. One, however, is organized and the other not only disorganized but apparently indifferent. Whether that indifference results from a lack of appreciation of the magnitude of the crisis which confronts us or whether it is due to that cheerful optimism which characterizes Americans everywhere and under all circumstances, and which assumes, in obedience to the old, worn-out doctrine of lassez faire, that all these evils will right themselves in time if left alone, I do not know. But the fact is that, except in the city of Boston, there has been no public organized resistance to these things. The success of that organized public resistance in Boston I had hoped would prove contagious and result in similar manifestations all over the country where similar exigencies materialized. There are plenty of good people in Pittsburgh, Cleveland, Canton, Youngstown, Chicago, and Gary, and if they will assert themselves, unite and serve notice upon these anarchists and lawbreakers that the institutions of this country shall be preserved, that men shall be protected in the right to work if they wish, that the laws shall be enforced and order maintained, there will, in my judgment, be a very abrupt cessation of these conditions, and until that is done we can not hope for any substantial amelioration of them.

There is a great strike upon the water fronts of the city of New York, involving some 70,000 longshoremen, supplemented by a teamsters' strike of 10,000 more, both of them in direct and willful violation of their agreements, the collective bargains, if you please, which their leaders and officers entered into some time ago with their full approval. As a result shipping is paralyzed, thousands of tons of perishable food are rendered useless upon the wharves at Hoboken, Jersey City, and other points opposite the great metropolis of the country, while the distribution of that which remains is arrested through the teamsters' strike.

These are both, Mr. President, crimes against society and against civilization. They can only result in infinite damage and injury, enhance to a still greater degree the cost of living, and ultimately must react upon those upon whose shoulders must rest the blame. Yet the millions of American citizens in New York, Jersey City, and Hoboken sit supinely and wonder why Congress does not do something, a state of mind for which we are largely to blame, since, inasmuch as we have assumed jurisdiction of nearly every complaint that comes to us, it is the most natural thing in the world that the public of this generation, at least, should be educated to the theory that if anything goes wrong demand that Congress rectify it, and damn us if we fail.

I am satisfied that if the good citizens of the city of New York will assert themselves, as they must sooner or later if they would thwart this menace now immediately upon them, the remedy will be effective. The greatest strike known to history occurred in Great Britain two or three weeks ago, and it was broken by the organized, the aroused, and the determined effort of the good people of the Kingdom. That was the only force which could be made effectual. The law officers of the Government might have issued writs, summoned grand juries, taken testimony, returned indictments, held trials ad infinitum, and to no purpose; but the aroused conscience of a nation, coupled with organized and determined action, served effective notice upon lawbreakers; because I insist that every interference with an agency that is public in its character, and upon which the people must depend, is neither more nor less than lawbreaking, and that sort of thing will continue in this country until it is met and ended in that manner.

This morning's Post publishes the contents of a circular which was yesterday distributed throughout the town of Gary, of which those there in charge have taken due notice, and which, if any further evidence were needed amply supplies it, supports the fact that this is a strike for power, a strike, as Mr. Fitzpatrick says, to socialize industry, and not a strike to secure the observance of better conditions or the enforcement of a demand for higher wages. In other words, it is a conspiracy against the Government of the States and of the United States, a symptom identical with that which some time ago appeared at Butte, Winnipeg, and Spokane, a test, so to speak, of the strength of the Government and of the power of organized society to protect itself.

The dispatch in the Post from Gary, Ind., reads:

> The radical pamphlets were distributed as "a proclamation of the communist party of America." The heading of the proclamation was "The capitalists challenge you, workmen."
> The pamphlets declare that the municipal government of Gary, submitting to the control of the Steel Trust, had forbidden the workingmen to hold public meetings and parades, and that for two weeks these workingmen "had permitted the Steel Trust government to trample under foot the democratic rights which they had been so often assured were the heritage of the people of this country."

Now, Mr. President, this is not a Steel Trust government. I had occasion, when the Steel Trust was organized, to express my dissent from the exercise of a power that I thought then and still think was beyond the law; and I also took occasion, although neither a prophet nor the son of a prophet, to predict some of the consequences of disregard by organized capital of the rights of the individual, of the principles upon which this Government was founded, and of the difficulty of securing a perpetuation of our laws and of our institutions in the atmosphere of organized monopoly.

In this instance it so happens that the mobilization of forces for the preservation of law and order benefits this particular organization; but to call the action of the Government when it mobilizes its armed force for its own protection a Government of a particular class is merely to appeal to the prejudices of men through an assumption that is wholly without foundation.

The pamphlet then describes a parade headed by 500 men in United States uniform, which was followed by the entry of Federal troops into the city. I understand that one of these demonstrations was led by a number of men in the uniform of the United States Army. A demonstration against the law by men whose purpose it is to disrupt this Government, having at its head a large number of men clad in the uniform of the United States Army, is something that should be inquired into. There is an event of which the Secretary of War should, of his own volition, take notice, whether these men were discharged or not; and I have no doubt they were. I do not for a moment assume that a man wearing the uniform of the Army of the United States, and actually in that Army, would so far forget his duties or his obligations as a soldier as to take part in any such demonstration.

No man, soldier or private citizen, should be permitted to appear in any demonstration that is hostile to the Government of the United States when clad in the uniform of the Army, and if there is no law to prevent it, then we should enact one and see to its enforcement; for if that insignia means anything, it symbolizes the force which stands behind the law and all government, for, in the last analysis, that is the embodiment of the Government itself. Without it there can be no such thing as security of life or of property.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. NEW. I simply wish to say that for several days I have been trying to get from the War Department an expression of opinion as to how this evil of which the Senator so righteously complains may be remedied. I refer to the presence in mobs of men clad in the uniform of the United States Army. I have both written to and talked with the Secretary of War about it, in the hope of getting some kind of recommendation, either directly from him or from the Judge Advocate General, but as yet without results.

Mr. THOMAS. I am very glad that the Senator has taken this action. He should be commended for it, not only by his fellow Senators but by the country. I certainly hope he will ascertain all about it, because the incident is a most sinister one, which I confess has disturbed me considerably.

Mr. NEW. I wish to add only that I most heartily concur in all the Senator from Colorado has said on the subject. In Gary, Ind., where the United States troops are now in charge, the mobs in that city have in some instances been led by men in the uniform of the soldiers of the United States. It has been difficult for the uninitiated to distinguish between troops in legitimate service and the members of the mob, who are similarly clad and are apparently moving with some regard at least to organization. It would certainly appear to be an evil against which some legislation should be immediately directed.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, there is another view of this incident of the parade or the gathering, and that is the respect which all men have for the uniform, and any officer, civil or military, engaged in the enforcement of law and order would hesitate to attack a man, however riotous he might be, when clothed in the insignia of the military arm of this Government. I confess that as a citizen, if I should see a body of five or six hundred men clad in the Army uniform, even at the head of a mob, my first instinct would be to take off my hat to them, to look upon them as the embodiment of the military power of the Government, and I can well understand how the average peace officer would hesitate to charge upon or to assault a man thus clad, however boisterous or improper his conduct might be. That is another feature of such a use of the uniform which demands our action if need be essential to prevent it.

But I continue with the proclamation:

"The National Government has stepped in," says the pamphlet. "The Steel Trust was in danger of being beaten. To save itself it brought into the field the instrument forged by the capitalists to uphold their system of exploitation and oppression, the State, which in spite of all its democratic pretensions, is but the physical expression of the dictatorship of the capitalistic classes."

The pamphlet tells of raids conducted by the military authorities in the search for radical literature, and concludes:

"Gather in great mass meetings. Bring to the attention of the unenlightened workers the meaning of the martial law at Gary. Show them that it is not enough to strike against low wages and bad working conditions, but that the strike must be directed against capitalism.

"The workers must capture the power of the State. They must wrest from the capitalists the means by which capitalist rule is maintained.

"The answer to the dictatorship of the capitalists is the dictatorship of the workers."

Now, Mr. President, if that be the purpose of these agitators in these so-called labor insurrections it can be easily accomplished by the machinery which this Government itself provides for its own purpose.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I will yield in just a moment. Any majority in this country can impose its will upon the minority, through the exercise of the elective franchise, by the selection of its own officials and by effecting a consequent change in governmental administration. There is absolutely no excuse anywhere in the United States for a resort to force and lawlessness to overcome an existing actual or imaginary evil or abuse. It is to the glory of the American Constitution, as of the State constitutions and the laws, that they have made ample provision for an expression of the will of the majority, whatever that majority may be, and to enable it, through such lawful expression, to accomplish its purpose by peaceful means. The man who resorts to force or makes an appeal against law and order in this country for any purpose by that act condemns himself and condemns his cause.

I now yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I thought, with the permission of the Senator from Colorado, it might not be out of place for me to state that the latter part of last week I was advised by a prominent gentleman, who is known to many Senators here, that he had been in one of the great steel plants in Ohio the first of last week and talked with a Slovak who had been there for years and whom he had known for many years. This Slovak told him that they had good working conditions, but what they wanted was 12 hours' pay for an 8-hour day, and that they were going to get it; that if the employers would not give it to them Congress would see to it that the plants were turned over to them, and then they would be operated without the bosses and without the employers.

This morning I received a letter from a prominent gentleman, whom I have known for many years, a level-headed man, who knows what he is talking about, and in it he states that in one of the large plants in his city the organizers were circulating the report that all the officials would soon be displaced and that the operation of the plants in that city would be in the hands of these foreigners and others who are engaged in this movement.

From what I have heard from various cities in the State of Ohio, as well as in western Pennsylvania, I am satisfied that these organizers are now holding out these inducements to a lot of these ignorant foreigners for the purpose of getting them into the organization.

Mr. THOMAS. There is no doubt about it in the world. Those who organized, advised, and promoted the strike have at least the merit of candor. They have said so openly.

There is a large steel plant in my State employing 6,500 men. Its employees had no grievance whatever. They asked for a conference with the managers and got it. They complained of nothing. Their purpose is to nationalize, as they call it, the industry and run it themseves; hence they went out.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I will yield in just a moment.

They are out on strike to-day, and there have been, since this strike was called, no grievances whatever. They were getting the best of wages. They confessedly had no complaints to offer, but they were organized for that purpose, and they say, or their leaders say for them, that they will return to work when and only when that condition comes about. Mr. President, even that can be secured in this country at the polls if it is the wish of the majority that our industries shall be so owned and so operated. Even there a resort to force or to the negative power of the strike, unaccompanied by what is called direct action, is totally and absolutely unnecessary to accomplish what the majority of the people desire.

And if the majority do not so desire the minority can not be permitted to assert their authority by violent and unlawful means.

I now yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I simply wish to remark that I believe the facts which have been stated by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] show the result of the disposition of Congress to investigate every strike in every labor disturbance. It is almost invariably taken by the strikers as an evidence of sympathy by Congress with their cause, and is used by the agitators to represent to the more ignorant strikers that Congress is taking their side and is going to do something in their behalf.

Mr. THOMAS. There is no doubt about it. We are becoming much more of an investigating than a legislative body. Anything and everything which seems wrong comes to Congress for investigation. A telegram was read by the senior Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] a few mornings ago from some organizations in the city of Oakland, Calif., asking Congress to investigate a decision made by one of the judges of the United States court out there, which was said to have assumed that a state of war still exists. I see no more objection to such an investigation than can be urged against the one to which the Senator indirectly referred. Our investigations never amount to anything except to increase the expense of legislation.

Mr. MYERS. And to encourage the strikers and violators of law, as a rule.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; the Senator's suggestion is most appropriate. It does have that effect, very naturally and very properly, and the longer we continue these things the more liable we are to encourage that view and give support to such assurances as are made to these ignorant foreigners, who, by the way, were largely brought here by the men who are now complaining against their misconduct.

Mr. OVERMAN. Not only that, but it has cost the taxpayers considerable money.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand now there is a deficiency in the financial office of the Senate of $135,000 on account of funds required to make these investigations.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, well, that is merely a flea bite. What is $150,000 nowadays? The great expense involved in these commissions is reflected in the taxes imposed upon the people. What, for example, will it cost the taxpayers of the State of Pennsylvania when the bill consequent upon the strike now pending comes to be paid? What will be the expense to the people of Illinois, to the people of Ohio, and to the people of Colorado?

Why, Mr. President, the expenses consequent upon the enforcement of law and order by the cities and the States of this Union are so enormous that I do not think I exaggerate at all when I say that in the last 20 years they have more than trebled; and so long as these things continue and society finds it necessary to protect itself, just so long will these expenses continue until the burden becomes absolutely unendurable. That is one of the purposes sought to be accomplished by these so-called leaders, and they do not hesitate to say so.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. In view of the statement of Mr. O'Connor as the newspapers give it, is he able to trace directly to I. W. W. headquarters the organization and origin of the longshoremen's strike in New York?

Mr. THOMAS. There is no doubt about it.

Mr. FLETCHER. If that is true, does it raise a question as to whether Congress should do anything or Federal authority should exercise any jurisdiction?

Mr. THOMAS. It raises a serious question, Mr. President, because, fundamentally, I believe that all these matters are under State jurisdiction. The States have laws to meet these conditions, which they should enforce. If they have not, then they should enact them as soon as possible and should see that they are rigidly enforced. The difficulty, however, is that the States are quite as prone to shift the burden of their responsibility upon the Congress of the United States as are individuals, not only because of the difficulties involved but also on the score of expense, which they are eager to avoid.

Mr. President, this pamphlet seems ostensibly to have been prompted by an interference with the political rights of those who demand the right to meet en masse and take charge of the Government. Their "right of assembly" has been interfered with. Well, the right of assembly is a sacred American right; but the assembly of a mob, the assemblage of individuals for riotous and criminal purposes, not only never was, but never should be, protected anywhere under any circumstances. Rioting was an offense at common law, and, of course, it is an offense under the statutes of every State in the Union.

I am amazed—perhaps I should not be, but I am amazed—at the glibness with which in these later days so many talk about their rights and are so unmindful of their responsibilities. So completely obsessed are they with the assertion of rights that they either forget or ignore all of their obligations. There never was a right, great or small, that could be separated from its attendant obligation and survive. I have a right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; so have you, Mr. President; but that right is necessarily circumscribed by obligations, the supreme one of which is that we must recognize its possession and enjoyment by every other citizen of the United States. The obligations to observe the laws, to respect them, to obey legitimate authority, to bear our part of the burdens of society, are necessary concomitants of every right than can be asserted or enjoyed. The man who declines to bear the burden of the one does not deserve to enjoy the other.

When I hear men talk about their God-given rights, their rights under the Constitution, I am always inclined to suspect that they seek to assert something under the guise of legitimate rights which necessarily interferes with, if it does not destroy, some similar right of others. Until we ignore the fact that our rights are no more important than our obligations, and that unless we recognize and perform our obligations we shall soon be without any rights at all, conditions are apt to continue as they are at present, if, indeed, they do not rapidly become worse.

Every well-ordered community necessarily recognizes that observance of law and order lies at the foundation of the prosperity of peoples and the safety of governments. You can no more divorce law from order than you can divorce the laws of nature from the materials which compose it. Whenever any man assumes, either in conjunction with himself or with some of his fellows, to assert a right and to enforce it on his own account and that of others, he is an enemy, even though he may not know it, of that well-ordered condition of human society without which our lives are insecure, our families unprotected, and our property subject to devastation.

The right which is interfered with by the people who issued this proclamation is the right of the mob; the right of individuals to assemble, to indulge in incendiary discussion, to denounce the Government, recommend its overthrow, and, above all, to prevent American citizens, under the laws and Constitution of the country, from earning in their own way a livelihood for themselves and their families.

On Sunday last, Mr. President, among the pictures in the illustrated supplement of one of the New York papers was that of a man running for his life through a wheat field at Hammond, Ind., while immediately behind him were half a dozen men armed with brickbats and sticks and stones, throwing them at his retreating form and endeavoring to overtake him. Was this refugee a criminal? Was he a man who had offended against the laws of God or man? Was he fleeing from justice? No, Mr. President. He had had the temerity in this country—and he was an American citizen—to exercise his right to work without hindrance from anybody; he had sought employment in order that he might maintain himself and his family. He was born in a country whose Declaration of Independence enunciates the principle that every man has a right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, where privilege is not supposed to exist, and the fact of citizenship is the only needed guaranty for the enjoyment of these rights; yet here he was fleeing for his life—whether or not he escaped I do not know—with a mad mob, armed with deadly weapons, seeking his destruction because, forsooth, his desire to work did not conform with their wishes or interests. Yet we call this a free country.

My country, 'tis of thee,
Sweet land of liberty,
Of thee I sing.

Lip service to a liberty which is rapidly disappearing is of little avail; for when the Government, Mr. President, fails to give to its meanest citizen the equal protection of the law it writes it own sentence of dissolution. We can not ignore the rights of the humblest individual, black or white, without imperiling our own rights under the law.

For my part, Mr. President, I am glad that the governor of Indiana placed this great industrial community under martial law; I am glad that the American Army is there representing the majesty of the Government; I am glad, too, that the real purpose of the strike has been disclosed in this proclamation defying the Government of the United States and calling upon certain people to take possession of it. The crisis is coming, and let it come in this generation.

Capital as well as labor, Mr. President, is largely to blame for these conditions, for the one is an imitator of the other. Both should be held within proper limitations and each given every right which it deserves and no more. It is either that, or, as the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] suggests to me, a dictatorship, because chaos, riot, and disorder, the rule of the mob, the worst and most damnable of tyrannies and oppressions, will become the inevitable alternative. History so teaches by many examples which bring to the average citizen a realizing sense of the conditions which now confront him. It is for the great middle classes of the country to save it, and when the awakening comes, as it must come, when the citizenship of this country is organized and stands shoulder to shoulder for the vindication of law and the preservation of our institutions, then woe to the disturbing elements which to-day would devote the institutions of this mighty Nation to destruction.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, at the request of the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], I will amend the resolution as I submitted it by inserting the words "it is alleged" before the statement of fact, and resubmit it in that form. The senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] informed me—and he was on the floor a moment ago—that he was going to object to the resolution if it contained the words "it is alleged". So, while complying with the request of one Senator from that State, I meet with the objection of the other. He also stated, however, that he might simply desire to express his views upon it, if the resolution would go over until to-morrow under the rule. In the meantime, I ask unanimous consent to say a word in explanation of it.

There could not be established a very much stronger foundation for this resolution than that which has been so clearly set out by the remarks of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. He called to the attention of the Senate the purposes, motives, and objects of the strikers at Gary, Ind. It clearly appears from the evidence cited by the Senator from Colorado that the purposes of the steel workers in their strike at Gary, Ind., are not merely to obtain higher wages, or shorter hours of labor, or improved conditions of work. It clearly appears from the evidence he cited that their purpose goes far beyond that; that it reaches to the scheme of subverting the authority of the law, and that means subverting the authority of the Government, because there can be no law in our conception of it for practical purposes except that which is established and administered by the Government. In other words, it is a revolutionary movement.

We deceive ourselves in a way, and probably mislead a great many people in the country, if we raise a question here among ourselves such as is raised by the suggestion that is just made to change the statement made in this resolution by attaching the condition that "it is alleged," creating doubt as to whether or not such a movement as that which has been described is in existence in this country. There can be an army of witnesses and a cabinet full of documentary proof introduced to prove the existence of such a revolutionary movement; that it is not confined to Gary, Ind., nor to the State of Indiana, but that it extends throughout the Nation; that it is supported by ample funds, put forward by systematic organization, and that a large part at least of the many strikes that have occurred during recent months and that are now in progress are based upon that revolutionary proposition, and have for their object the defiance of the law, the overthrow of the Government, the establishment of forcible communism, and the taking over of the industries of the country by the workers, as they express it, because of the impossibility of the successful conduct of industry under the demands of the strikers. In other words, they will create an impossible condition for the present owners of these properties, and then, after the laws have been rendered impotent and property rendered valueless to the present owners, they will seize the property and whatever else there is that their hearts desire, and enjoy them as the goal and end of this movement.

I say that there is no doubt about the existence of that condition. There is a difference of opinion as to whether or not it has such power and is backed by such numbers as to be a serious and material menace to the welfare of the country of which the Government ought to take notice. I know that it is the disposition of many to ignore it, to treat it as a mere exhibition of mental aberration on the part of those who are engaged in it, to treat those who are engaged as insignificant in the community, and to take no steps by the Government toward its suppression. My purpose in introducing this resolution was to call the attention of the Senate, and of the country if I possibly could, to the fact that we have now reached a point in the development of this movement at which it behooves the Government, if it is going to be maintained in its full vigor, not only to take action but to take vigorous action to suppress anarchy and revolution and to defend itself.

I apprehend, Mr. President, that if the Government refuses to act in the face of an international revolutionary propaganda that has manifested itself already by the tying up of essential industries of the country and by interference with trade and commerce to the extent that hunger is already visiting thousands of our population—if the Government continues in that supine and indifferent attitude toward this thing, there is a real danger that the Government will fall. When a government ceases to perform its function, when it ceases to defend itself against an attack that has the strength and the extent of this attack, which has been demonstrated by competent evidence, I say there is great danger that the Government will be overthrown, and we will have a repetition in the United States of America—which we have seemed to think God would take care of, judging by our failure to take steps to protect ourselves—of the conditions that have brought misery to so many countries in other parts of the world.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield a moment?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator think that an admonition should be given—although we ought not to be called upon to give admonitions to the States—to the various executive departments of the States that they enforce the laws that have been enacted by the various legislatures looking to the suppression of crime and violence and assaults upon the Government? My investigations have led me to the conclusion that many of the States have been very supine, and that there is an inclination to devolve upon the Federal Government the assumption of that authority which, under our form of government, rests upon the States themselves.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, this is not any time for sensitiveness on the part of public officials, whether of the Federal Government or of the States, to criticism or to any action calling attention to their duty under the law. I understand that there is a disposition on the part of some friends of the administration and the Attorney General rather to resent a resolution which calls upon him to inform the Senate why he has not proceeded to enforce the laws; and if that were the only aspect of the question I never would have thought of introducing the resolution. The matter is too important for such a consideration as that to have any weight whatever.

Undoubtedly a great part of the jurisdiction of suppressing revolution and anarchy and forcible destruction of property and lawless violence of all kinds devolves upon the States; but I want to call attention for just a moment's time to the fact that it also devolves upon the United States, and that this movement has gone to such an extent that it not only invades the integrity of the State governments and the ownership of private property in the several communities where these disorders exist but that it menaces the functions of the Federal Government itself.

I want to call attention to the number of strikes that the country has been suffering from in recent months.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator by a question?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. The form of the resolution, it seems to me, might be misconstrued to some extent. The Senator, in framing the resolution, conveys the idea that there has been a neglect of duty or a failure to perform duty on the part of the Attorney General. I should like to ask if he would not be satisfied with this sort of language—that we inquire whether or not the Attorney General has taken steps in these matters, and if not, why not, and then proceed with the resolution.

In other words, it is possible that the assumption that there has been a total failure to act is not justified. There may be steps taken which we are not informed of. I suggest to the Senator that that wording will accomplish his purpose and at the same time perhaps really more fairly meet the situation—that we inquire whether or not, and if not, why not, the Attorney General has proceeded to do these things to which the Senator refers. That, of course, would avoid subjecting the Attorney General or the Department of Justice to criticism if in fact he has been actively performing his duty under the law.

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the Senator from Florida insists upon that form of the resolution I shall not object to it. I shall be very glad, when the resolution comes up, if the Senator will call attention to the matter. It will go over until to-morrow and we can consider amending it in that form. I personally prefer the form in which I originally introduced it, but it is not my purpose in introducing the resolution to reflect on the Attorney General. My purpose is to direct the attention of the Senate, and particularly of the Attorney General, and also of the country, to the condition which exists.

The trouble with the people who were following that man through a wheat field, armed with bricks, because he wanted to work, as the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] described, was that they overlooked the fact that if they are going to establish a system by which a man can be prevented with brickbats from working, the same method can be applied to them as to the man that they were pursuing. If they have a right to pursue a man to prevent him from working some other man has a right to pursue them to prevent them from working, or to compel them to work. I regard it as just as much an invasion of personal liberty, in principle, to prevent a man by force from working as by force to compel a man to work. Either one is a state of subjection to lawless force, which constitutes a form of slavery.

In the month of January, 1919, Mr. President, there were 105 strikes in existence in this country. In the month of February there were 110. In the month of March there were 102. In the month of April there were 134. In the month of May there were 219. In the month of June there were 245. In the month of July there were 364. In the month of August there were 308. The number for July and August was twice as great as for the corresponding months of 1918.

Attention is called to the fact that the publication of all of the magazines published in New York City, one of the principal mediums of information and intelligence, has been suspended because of a strike. We are informed that on the 1st of November the bituminous coal miners will go on strike, not because they are not getting large wages at present but because they want a 60 per cent increase above the large wages they are already getting; they want a five-day week and a six-hour day. There is no doubt in my mind that if those conditions were granted they would be no more contented with the 60 per cent increase in wages, with the five-day week and with the six-hour day, than they are now, because they are impregnated with the doctrine that the wage system must be abolished. They want to take over the industries of the country.

A distinguished Member of Congress from the State of Ohio, who deserves a great deal of credit for the courageous stand which he has taken upon this question, a member of a labor union himself, told me the other day that recently when he was visiting home one of the aliens working in the steel industry in Youngstown, Ohio, who had gone out on strike, told him they were on strike because Congress was going to take over these industries and give them to the workers. The Member of Congress asked him what his complaint was. He said he had no complaint; that his pockets were full of money; that he had plenty of money, but that they wanted the industries themselves, and that Congress was going to give them to them. That is the idea that is back of the longshoremen's strike in New York. Confessedly or secretly they hold up food supplies which are stored upon these ships, which they refuse to unload—except that they did unload Col. House's baggage, having made an exception of him—because they want to put the community into discomfort. I read the conditions of the demands of the longshoremen in San Francisco. Demand after demand has been granted them. One of them was that if they were ordered to the docks at a certain hour in the morning to unload a ship and the ship was not ready to be unloaded at that time, if they waited as much as two hours they were to be paid at regular wages one-half day's pay. That was one of the things that was granted, a preposterous concession, in my opinion, to a preposterous demand. They were to be paid more for two hours of idleness than they would have been paid for two hours of work. But they were not satisfied with that.

The demands which they made and the demands which the longshoremen in New York are making, if put into effect, would give the longshoremen and the Longshoremen's Union absolute control of the employment of men, their discharge, the fixing of their wages, and the fixing of their hours in that industry. Men who own the property, own the ships, and engage in this commerce would have nothing at all to say about it. If the demands that are now being made are granted to the full extent, the complete result which is aimed at by this resolution, namely, the taking over of the control and the practical ownership of the property of the country, would be accomplished. That is the situation which confronts the country.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Washington a question, and as bearing upon the question of whether or not there is a violation of law upon the part of those engaging in the revolutions that are being carried on in this country I will read to him an extract from the existing statute:

> Whoever when the United States is at war * * * shall willfully utter, print, write, or publish * * * any language intended to bring the form of government of the United States * * * into contempt—shall be punished. I invite the Senator's attention to the published reports that one Robert Minor, who, it was reported, was arrested in Europe for preaching sedition against the armed forces of the United States, and who was very quickly released by some mysterious power up to this time undiscoverable, and who, it is reported, is now transferring his activities to this country, is advocating a soviet government in this country, such as exists in Russia—a government founded on murder, assassination, robbery, rapine, rape, force, violence, and the overthrow of established Government. I ask the Senator if he thinks that advocating such a government as being better than and preferable to our Government in this country is language which tends to bring this country into disrepute and contempt?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think the Senator's suggestion is very well founded. But, furthermore, there is a more direct violation of the laws that were not enacted only for war purposes. Minor, in the declarations which he makes and in his association with other people for the purpose of putting into effect the principles which he is stating in his speeches, is engaged in a conspiracy to establish the principles which he advocates, and that is the overthrow by violence of the existing Government, which conspiracy is contrary to the existing law, punishable by a fine of $10,000 and six years' imprisonment in the penitentiary, whether we are in a state of war or not in a state of war. The country is seething with such violations of the permanent law, and, so far as I can see, very little is being done to suppress the crime.

Mr. President, I want to say, before calling attention to one or two other items of the present state of the country, that the men who would suffer the most from the establishment of any such system would be the laboring men themselves. There are a few of their leaders who, for purposes of autocratic power, are conducting this movement, who perhaps would be benefited in a material way by the overthrow of law and order. But the establishment of government, the authority of the law, and its orderly processes are the only protection which the ordinary individual, and particularly the ordinary laborer of the country, has. He is unable to protect himself against lawless violence. A strong man is. That was the theory upon which the feudal system was based.

> That they should take who have the power,
> And they should keep who can.

There are many in this country who can take care of themselves under such a system as that. But if you take from the laboring man, who has nothing but his energy and his good will to work, and to whom every good man in this country desires to see afforded the opportunity to work, favorable conditions in which to work, and reasonable wages for the support of himself and his family, the shield of the law, he becomes immediately the victim of an autocratic despotism. And it is for the benefit of the great masses of labor that the Government of the United States, as well as of the States and the municipalities, ought not to hold back and equivocate and quibble about which of them has this or that authority, but should proceed to the utmost of the authority with which each is vested to uphold the law, protect the Government, and prevent the overthrow of the principles of personal liberty, which include the ownership of property.

The great incentive upon which this Nation has been developed has been the vision which every industrious man has had, that by the application of his labor and thrift there was a home, however humble it might be, that he saw ahead of him, where he would be the master of the accumulated wages of his labor. But if you overthrow the law you destroy that possibility, as you destroy the principle of property. You attack the incentive upon which this Nation has been developed, under which the workingman of America has attained a higher station in life than any other workingman in the world.

Some of the headlines of the papers of the last few days will indicate the condition into which the country is getting.

In the New York Sun of October 9 is the headline:

"12,000 out now on Pennsylvania Lines—Car inspectors join shopmen—Men ordered back to work."

The New York Sun of the same date has this headline:

"More reds seized in raids at Gary—Stockade being built to hold military prisoners."

And in the New York Sun of the same date is an account of a plan by the Literary Digest, one of the well-known magazines of the country, on account of the strike to do away with typesetting in issuing its publication and to substitute a photographic process in order to meet this emergency. It is one of the curious features of the situation that the cessation of the publication of practically all the magazines in New York City has scarcely been mentioned in the daily press. We have scarcely seen even a brief news item of it. I do not understand that circumstance. There seems to be something mysterious about it. It may be entirely a good intention, based upon some principle of ethics among publishers. But it seems to me that when we have arrived at a time when, contrary to the advice of the officers of their organization, workingmen engaged in the work of printing these magazines quit work, without any better cause than that which is assigned, so extensively that the publication of the magazines which, in our system of life, have become almost essential as a medium of intelligence and it attracts no attention at all, it is quite significant.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The case of the strike of the printers, or typesetters, or whatever they are, to which the Senator has alluded, is a case, is it not, where the public is made to suffer because the local unions can not agree with their national union?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I understand that that is the situation.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I will say to the Senator that it is my purpose, the hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, to move to take up the treaty, but I do not want to cut off the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have no objection to taking up the treaty, but I should like to proceed for just a few moments.

Mr. LODGE. I was going to speak on the treaty myself.

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the Senator will allow me about five minutes more, I will conclude.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Another headline:

"Ferry strike cuts off food."

Another headline:

"Walkout of expressmen may bring food famine."

Another headline:

"Two hundred and twenty-five thousand miners to strike November 1."

Another headline:

"New York Harbor paralyzed. Sixty thousand striking longshoremen frenzied by mob rule. United States officials appealed to. Men refuse to heed leaders, and huge pyramids of perishable goods spoil on docks."

Another headline:

"Every magazine suspends. Pressmen's strike in New York prevents publication."

Another headline, from the Baltimore Sun:

"United States soldiers fired on. Squad in automobile attacked from ambush at Gary. Troops called to Pittsburgh."

Another headline, from the Washington Post, October 11:

"Coastwise lines cancel sailings. Extension of longshoremen's strike to all Atlantic ports is feared."

Mr. President, reverting to the resolution, a short time ago Emma Goldman, an anarchist, was released from the Missouri penitentiary. She had been ordered to appear before the United States immigration officials to answer the charge of being an undesirable alien, subject to deportation, and has had her case indefinitely postponed, as one of my correspondents suggests, along the line of the proceedings in the case of Hillstrom, the anarchist, of Mooney, and of Minor, who has been referred to here this morning.

A man by the name of Leon Green, a Russian alien and anarchist, subject to deportation under the law, one of the men who attempted to bring about a revolution in the city of Seattle, is now carrying on his activities in the city of Chicago, and no steps have been taken to deport him. In fact, I understand he has been told he would not be allowed to go to Russia. He wants to go to Russia. When Trotski wanted to go to Russia, at a time when we had some interest in preventing anarchists from this country from going to Russia to overthrow the government and the army of what was at that time our ally, Government officials insisted upon his going. Now, when it is in the interest of the United States to get rid of these men and they want to go, they are told that they can not go.

Mr. LODGE. May I suggest to the Senator at this point that the Attorney General is probably too much occupied just now in reducing the cost of living to give any attention to the enforcement of the law against these persons?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have not any doubt about that at all. He is chasing the cost of living and the strike is chasing him. He, instead of being after the strikes and the revolutionary demands on which many of them are based, has his back turned toward them, and every strike that occurs that increases the cost of producing coal and increases the cost of unloading freight from the ships, increases the cost of living a good deal faster than the Attorney General can reduce it by any proceedings that he may undertake. It seems to me that he is ignoring the cause of the situation which he is trying to remedy.

In McLean's Magazine, a very prominent magazine published at Toronto, Canada, in the June issue, attention is called to the manner in which the laws of this country regulating aliens have been carried out. Of course, that was during the war, but activities that Trotski was engaged in in this country are now being carried on through the same organizations with which he was connected.

Official reports—

Reading from this magazine—

such as Sir Douglas Haig's review of the war and many speeches and other utterances of men who know, show that but for the Russian breakdown the war would have been over a year earlier.

The man chiefly responsible for the defection of Russia was Trotski. Trotski—the real man now directing the Russian affairs, acting under German instructions—was arrested and held in the internment camp at Amherst, Nova Scotia, on the very definite instructions of the British secret service, who knew exactly who he was and what he was proceeding to do. They protested strongly against our releasing him. Yet our authorities released him at the request of some one at the British Embassy, Washington, acting, they say, on the request of some one in Washington.

* * * * * * *

A Russian acquaintance who recently passed through Toronto told me he knew him very well, suspected him, and once as a pretext asked him to translate, carefully, a document into German and Russian. Trotski failed on the Russian, but his German was perfect.

* * * * * * *

Just when the United States was severing relations with Germany and war was certain, he started the campaign against militarism and the doing away with the United States Government once and forever.

That was all well known to our Secret Service. That has been available to the Department of Justice. It is a violation of the law to carry on a campaign to do away with the United States Government "once and forever." That is a violation of the law of the United States, strange as it may seem.

What I am insisting upon now is that these things are being repeated by others and with money which Trotski, who was allowed to go to Russia by the deliberate action of our Government, has sent to the United States to be used by his agency here. The people of the United States are entitled to the enforcement of the law which was enacted to protect the Government and the people of this country against such attacks.

I read further:

A typewritten copy of the speech was given to Col. Biddle, of the United States Army, who that night read it over the phone to Col. Van Deman in Washington. Another copy went to the British secret service.

Quoting from Trotski, he says:

"You who stay here," he cried, "must work hand in hand with the revolution in Russia, for only in that way can you accomplish revolution in the United States."

He says, further:

It is an extraordinary fact, the police officials tell me—

This article is by Lieut. Col. J. B. McLean, publisher of this magazine—that these agitators, who are so bold and courageous on the platform—

And this is quite characteristic—

when stirring up a mob to rebel against authority to seize anything they want are the most arrant cowards when they themselves have to face authority. Trotski was no exception. He crouched and whined and cried in abject terror. When he found he was not to be shot his bluff returned and he protested violently. Later he assume a religious air when he objected to the house in which, by chance, he was temporarily held.

* * * * * * *

The British secret service handed over full details to the authorities at Halifax, including a copy of Trotski's speech. They knew he was a German, not a Russian. With his four companions he was held for some time. His wife and other persons, plentifully supplied with money—which the records show came from German sources in New York—were in communication with Washington and New York. The British secret service people, knowing they had a very important German prisoner, fought bitterly against the release. The minor Canadian officials, knowing the facts, were amazed when they were ordered to discharge the crew with honors.

Our officials were instructed to inform the press that Trotski was an American citizen traveling on an American passport; that his release was specially demanded by the Washington State Department; that in view of the precarious international relations existing at that time it was necessary for Canada to release him.

* * * * * * *

At Ottawa Trotski had, and continues to have, strong underground influence. There his power was so great that orders were issued that he must be given every consideration—issued when it was known at Ottawa who Trotski was. Even after he went through the form of the Brest-Litovsk treaty, which took Russia out of the war, orders were given to Col. Chambers, the chief censor, to forbid any but complimentary references in the Canadian press to Trotski and Lenin.

Trotski agents here are appealing to the baser elements by showing the rich plums to be had by revolutionary methods. In scores of meetings across the continent audiences are being told that they, the proletariat, should rise and seize anything they want. As they have little, they will lose nothing in the attempt. Stories of the big, fat, voluptuous opportunities that have come to their associates in Russia have been brought back to America and have stirred the blood of the envious until to-day over 8,000 organizers are at work urging Trotski revolution.

* * * * * * *

One investigator, a trade-unionist, who is fighting them strongly, told me they are using as much paper in one week in New York for disseminating their literature as the leading daily in Canada uses in six months. At their depots a continuous stream, young persons chiefly, is passing in to purchase the literature, a set of which costs $7 to $10.

* * * * * * *

Things became so bad that the Dominion cabinet appointed C. H. Cahan, K. C., to take over the whole problem from our department of justice. In a short time he uncovered such a serious state of affairs that once more the Trotski influences got busy and Mr. Cahan was ordered to cease his inquiries and send in his resignation.

Attention is called to an aspect of this condition which seems to me to demand immediate attention of the Attorney General, to the fact that Rev. George D. Herron, who, it is alleged in the Washington State Weekly of September 5, 1919—deserted his lawful wife and left her to consort with another woman, and this other woman had money and she gave some of that money to the once Rev. George D., and with it he founded the so-called Rand School of Social Science. When L. C. A. K. Martens, ambassador of the Lenin government to the bolshevists of the United States, set up his soviet bureau in New York that bureau got into immediate touch with the Rand School and worked in close cooperation with it for the furthering of Bolshevist propaganda in this country.

That school is now being conducted as a sort of university of anarchy. They are preaching revolution. The promotion of their revolutionary aims and acts of violence constitute acts of distinction with them and their associates. That is an attack upon the Government. It is an attack upon the authority of the law. It is a violation of the existing statute, and it is the duty of the Attorney General of the United States to take steps against it, to submit the facts in these cases to the judges and the juries of the United States courts; but he has failed to do it. That was my purpose in framing the resolution which I introduced this morning in the form in which it was framed and for calling the attention of the Attorney General to the situation and seeing what he has to say about it.

A great many cases have been cited here in the Senate—I have cited some of them myself—in which, instead of proceeding against revolutionists, the power and the influence of the Government is exercised in their behalf. In that connection the paper from which I just read contains this statement:

They—

That is, the law-abiding people—have wondered how Leon Green escaped arrest long enough to abscond with thousands of labor's money; why Walker Smith is at large; why Bouck's indictment was quashed; and why Anna Louise Strong, Sydney Strong, E. B. Ault, and Jim Duncan have been permitted to advocate all that is seditious and treasonable and denounce all that is loyal and patriotic.

The answer is found in the evidence seized in the Rand school and soviet bureau raids: George D. Herron—it ought to be Harem—founder of the Rand school of sedition, was President Wilson's specially appointed envoy to the Russian Bolshevists; Prof. Shotwell, another Rand school lecturer, was a member of Col. House's peace commission; Raymond Robins was his specially appointed Red Cross representative in Russia; Fred C. Howe, prominent as an adviser to the soviet bureau and the Rand school, is immigration commissioner at New York by appointment by the President of the United States; Carleton Hayes, professor at Columbia, who helped raise a huge I. W. W. defense fund, was in the Military Intelligence Division; George W. Kirchway, who was in correspondence with Martens, was a director of the United States Employment Service; and others of more or less prominence in the administration's regard were also in full sympathy with the propaganda in favor of a soviet form of government and the nationalization after the Russian model of industry and women.

I desire to call attention to merely one other circumstance.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from Washington will be glad to know that Mr. Howe has resigned. I think probably his resignation was induced by some of the attacks which were made in this body by Democrats and Republicans upon a man with his views holding that important position.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I have an inquiry this morning from a correspondent stating:

I would like to ask why the motion to deport Emma Goldman has been indefinitely postponed? I presume the motion to deport Berger was also indefinitely postponed. I would also like to know why Rose Pastor Stokes is still out on bail, though her appeal for a new trial is now nearly two years old. She is still making seditious speeches and openly defying the law to do anything to her. Is it because she is the wife of a rich American that nothing is done to her?

Why are men of radical tendencies and sympathizers of the Bolsheviki sent to Europe at this time as ministers?

Now, just a moment, Mr. President, and I shall have concluded. I have here the Criminal Code of the United States, an authoritative compilation of the criminal law. The Criminal Code has been in force for a great many years and is now in force. Section 4 of that code provides:

Whoever incites * * * rebellion or insurrection against the authority of the United States or the laws thereof * * * shall be imprisoned not more than 10 years, or fined not more than $10,000, or both; and shall, moreover, be incapable of holding any office under the United States.

That last clause is quite relevant to the present situation.

I know something, Mr. President, if I may be pardoned for making a personal reference, about the kind of proof that is required in enforcing the law; the method of acquiring that proof; and also the application of the statute to the circumstances; and I assert that the evidence which has been adduced here in overwhelming quantity clearly shows a violation of the statute which I have just read; clearly shows that these people have been engaged, to use the language of the statute, in inciting rebellion against the laws of the United States. They have openly defied the laws; they have urged people to disregard them; to disregard the authority of the United States; and have advocated the overthrow of the Government itself.

Section 6 of the Criminal Code provides that if two or more persons in any State or Territory, or in any place subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, conspire to oppose by force the authority of the United States "they shall each be fined not more than $5,000, or imprisoned not more than six years, or both."

There is overwhelming evidence that that statute is being constantly violated, and with the recourses available to the Department of Justice the evidence can be collected, the witnesses can be had, the proof in legal form can be introduced in the court, if the Attorney General, as the head of his department, will fulfill the responsibilities which rest upon him.

Mr. President, a great many of these people are aliens. The statute which I have just read applies both to aliens and to citizens. There are a great many other statutes which apply only to aliens. Leon Green is an alien; Emma Goldman is an alien. They are both anarchists; they are both Bolshevists; they both advocate "direct action"; they both believe in the elimination of the Government in the settlement of industrial disputes; they believe in and preach the dictatorship of the proletariat; they have printed their doctrines, have circulated them, and, to some extent, have carried them into effect. Being what they are, they are subject to deportation from the United States; and it is the duty of the Attorney General of the United States, the chief law officer of the Government, to enforce these laws for the protection of the Government and for the safety of the elementary principle of the right of the individual to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

Section 3, Thirty-ninth Statutes at Large, page 875, of the law which was enacted on February 5, 1917, provides, in the first place, for the exclusion of aliens who advocate or teach the unlawful destruction of property, and on page 899, section 19, there is this provision:

At any time within five years after entry any alien who at the time of entry was a member of one or more of the classes excluded by law; any alien who shall have entered or who shall be found in the United States in violation of this act, or of any other law of the United States; any alien who at any time after entry shall be found advocating or teaching the unlawful destruction of property, or advocating or teaching anarchy, or the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States or of all forms of law or the assassination of public officials * * * shall, upon warrant of the Secretary of Labor, be taken into custody and deported.

Mr. President, one of the cardinal doctrines of the organizations which at the present time are conducting the principal strike against the industries of the country is the advocacy of the forcible destruction of property whenever it is necessary for the accomplishment of their purposes. They openly preach that.

Under the law they are subject to deportation. That law was not a mere piece of mummery when it was passed by the Congress and put upon the statute books; it was deliberately considered by Congress; it was put upon the statute books for a special purpose, and it is the solemn and sworn duty of the Attorney General of the United States to enforce it. He has not done so.

Mr. President, the United States Shipping Board has stacked up on the docks in Seattle rifles which, under the orders of the Government, are to be exported for the assistance of those who are striving to establish a government of law and order in Russia, and when any man or combination of men say to the Shipping Board, which is the representative in that matter of the Government of the United States, "You can not put those rifles aboard this ship," I say it is the duty of the executive authority of the United States to call to the docks in Seattle however many of the military forces of the United States may be necessary to protect the processes of the Government and to say to every volunteer who is willing to assist in carrying out the purposes of the Government in this commerce, "You will be protected and absolutely guaranteed against violence in going to or coming from or while engaged in this work." In that way the commerce would move; but nothing is done.

The same condition exists in the throttling and strangulation of the United States Shipping Board commerce and ships in the unloading and loading of their cargoes at the port of New York and other Atlantic ports. No steps are being taken by the Government to protect its own processes.

It is for these reasons, Mr. President, for the purpose, at least, of fulfilling my own obligation in calling the attention of the Government to this situation that I have introduced this resolution.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KNOX in the chair). Seventy-two Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany as in open executive session.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to address myself briefly to the pending amendment, known as the Shantung amendment. Before beginning, I ask to have printed at the end of my speech—I shall not ask to have it read—a statement from Hon. Charles Sumner Bird, a very distinguished citizen of my State, in reference to Shantung. I shall ask to have the whole clipping printed. It is very short.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. LODGE. Also, at the same time, at the end of my speech, I ask to have printed a very able editorial from the Christian Science Monitor in regard to the Shantung question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the principal argument made by those who sustain the delivery of the control of Shantung to Japan under this treaty of peace with Germany is that Japan has promised at different times to return it to China. Whatever promises she may have made, whether verbal or written, were all marked by one vital omission. In no instance do I find that Japan ever fixed a time when she would actually return the Province to its rightful owners. Even in the promises she made there are reservations which would give her military control of Kiaochow and economic control of the Province. To determine, therefore, what Japan is likely to do it is necessary to consider what she has done during the past 25 years. If we find in the history of that period that Japan has consistently advanced in her control of China, has constantly invaded Chinese rights and taken over Chinese territory, it seems to me absolute proof that this well-defined policy will be continued in Shantung as it has been so successfully followed everywhere else. For this reason I desire to sketch very briefly the course of Japanese policy in China.

The determination of Japan to adopt a policy of expansion seemed to have been reached in 1894 at the time of the Chinese-Japanese War.

It is not necessary to consider the causes of the war further than to note that Korea had paid, nominally at least, tribute to China from the latter part of the sixteenth century, about 1597 to 1894, when in disputes over the relative influence which the Governments of China and Japan, respectively, were exercising and to exercise in Korea, the war began. At that time Japan declared the independence of Korea as a sovereign State.

The victory of Japan led her to demand in addition to an indemnity the cession by China of the island of Formosa and the Liaotung Peninsula, including the fortress of Port Arthur. Forced by the advice of Germany, Russia, and France, Japan eventually decided not to annex Liaotung Peninsula, but to accept an indemnity of 30,000,000 taels instead. The yielding of Japan to the advice of the three European nations not to annex the Liaotung Peninsula was most unwilling, and from the time when Russia, in 1896 secured a lease of Port Arthur, followed by a concession of railways and mining privileges in Manchuria for herself, the Japanese statesmen asserted to their friends that it seemed evident that a war between Russia and Japan was inevitable The advantageous time for the war was the question for Japan to settle. Evidently Russia's aggressive policy would force Japan to resist in order to protect her own sovereignty. The inevitable conflict of two such ambitious powers as Russia and Japan coveting the same territory—Korea and Manchuria—led to the Russo-Japanese War, beginning in February, 1904.

The result of the war was on the whole a victory for Japan, but it was a victory dearly bought. There was a sacrifice of lives and the assumption of a heavy burden of debt. Japan had doubtless expected to collect an indemnity sufficient to cover the financial costs of the war, and possibly considerably more, as she had done in the China-Japanese War. In fact, she made every effort to do so. She was, however, so weakened by the war and its continually increasing expense as the fighting zone receded farther from the base of supplies that Russia was able positively to refuse to pay any monetary indemnity. Japan could only free Korea, relieving herself from any danger in that quarter and retaining there a dominant position, and securing from Russia the latter's claims in South Manchuria.

Although Japan had declared at the beginning of the war that she was fighting to free Manchuria from the Russian shackles and to secure and maintain independence for Korea, on receiving from Russia the transfer of the concessions which that country had secured from China by bribes and threats, she compelled China to agree to the transfer. She even went further. Russia had nominally, at least, arranged for a joint use of Port Arthur with China, although it was clearly understood that that port was to be Russia's naval base, and that she was to have actual control. Japan, however, made no pretense. She insisted upon the sole use during the term of the so-called lease.

In Korea matters moved promptly; and Korea is a very excellent suggestion of what may be expected in China. At the beginning of the war Japan made an agreement with the Korean Government, February 23, 1904, "definitely to guarantee the independence and territorial integrity of the Korean Empire." It was understood that Japan might occupy "such places as may be necessary from strategic points of view." Later, in the same year, Korea was forced to agree to take a Japanese subject as advisor, whose counsel must be followed; also, to appoint a Japanese diplomatic advisor to negotiate contracts with foreigners and to direct diplomatic affairs. In communicating this agreement to the American Government, the Japanese minister of foreign affairs said that his country "did not intend to place any impediment in the way of legitimate enterprises in Korea," but merely to check "unwise and improvident engagements." On April 1, 1905, another agreement amalgamated the transportation systems of the two countries. On November 17, 1905, the Emperor of Korea agreed to receive a resident general at his court, whose duty it should be to direct diplomatic affairs and to control all foreign matters. Soon, by way of administrative measures, high official appointments were placed under compulsion in Japanese hands. In 1909 the Japanese took the police power, and on August 2, 1910, the Korean Emperor surrendered his imperial title and his country was formally annexed to Japan.

Americans should bear in mind the fact that in the treaty which the United States made with Korea at the time (1882) that she opened her commerce to us, our country undertook, in case Korea was subjected to oppression by other nations, to intervene in her behalf—that is, to use her good offices. I use the shorter term. As has lately been shown unquestionably by the testimony of Prof. Hurlburt, the American sent as agent by Korea to claim this protection, the Korean Government requested the United States to intervene in her behalf and prevent this annexation. Owing to numerous delays, however, brought about by the direct action of Japan, this request was not formally presented until the act of annexation had been accomplished, and no assistance was rendered. The devious policy of Japan, whether or not justifiable from the political viewpoint, is clearly apparent, and Japanese historians themselves make no attempt to deny it.

At the time of the Boxer uprising in 1900, Japan had been among the nations which had agreed to the policy of maintaining the territorial entirety of China and her independent sovereignty. Japan likewise joined with the other nations in the open-door policy of Secretary Hay. After the close of the Russo-Japanese War, when she had taken over the Russian claims to the South Manchuria Railway and was administering that line, she again more than once reaffirmed that policy. For no considerable length of time, however, during any of the period from that day to this, has that policy been fairly carried out in Manchuria and the zones under the control of Japan. Foreign shippers have frequently, one might almost say regularly, complained of discriminations direct or indirect. The testimony is clear that foreign shippers have seen their products held on side tracks on unprotected cars and being spoiled by the rain, while at the same time Japanese products of similar nature—soya beans and the like—were going directly on to the shipping port. Only lately, American dealers in Shanghai have testified that even now Japanese dealers in Shanghai are using as arguments to prospective purchasers of competitive goods that they can guarantee prompt shipment and specific dates of delivery in Manchuria where goods have to pass over the South Manchuria Railway, while American and British dealers can not give such guaranty of delivery. Moreover, specific instances are on record in the Government files of Japanese shipments reaching their destination promptly in a few days, while foreign goods required as many weeks for delivery with no certainty of any specified date.

Such complaints, I think, must have been received by many Senators. I have received some.

In 1911 an international loan by the United States, Great Britain, France, and Germany was under consideration to arrange a reformed monetary system for China and make certain important developments in Manchuria. The carrying out of the purposes of this loan were delayed by the revolution of that autumn in China which overthrew the Empire and established the Republic, so that the purposes have not yet been attained.

Shortly after the entrance of Yuan Shih-Kai to the presidency and the international consortium she took up the question of a large reorganization loan of $125,000,000. In order to secure their share of influence with the Chinese Government, Russia and Japan requested to join this consortium with the consent of the other countries.

Throughout the entire period, since the outbreak of the European war, affairs in China have seemed to European nations of much less import than the duties of the war. The Japanese have apparently strengthened their methods of closing the open door and have also been much more vigorous, as at the time of the Cheng-chia-tung affair, and have been more aggressive, if not to say insolent, in their treatment of the Chinese, especially of the Chinese policy.

The Great War brought to Japan her opportunity. China likewise saw her opportunity and attempted to play her part, but being weak and not promptly supported by foreign friendly nations, and being directly and bitterly opposed by Japan, she was compelled to yield. For example, at the beginning, before Japan acted, China, in order to secure her neutrality and protect her own interests, suggested the following steps:

First. That there should be neutralized under Chinese control all her territory leased to foreign belligerent nations or those that might become belligerent.

Second. If war were waged on her territory, the warlike acts of belligerents should be limited to specified areas. It will be recalled that such limitations had been made with the consent of the powers during the Russo-Japanese War, and Third. That China would join the Allies.

Owing to her weakness, she could not put this policy into effect without consulting other nations. The United States encouraged her. The German legation was inclined to be favorable to her first proposal. But before any action could be taken, Japan, seeking her own aims, on August 15, 1914, sent an ultimatum to Germany, advising the Imperial Government—

To withdraw immediately from Japanese and Chinese waters, German men-of-war and armed vessels of all kinds, and to disarm at once those which can not be so withdrawn.

To deliver on a date not later than September 15 to the Imperial Japanese authorities, without condition or compensation, the entire leased territory of Kiaochow, with a view to the eventual restoration of the same to China.

In taking this action ordering Germany to "withdraw immediately from Chinese waters," Japan insultingly assumed an authority over China to which she had no right and a weakness in China which was not justifiable. As a matter of fact, China did intern warships of both belligerents in waters under her control.

President Yuan Shih-Kai, although he had intimated his readiness to order Chinese forces to capture Tsingtau, was prevented from so doing by the coldness of the reception by other powers, especially Japan. China attempted to limit the scope of military operations. There was no need for military purposes of going outside of the neutral zone about Kiaochow that had been leased to Germany in order to send any troops in. Great Britain followed China's wishes in not going outside of their territorial reservations. The Japanese, on the other hand, landed their troops some 150 miles northwest of Tsingtau at Lungkow, far beyond the limits indicated. Moreover, on their march toward Tsingtau the Japanese assumed the military control of all the territory through which they passed, seizing telegraph stations, barracks, and all strategic positions besides assuming control of the entire railway between Tsingtau and Tsinan-fu, the capital of Shantung—a section of railway most of which had nothing to do with military needs. China made vigorous protests but without avail. Since that time, Japan has maintained military stations throughout the length of the line, has built the important barracks as if for permanent control in Tsingtau and other stations, and has kept some thousands of troops in the Province. Moreover, she has set up a civil administration including a system of courts, and has, in certain instances, been trying cases even between Chinese. Again, in the parts of the town of Tsingtau which are best suited for commercial purposes, she has not only taken control of the former German positions, occupied them with Japanese, and administered them as public property or as private Japanese property, but she has built up permanent Japanese buildings adapted for commercial purposes upon much of the former unoccupied land, has in more than one instance forced foreigners, including Americans, to remove their quarters from advantageous positions to those which were less suitable for their business, and has given the territory thus acquired to Japanese for their own purposes. Our Government has, in its files, evidence of high-handed action on the part of the Japanese authorities against Americans and American establishments far surpassing any pressure brought to bear upon them at any time. We should bear in mind that the Japanese have assumed in the same territory far greater power—civil, military, and economic—than the Germans ever exercised. Moreover, the Germans, especially of late years, had apparently adopted the policy of conciliation toward the Chinese and had yielded some of the privileges which they formerly held; for example, in connection with mines.

It is very apparent that the period came after the German occupation, and very soon after, when they stopped their policy of expansion and exploitation, for what reason I do not know; but there is no question of the fact. The Japanese until the signing of the peace treaty had shown no disposition to yield more to the Chinese; rather the contrary, for they had encroached in all directions.

On November 7, 1914, Tsingtau surrendered to this assault, apparently merely whetting the Japanese determination to strengthen her grip still further. The powers, including the United States, had apparently acquiesced without difficulty in her acts about Tsingtau. To secure her clutch on China as a whole, the Japanese minister in Peking on January 18, 1915, presented directly to the President, contrary to diplomatic usage, the noteworthy 21 demands classified in five different groups. China was warned that she must act promptly, must accept the demands without change, and must keep absolutely secret all proceedings. In spite of the warnings, through newspaper correspondents, the Chinese made it known that such demands had been presented. The Japanese officials emphatically and completely denied the truthfulness of the facts as published. The Japanese Government warned the Japanese newspapers not to publish or discuss the question. All her representatives abroad were ordered to deny the facts and all news regarding them. In Peking, the Japanese minister officially denied to the other legations that any demands had been made. When at length, despite these vigorous attempts at concealment, the copies of these demands became known to other foreign governments, the Japanese Government still denied there were 21 demands. She presented a list of but 11. All this appeared in evidence in the hearing held by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

In the meantime, her Peking representative was pressing for an immediate unqualified acceptance. The Chinese were playing for time and hoping for the influence of foreign public opinion. At length, on May 7, 1915, Japan delivered an ultimatum giving two days and a few hours for acceptance, otherwise "the Imperial Japanese Government will take such steps as may be necessary." Of course, failing to receive assistance from others, the Chinese Government had to yield, although parts of group five, against which the foreign outcry had been loudest and the acceptance of which would practically make China a mere subject province, China refused to accept. While now Japan is urging that America accept her unwritten promise regarding Shantung, we should keep carefully in mind the facts just mentioned. Japan's chief argument, and the argument that has apparently been most frequently accepted by America, is that China finally signed the treaty, although under pressure, and that she must abide by her decision. Japan is now endeavoring to bring pressure upon the present Chinese Government to enter into similar negotiations with her regarding the conditions under which Shantung is to be returned. She wants China to sign the award of the treaty putting all German claims and more into Japanese hands. Does the history of the 21 demands justify Americans now in trusting Japan, even though President Wilson says he trusts her?

It is worth while for Americans to note that at the time of the 21 demands, the American Government had on May 15, 1915, sent a note to both Japan and China and formally notified both Governments "that it can not recognize any agreement or undertaking which has been entered into or which may be entered into between the Governments of China and Japan impairing the treaty rights of the United States and its citizens in China." The political or territorial integrity of the Republic of China or the international policy commonly known as the open-door policy still stands. Apparently, from the public statements of the Japanese Government, that country attempts now to interpret the treaty as recognizing also the 21 demands, but President Wilson specifically states that he did nothing at Paris to weaken the force of this reservation of May, 1915, regarding the demands. China, having failed to check Japan's aggression, next attempted to make provision for a seat at the Paris conference, hoping that there at least she might receive justice.

We have seen that President Yuan Shih-Kai had hoped that the Chinese might capture Tsingtau rather than to attempt to maintain neutrality or to limit military operations wherever Japan was concerned. Next he proposed to send troops to participate in the capture of Tsingtau, urging that all moves in Chinese territory by Japan be discouraged. Again, in August, 1915, he proposed to join the Allies, but the British minister discouraged him. On October 30, acting on the suggestion of one of his foreign advisers, he took up the question again, discussing it with the American, Russian, and French Legations. At this time the matter was given some consideration. The United States being still neutral could take no formal action. The American minister personally sympathized with the movement, and doubtless the American Government would have welcomed it. The matter went so far that the representatives of Great Britain, France, and Russia, on November 23, 1915, met with the minister of foreign affairs in Tokyo, Viscount Ishii. They suggested that China become an ally. Viscount Ishii objected. The reports of the interview from various sources agree that Viscount Ishii summed up his objections to the effect that Japan's interests in China were paramount and that she must maintain a firm hand regarding them. Moreover, Japan could not see without apprehension the prospect of a large Chinese army such as would be required if China were to join actively in the war. Nor could Japan view without uneasiness "a moral awakening of 400,000,000 Chinese," such as would be brought about by the participation in the war. In Millard's account of the interview, he phrases part of the objection thus:

Nor could Japan fail to regard with uneasiness a liberation of the economic activities of a nation of 400,000,000 people.

Such as would be brought about by the war. Americans should ponder well this statement.

When America broke off official relations with Germany, February, 1917, she invited neutrals to sever diplomatic relations with Germany. In Peking, the American minister reached a prompt decision with China. Great Britain, France, Russia, and Italy, while apparently favorably impressed by the suggestion, did not urge it strongly. The Japanese minister in a private interview with the President said that China would run a great risk by joining America inasmuch as the action of the United States probably would not be effective in the war, and that while that country had frequently expressed her sympathy with China, she had really done little for her. It was very doubtful whether the Allies could defeat Germany. It was much safer for China to rely upon Japan, since there would doubtless be harmonious action between Japan and China in the war, and Japan could then protect China. The minister also presented the same argument to China's prime minister. Under the circumstance, the Chinese Government hesitated until the American minister, in reply to questions of the Chinese, stated that while he had no official instructions, on account of the cables being out of order, he would assume the responsibility of saying that, in his judgment, assistance would be given to the Chinese to recover Shantung at the peace conference. On the basis of that assurance China, over the protest of Japan, accepted America's invitation and severed diplomatic relations. The United States Government never repudiated the action of our minister, and China later entered the war believing that she was promised America's support at the peace conference.

These activities of China aroused Japan to new action. The terrific German drive was anticipated with the greatest anxiety. While America would in all probability come into the war, it seemed unlikely that her troops could become seriously effective before the spring of 1919, and it might then be too late. Moreover, in all the countries there was a widespread belief that the Japanese were inclined to sympathize with the Germans and to believe in the likelihood of German success. Under those conditions the Japanese secured from Great Britain, France, Russia, and Italy, under various forms of phraseology and under slightly different conditions, a secret pledge to support the Japanese request that the German claims in Shantung be ceded to her and that the Pacific islands, north of the Equator, be given to Japan.

The Japanese still felt that without America's recognition of their plans, their case was not quite secure, and in consequence, selecting a most eloquent and skillful diplomat, a former minister of foreign affairs, Viscount Ishii, they sent him to the United States to secure such recognition. Shortly before his arrival, a confidential memorandum purporting to be Ishii's program was secured by the State Department and two or three other interested parties. Ishii was to say—that Japan has no ulterior motive in respect to the integrity of China; that she adheres to her open-door pledges; that nothing subversive of China's sovereignty is contemplated; that Japan's sole object is, by means entirely pacific, to bring order out of chaos in China, with no special privilege in view; that Japan understands China better than any other nation, and, owing to her geographical proximity and special political position and interests in the Far East, she should, therefore, when essential, take the leading rôle in dealing with China as the United States does with the nations of the Western Hemisphere.

It is to be noted that in spite of Viscount Ishii's attempt to secure all these demands, in spite of the fact that in the Lansing-Ishii agreement, as it was published by Japan in China and throughout the Far East, he apparently had secured these aims, he had, as a matter of fact, failed in his chief purpose. Secretary Lansing, before the Senate committee, testified as follows:

Ishii said he thought that Japan's special interest in China should be recognized in any agreement we might make. I said that of course the United States recognized that because of geographical location Japan had a peculiar interest in China, but that the danger of putting it in any agreement was that it might be misconstrued and that therefore I objected to it.

I further told him that if he understood "special interest" meant "paramount interest" I could not discuss it further.

Ishii suggested a "Monroe doctrine" for the Far East. I told him that the Monroe doctrine did not give the United States a paramount interest over any nation on this hemisphere. And I thought the same principle should be given any other nation with regard to China. Ishii maintained silence.

This shows clearly that the American Government recognized no special interest of Japan in China greater than an interest such as the United States has in Mexico or Canada, and that Lansing positively refused even to discuss with Ishii any "paramount interest" in China. Moreover, since the Japanese have been talking about the "Monroe doctrine" as applied to the Far East, it is worth while to note that Secretary Lansing positively asserted that the "Monroe doctrine" did not give the United States a paramount interest over any nation on this hemisphere, and that "no paramount interest and no special privileges should be given any other nation with regard to China." It is fortunate that the State Department has, even at this late date, given its interpretation of this agreement.

The Japanese have further attempted to strengthen their hold in China, especially by extensive loan operations. For months an unofficial agent, the former prime minister of Japan, named Nishihari, was in Peking suggesting, almost forcing, the loans upon China. The process was secret. It is the deliberate opinion of both foreign and other observers that threats and bribery were deliberately used. The applications were of such a nature that in many instances they would not be proper securities for loans unless it was intended to use political pressure to collect them. And, again, although the purpose was nominally economic, it is well known that the money was applied, contrary to agreement, for the military purposes of provincial leaders. The purpose was clearly to tie up in Japanese hands the best of the resources of China at a time when the other nations were so occupied that they could not interfere. Unless some change is made in these records, China will be seen to be largely mortgaged to the Japanese in such a way and to such an extent that the already acquired rights of other nations will be seriously infringed.

There is no need to discuss here at length the acts of the peace conference at Paris, as disclosed in sections 156, 157, and 158 of the treaty. It is worth while, however, to note briefly the significance of Shantung, for the full significance of the Shantung settlement seems to be little appreciated by the public. It is ordinarily stated that there has been awarded to Japan merely the German rights in Shantung, and that therefore China is no worse off than she was before. Personally I believe that Germany had no rights to renounce. I think the treaty was abrogated by the act of war. But, however that may be, people shut their eyes to the moral issue and the methods employed by Japan to get this claim, and do not realize its economic and political significance. Attention is frequently called to the fact that the German concession does not include the entire Province of Shantung, some 35,000 square miles (about the size of Illinois), with a population of some 40,000,000, but only the territory surrounding the Bay of Kiaochow, some 200 square miles in extent, with a population of 195,000; and it is further added that Japan has promised to restore to China the political rights over even this territory of Kiaochow, retaining only the economic rights. The Japanese seem to have scrupulously avoided calling attention to the most significant single fact; that is, that in the agreement which they forced China to accede to in connection with this settlement, they reserved a Japanese settlement, selected by themselves, to remain under the absolute control and direction of Japan. After they have taken their pick, if the other nations desire, there might be provided an international settlement.

The outlines of this exclusive Japanese settlement seem to be rather clearly defined. It includes all the wharves and other port facilities, all of the railway terminals, the cable terminals, the central telegraph, telephone, and post offices, the customs, together with all of the best business and governmental sites in Tsingtau. Furthermore, the German rights which Japan is to inherit under the treaty give her the exclusive prior right in case China wishes to build two other trunk-line railroads in Shantung to finance them or build them for China on terms similar to the Tsingtau-Tsinanfu road, to furnish all railway materials for such roads, to finance or administer the opening of mines in the province, and in case China wishes to make any other developments of whatever nature—

The Chinese Government binds itself in all cases where foreign assistance, in persons, capital, or material, may be needed for any purpose whatever within the Province of Shantung to offer the said work or supplying of materials, in the first instance to German, now Japanese, manufacturers and merchants engaged in undertakings of the kind in question.

Still further it includes the right to extend the existing important trunk lines of the main railroad outside of the Province of Shantung into the very heart of China, tapping the two existing north and south main trunk lines, thus enabling her to divert much of the traffic, especially in the winter when the other northern ports are closed, to the port of Tsingtau, over which she has exclusive control.

That is where the Whitham report comes in. The control of these lines in Shantung connects with the northern and southern lines, and Mr. Whitham, in his report on transportation in China, of course shows exactly what he meant, that it was giving to Japan not only control of the railroads of Shantung, but a grip on the entire railroad system of China. It is not surprising that we have not received this report.

Certainly this is no very small hold over forty millions of people.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, would it interrupt the Senator if I asked him a question?

Mr. LODGE. No.

Mr. REED. What reason or excuse is offered for not giving the Senate this report?

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] knows the phraseology of the response better than I do. I think it says simply that it would be incompatible with the public interest to furnish it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I believe the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] was not on the floor at the time that matter was discussed. I will state for his information that the letter from Secretary Lansing, in reply to my request for the report, stated that the report had never received the approval of the Department of State, although the report was made to the Department of Commerce and not to the Department of State at all. The report for some reason, I do not know what, found its way from the Department of Commerce to the Department of State, and was there refused to the Senate by the Department of State on the ground that it has never received the approval of the Department of State, and, therefore, the Secretary does not wish it to obtain publicity, as he expresses it, with any authority of the department. There is an intimation in the communication, which is printed in the RECORD, but which I have not time now to turn to or find, that there was some diplomatic negotiation going on with China with which this might interfere. In his letter of reply to the Senate resolution, which was unanimously adopted asking for the report, the President states that he thinks it is not in the public interest—

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I hardly supposed, if the Senator from Massachusetts will pardon me a word——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. He said it was not in the public interest to comply with the request contained in the Senate resolution to give us the report.

Mr. REED. I understand. I hardly supposed that the Senate was to be barred from seeing anything that had not received the approval of the Secretary of State. It seems to me that is a new doctrine, and I interject the remark now, but I want to elaborate it later——

Mr. LODGE. This, of course, is the view of the President. The Secretary of State can not approve or disapprove the paper.

Mr. REED. I think the Senate is entitled to every paper and every document bearing upon the treaty. The Senate can be just as much expected to respect any necessary secrecy as the State Department. So far as I am concerned, I think the consideration of the treaty ought to be laid aside absolutely until the executive department places the Senate in possession of the papers in the case. The withholding has been without precedent and without justification. To expect the Senate, as representing the people of the United States, in so far as the Constitution gives it that authority, to pass upon an important document without knowing the facts is to expect the Senate to be, to use a common expression, played the fool with. I am tired of dealing with the case without the papers, and I think the Senate ought to take that attitude.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts please state whether this is the only paper connected with the treaty that is under consideration, or related to it, to which the Senate has been refused access or opportunity to study or examine?

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no. We were refused practically everything that we asked for, except two drafts of the American plan for the league of nations, one of which was a printed draft called the American draft, and the other known as the composite draft. Mr. Bullitt, in his testimony, added a number of other drafts to the collection, so that we are rather well supplied with drafts of the American plan which was discarded. They also sent in, after some little acuteness of pressure, the treaty with France, which ought, under the provisions of the treaty, to have been presented the day the German treaty was presented.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. How long was that held up or denied to the Senate?

Mr. LODGE. The French treaty?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. I should say for two or three weeks after the submission of the German treaty. I am not at all sure about the date, but it was after there was some little discussion in the Senate about it that it finally came in. Of course, however, we gained no information from it, for it had been all printed in the newspapers.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Can the Senator from Massachusetts enumerate, out of hand, the important papers or documents which are known to exist which are not now in the possession of the Senate?

Mr. LODGE. I can not give a full account of them from memory; I should have to look at the records, but I can mention one or two. The protest or letter, or whatever we choose to call it—the document in which three of our delegates to the peace conference expressed their objection to the Shantung clause—was refused.

Mr. REED. And is it still refused?

Mr. LODGE. Oh, yes; it has been absolutely refused.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator refers to the letter of Gen. Bliss?

Mr. LODGE. The letter of Gen. Bliss, in which Mr. White and Mr. Lansing joined. That was asked for by a resolution of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] at the very beginning of our proceedings and was refused.

We were also refused the official records of the peace conference and of the commission and of the council of 10.

Mr. REED. So that the Senate has been denied the right to see the very documents which may at some time be appealed to as bearing upon the construction of the treaty itself.

Mr. LODGE. They have been refused; practically everything which has been asked for has been refused. By that I do not mean to say that we have not obtained any information. We have secured considerable information.

Mr. REED. But what you have secured you have obtained in spite of the State Department?

Mr. LODGE. I ought not to say that in fairness. We had the financial experts of the peace commission before us, and, under examination and cross-examination, they went very fully into the discussion of the financial clauses of the treaty with Germany.

Mr. REED. That was when the committee summoned them?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; we summoned them.

Mr. REED. Reports were not sent to you of the proceedings?

Mr. LODGE. No. We simply had these men before us. We had Mr. Baruch, Mr. Bradley Palmer, and Mr. Norman H. Davis. They gave us all the information they could, I think. We also had the Secretary of State before us, and we also had the benefit of a three and one-half hours conversation with the President at the White House.

Mr. REED. But the papers and records of the negotiations have never been laid before you?

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no; none of the records of the peace conference or of the discussions carried on have been transmitted to the Senate. They were distinctly refused by the President, not only in his letter to the Committee on Foreign Relations but in the conversation at the White House.

Mr. REED. If I am not breaking in on his discussion, I want to ask the Senator from Massachusetts one further question; and we have broken in so much that perhaps we might pursue this matter for a moment further, with the Senator's permission.

Mr. LODGE. It is not breaking in on my discussion at all.

Mr. REED. Has the Austrian treaty yet been laid before the Senate?

Mr. LODGE. No.

Mr. REED. I will ask the Senator whether he is unofficially aware of the fact that the Austrian treaty in radical and important respects undertakes to modify the league of nations covenant?

Mr. LODGE. I was not aware of that. I have put into the RECORD a copy of it, having received a copy from Paris through the Chicago Tribune correspondent, which I had printed together with two letters. Not all of the letters connected with it were included, by any means, but two that were sent us in response to the Austrian objections. The first draft of the treaty and the final letter of transmittal from our delegates I put in, and they have been printed. I confess, however, I have not had time to examine them with any care at all. The Senator from Missouri has undoubtedly seen them.

Mr. REED. The point I desire to make is—and I make it in the form of a question—whether it is not true that, while the clamor is being made for haste in the acceptance of the treaty with Germany, which contains the permanent league of nations, treaties are now being negotiated with other countries which in substance and in effect change the terms of the league of nations contract? That is going on at the very time when we are being lashed here, and it is insisted that we shall at once enter into this contract without change.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have not examined the version of the league of nations contained in the Austrian treaty. I had supposed it was the same in all the treaties. It is to be attached to the Bulgarian treaty, of course, and to the treaty with the Turks, and also to the Hungarian treaty. I had no idea that there was any variation in it or that it was modified in any way by those treaties.

Mr. REED. For the sake of not leaving the matter in the air—and with this I will take my seat, saying, however, that I intend to give a little more attention to it—this much, at least, is true, if we are to trust to the unofficial copy of the Austrian treaty, that the Austrian treaty practically undertakes to control by the Allies or through the league of nations the internal affairs of Austria.

The practical government of the country is taken over by the league. Then, it is provided that any question arising as to the carrying out of any of the internal affairs of Austria as prescribed in the treaty shall be an international question and shall be settled by the league; then, it is further provided that the settlement shall be by the council of the league; then, it is further provided that that settlement shall be by a majority of the council of the league, instead of by a unanimous vote; then, it is further provided that all of the nations signatory hereby bind themselves to abide by the majority decision of the council of the league; and then, it is further provided that the complaint as to a violation of the treaty obligations by Austria can not be made by any nation a member of the league, which is the plain provision of the league covenant itself, but that it can only be made by one of the nations that is a member of the council. So, I say, by the boldest sort of process they are even now by way of treaty grafting onto the covenant of the league of nations provisions which change its entire import; and that, while that process is going on, the Austrian treaty is withheld from us, the correspondence is kept from us, and we are told we must proceed at breakneck speed.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I will say, first, to the Senator from Missouri that the Austrian treaty which we have is an official copy, but it was not officially transmitted. As to interference with internal affairs, the Senator need not travel so far as the Austrian treaty, for he will find similar interference in the treaty with Poland.

Mr. REED. I am aware of that.

Mr. LODGE. The treaty with Poland has never been transmitted to the Senate, but as it was transmitted by the British Government to the Parliament and printed with the other papers—and it was published in the White Book, a copy of which could be purchased for sixpence at the booksellers in London—I secured a copy and had it printed. It contains an interesting letter from M. Clemenceau to Paderewski.

There is also a treaty with Czechoslovakia somewhere that has relation to the German treaty. The Czechoslovakian treaty I have never seen, and I have never heard of its being published in England, or I should have tried to secure a copy.

Mr. GORE. How does the Senator procure the copies of the treaties which had not been transmitted to the Senate?

Mr. LODGE. I have been able to secure copies in England. If they were published in this country, of course they could be obtained here; but I have a friend in England who kindly sends me them when they are published, as they can be obtained at small expense. I repeat, the Czechoslovakian treaty we have never had; but, so far as waiting for documents is concerned, my own feeling is that we know about all we are likely to know about the pending treaty, and I should be very glad to go on with it and finish it at the earliest possible moment consistent with proper discussion and debate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. REED. Will the Senator pardon me for a moment?

Mr. LODGE. I yield first to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. REED. I beg pardon; I did not know the Senator from Connecticut was on the floor.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. When the Senator from Massachusetts speaks of having been refused the records I presume he refers to the records of the peace conference.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; the records of the peace conference, and also the records of the meeting of the council of ten, which gradually dwindled, as will be remembered, to a council of six, then to a council of four, and until it finally ended up with a council of three.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes. By the term "records" does the Senator mean to include what were known as the minutes and the procés verbaux?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly. The Senator will recall that we secured a copy of the proceedings of one of the meetings of the commission in a pamphlet which was printed. It was sent in with some papers transmitted by the Secretary of State and contained the record, I think, of one session. I always thought that it got in by mistake, but that may not be the case.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It may have been a sample. But what I wanted to call attention to, Mr. President, was that the Secretary of State, Mr. Lansing, testified, if I recall his statement correctly, before the Committee on Foreign Relations that at the request of the President a cable had been sent by his department to M. Clemenceau requesting M. Clemenceau not to divulge to the French Chamber of Deputies or to the French Senate the minutes and the procés verbaux.

I received yesterday a copy of a French newspaper, or I think it was a translation of the French, purporting to be a statement by Clemenceau to the French Chamber of Deputies, in which he stated that it was at the request of President Wilson that he declined to furnish the French Chamber with the procés verbaux or the minutes of the conference.

Now, Mr. President, my strong impression is that those minutes have been furnished to a committee of the French body, either the Senate or the Chamber, and that the committee was on the point of divulging them or submitting them to the body of which it was a servant, and that it was upon the receipt of the cable from our State Department, under instructions from the President of the United States, that Clemenceau forbade the publication of those, and France has ratified the treaty without knowing anything of them. The committee, at least, had the privilege of seeing them; but our Committee on Foreign Relations—we being a great democracy and having the advantage of open diplomacy—have never been allowed to see them.

Those procés verbaux, telling what went on at each sitting of our peace commissioners, of course show the arguments given for every disposition that was made in this peace treaty, and for all the provisions of the covenant of the league of nations, and show what was said by each peace commissioner of the different nations, and are the key and explanation to what this treaty means, and why these things were done. That, under the new demonstration of open diplomacy, is put in the dark, and we are allowed to see this thing, not face to face, but "through a glass darkly," and badly grimed at that.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have been led away from what I was trying to say, and I shall now conclude briefly.

I was speaking of this control of the entire Chinese transportation system which Japan was acquiring through the Shantung railways. The comparison, to show practically what it is, that springs most naturally to one's mind, is to imagine that Great Britain, with her control of Canada—a far less rigorous control than Japan exerts over Manchuria or Eastern Inner Mongolia—also held under her control the port of New York, all the wharves, all railway terminals, including our two principal railroads, the management of our central customshouse, post office, cable terminals, telegraph and telephone administrations, the absolute ownership and control of the Pennsylvania Railway through to Chicago, with the right to extend it at least as far west as Kansas City; the prior right to finance or build and furnish supplies to all railroads; all important mines, present and future, in that territory; and any other improvements which our people, through this Government, might contemplate making in any of that territory north of Washington and east of Chicago, provided Great Britain would perform this work for us as cheaply as any other responsible bidder. Before acceding to this section of the peace treaty the Senate should carefully note what such a grip of Great Britain would mean, not only to the United States but to all other nations of the world wishing to do business with the United States. That would fairly illustrate the enormous value of the control which Japan retains in the railroads and mines and her share of the port of Kiaochow.

The Senate, I think, should not only keep fully in mind the aggressive measures taken by Japan from 1894 to the present in order to note the strides that she has made and what may be anticipated in the future, not only should they note her methods of unscrupulous disposition, but they also should not lose sight of other acts of hers which will enable them to judge of their effect upon a people falling under her control. There need be cited only two matters. Americans know from the spirit with which we have administered Porto Rico and the Philippines, what our views are regarding the influence of a stronger nation for a weaker one, more backward in matters of modern economic and political development. Late revelations of the Japanese policies in Korea begun with the murder of a Korean queen and the force exercised upon the Emperor and his ministers at the time of the annexation and ending with the brutal torture and killing of the unarmed and unresisting revolutionists in the spring of 1919, showed the difference between Japanese and American ideals. Do we wish to have Japanese methods applied in Shantung? And we should not forget that there are many individual instances of similar methods having been applied in Manchuria to the Chinese where the Japanese have been in control.

One other and special instance of Japanese methods, a matter in which we have taken a profound interest and in which all nations desirous of the world's welfare have taken a profound interest, is the opium question. For the last 10 years China has made a most heroic effort to free her people from the curse of opium and its compounds. They have gone so far as to expend, I think, something like $18,000,000 in destroying a large quantity of opium which had been brought in. The Government, to a most remarkable degree, has succeeded in carrying out its policy, such success being verified by British officials, as well as by the almost universal testimony of foreigners residing in China. Within the last two or three years the Japanese have been forcing the Chinese in Chihli and Shantung back to their former condition. Poppies are growing in Manchuria. Opium is manufactured there in large quantities under the direction of the Japanese, and the same drugs—formerly bought, it is asserted, largely in Edinburgh and other British territory—are now imported by the Japanese contrary to their formal word at the opium conference, contrary to the spirit of the Chinese customs laws, and are entering China in very large quantities. The outport and overseas supplement of the China Illustrated Weekly for February 15, 1919, gives some 300 specific cases of purchases of opium and morphine made by its own agents from Japanese shops. Testimony shows that such cases are almost limitless, and it is believed by the foreigners resident in China that this traffic has been deliberately encouraged by the Japanese Government; first, for the purpose of revenue, and, second, with the ready willingness, at any rate, to have the Chinese for the time being weak physically and morally in order that the Japanese may be strengthened in this locality politically.

It is amazing to me that the supporters of prohibition should sustain a power which is engaged in forcing opium upon China, a drug even more deadly in its effect than alcohol.

In this connection I wish to print the testimony taken by the committee in regard to the opium question, which I will ask to have inserted here without reading. It is the testimony of Mr. Macklin, who has been for more than 20 years in China, and the head of the College of Nanking. It well deserves reading and examination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

"SHANTUNG AND OPIUM.

"Under the dominating influence of Japan in China the opium business that had been stopped by England and China is being fully reestablished.

"In Asia magazine of March, 1919, Putnam Weale says that the Japanese imported 20 tons of morphine a year into China. The Shanghai North China Daily News, the most conservative and reliable British newspaper and the mouthpiece of the British Legation, quoted in the Literary Digest of April 12, 'In South China morphine is sold by Chinese peddlers, each of whom carries a passport certifying that he is a native of Formosa and would be entitled to Japan's protection. There are Japanese post offices everywhere in China, and they carry the drug throughout the country, and the Chinese authorities are neither able to investigate nor interfere. They are helpless under Japanese domination. Japanese drug stores throughout China carry large stocks of morphine, and Japanese medicine venders look to morphine for their large profits throughout Tairen. Morphine circulates though Manchuria and the Provinces adjoining. Through Tsingtau morphine is distributed over Shantung, Anhui, and Kiangsu Provinces. From Formosa morphine is carried with opium and other contraband by motor-driven fish boats to some point on the mainland, from where it is distributed throughout the Province of Fukien and north of Kwangtung. Everywhere it is sold by Japanese under extraterritorial protection. While the morphine traffic is large, there is every reason to believe that the opium traffic upon which Japan is embarking with enthusiasm is likely to prove more lucrative (18 tons of morphine sold in one year by Japan to China).

"'In the Calcutta opium sales Japan has become one of the considerable purchasers of Indian opium; she purchases for Formosa where the opium trade shows steady growth and where opium is required for the manufacture of morphine. Sold by the Government of India, this opium is exported under permits applied for by the Japanese Government for shipment to Kobe and is transshipped to Tsingtau. Large profits are made in this trade, in which are interested some of the leading firms of Japan. It must be emphasized that this opium is not imported into Japan, but is transshipped in Kobe Harbor, from which point it is assisted by the Japanese railroads to Tsinanfu and smuggled to Shantung into Shanghai and Yangtze Valley. Two thousand chests of opium are smuggled, valued at $20,000 per chest, or $40,000,000, and the Japanese authorities recently taxed $5,000 a chest or $10.000,000, which does not appear in the estimates.

"'The customs and post offices where smuggling is done are wholly under Japanese control. Moreover, Japanese military domination would forbid in both ports any interference with the traffic in which Japanese authorities are interested, either official or unofficial.'

"Under the 10-year arrangement with England in 1907 the Chinese cleared their Provinces of native opium in seven years, and then the Indian open trade was stopped, though British merchants were still allowed tacitly to smuggle. Lately the Chinese bought up the remaining $14,000,000 worth of opium and burned it, and now under Japan's domination China must submit again to this reestablishment of this vile trade.

"Shall America indorse these Hunnish acts toward a sister, friendly, allied Republic by signing the treaty in its present form?

"After many years of heroic efforts, the Chinese finally threw off the opium traffic, finally purchasing $14,000,000 worth of the drug and burning it. After all this sacrifice under the Japanese domination the opium trade is being fully reestablished. The North China Daily News, the most conservative and reliable British newspaper in China and the mouthpiece of the British Legation, as quoted in the Literary Digest of April 12, says: 'Eighteen tons of morphine were smuggled into China in one year. Japanese post offices are in every part of China and carry the drug everywhere. No customs inspections by Chinese authorities allowed by the Japanese. In south China morphine is sold by Chinese peddlers, each of whom carries a passport certifying that he is a native of Formosa, and therefore entitled to Japanese protection. Japanese drug stores throughout China carry large stores of morphine. Japanese medicine vendors look to morphine for their largest profit. Through Tairen morphine circulates throughout Manchuria and the Province adjoining. Through Tsingtau morphine is carried with opium and other contraband by motor-driven fishing boats to some point on the mainland from whence it is distributed throughout the Province of Fukien and the north Kwangtung. Everywhere it is sold by Japanese under extraterritorial protection. While the morphine traffic is large, there is every reason to believe that the opium traffic upon which Japan is embarking with enthusiasm is likely to prove more lucrative. In the Calcutta opium sale, Japan has become one of the considerable purchasers of Indian opium. She purchases for Formosa, where the opium trade shows a steady growth and where opium is required for the manufacture of morphine. Sold by the Government of India, this opium is exported under permits applied for by the Japanese Government, is shipped to Kobe, and from Kobe is transshipped to Tsingtau. Large profits are made in this trade, in which are interested some of the leading firms of Japan. It must be emphasized that this opium is not imported into Japan. It is transshipped in Kobe Harbor, from which point, assisted by the Japanese-controlled railroad through Tsinanfu, it is smuggled through Shantung into Shanghai into Yangtze Valley. Two thousand chests are smuggled, selling at $20,000—$40,000,000. The Japanese authorities levy a tax upon this, which does not appear in the estimates, equivalent to $5,000 a chest, a total for 2,000 chests of $10,000,000. The customs where smuggling is done are wholly under Japanese control. Moreover, Japanese military domination would forbid in both ports any interference with the traffic in which the Japanese are interested, either officially or unofficially.'

"From the Missionary Review of the World, May 19, E. W. Thwing, of the International Reform Bureau, says: 'Japan imports 20 tons of morphine a year into China.'

"Many quotations in Millards Review and the Far Eastern Magazine.

"Under 10-year arrangement with England in 1907 the Chinese cleared all their Provinces of native opium in seven years, and then the Indian opium trade was supposedly stopped, but tacitly smuggling still allowed, and now under Japanese domination China must submit to the full reestablishment of the vile traffic. Shall America indorse such Hunnish acts toward a sister, friendly, allied Republic by signing the treaty in its present form?

"W. E. MACKLIN."

Mr. LODGE. It is needless to dwell on these conditions, however. The case seems so complete that it is impossible to see how any conscientious American can consent to any act or any treaty that will extend the power of such a nation as Japan over a country like China, especially when the United States deliberately drew China into the war with at least an implied if not an expressed promise to give assistance and protection at the peace conference.

Such then has been the course of Japan—steady, relentless, aiming to get ultimate control of the vast population and great territory of China. As it has been in the past so will it be in the future in regard to Shantung. Japan is steeped in German ideas and regards war as an industry because from war she has secured all the extensions of her Empire. She is a power armed and trained confronted by an unarmed and peaceful people. She means to exploit China and build herself up until she becomes a power formidable to all the world. It is not merely that she will close the markets of China and obtain enormous commercial and economic advantages. She will use ultimately the practically unlimited man power of China for military purposes just as Germany and Austria used in their armies the man power of the 26,000,000 Slavs, who were utterly opposed to German domination, to promote their schemes of conquest. Japan will be enabled to construct in that way a power which will threaten the safety of the world. She is already advancing in Siberia; she controls practically as far as Lake Baikal; she is beginning to stretch out farther; and with her control there and China developed as she means to develop it she will threaten Europe. But the country that she would menace most would be our own, and unless we carefully maintain a very superior Navy in the Pacific the day will come when the United States will take the place of France in another great war to preserve civilization. England allowed Germany for 40 years to build herself up in every direction, to rob Denmark, subdue Austria, and plunder France. At the end of 40 years she had to make gigantic sacrifices to prevent the German conquest of the world. It seems incredible that Senators understanding this subject and looking out upon the future should pursue a similar policy toward Japan; that we should be so shortsighted as actually to leave Japan to become a peril to America and even to encourage her in so doing.

I do not propose that we go to war with Japan, but there is a long distance between that and helping her, encouraging her, and aiding her to get control of China and of 400,000,000 people.

But there is one other reason even more decisive to my mind than this. It is a great wrong, this giving of Shantung over to the control of Japan. Morally it is indefensible, and it is no answer to say that we failed to object to the German seizure of Shantung. As a matter of fact, the open-door policy of Mr. Hay was the reply to the German movement and for the time arrested it. The President has gone out of his way to say that provided we could trade with these stolen territories we are willing to let them be stolen. This unfounded attack upon the dead is the most repulsive of all those attacks which the President has seen fit to make. If ever there was a disinterested policy, it was that of Mr. Hay, who did not take office until six months after Germany took Kiaochow. We got nothing from it whatever that all the world did not get. The intention of the policy was to save China and prevent further extensions of foreign acquisitions of Chinese territory. But even if it had been otherwise, it would be no answer to what it is now proposed to do by this treaty to say that we should have interfered in behalf of Korea in 1904. Two wrongs never made a right. If we passed by on the other side in 1904, neither then nor in the case of the German seizure of China did we become an active participant in the wrong. Here we become an active participant—we put our signature to the treaty and give our approval to the control of Shantung by Japan. We assent to having the territory of an associated power, innocent and peace loving, handed over to another associated power. It is not enemy territory that we thus betray. It is the territory of a friend who helped us and the other nations in the war against Germany. It seems to me an intolerable wrong. I desire at least that my vote should record for the benefit of those who come after me that I in no way was associated with this wrong to man and to the cause of freedom and justice.

APPENDIX A.

[From the Boston Herald, Oct. 8, 1919.]

"C. S. BIRD STANDS WITH SENATOR LODGE—MAKES TART REPLY TO REQUEST FOR AID FROM LEAGUE TO ENFORCE PEACE—CALLS SHANTUNG A MONSTROUS CRIME

"Charles Sumner Bird has sent a sharp reply to the finance committee of the League to Enforce Peace, in reply to a telegram asking him to contribute to the campaign that is now being conducted by President Lowell, of Harvard University, in behalf of ratification of the peace treaty without substantial reservations.

"He asked that his name be erased from 'your list of apologists.'

"ADDRESSED TO W. H. TAFT.

"Mr. Bird's letter to the committee is addressed to former President Taft, president of the League to Enforce Peace. It follows:

"EAST WALPOLE, MASS., October 7, 1919.

"Hon. WILLIAM HOWARD TAFT,
"President, Bush Terminal Sales Building, New York City:

"I have just received a telegram from the finance committee of your association asking me to help the cause by a substantial contribution.

"As I understand it, your society favors the league covenant as it now stands, whitewashed, however, with soft phrases and useless interpretations which every other signatory will treat with ill-concealed amusement.

"I favor the unadulterated reservations for which Senator LODGE has been making a courageous and patriotic fight. The league covenant which you ask me to support pardons the looting of the Chinese Republic, our traditional friend and ally, by the Japanese Monarchy, a monstrous crime, which if ratified by the Senate will brand my country for all time as the faithless ally of a great but helpless people.

"I refuse to contribute one dollar for such a purpose, and furthermore I request you to erase my name from your list of apologists for your un-American propaganda.

"CHARLES SUMNER BIRD.

"The telegram to Mr. Bird was:

"NEW YORK, October 3, 1919.

"CHARLES S. BIRD:

"The League to Enforce Peace, William Howard Taft, president; A. Lawrence Lowell, chairman, is conducting an active and necessarily expensive campaign to secure an expression of public opinion that will compel ratification of the peace treaty without reservation that would require resubmission to the Paris conference of a separate treaty with Germany. Will you not help the cause by a substantial contribution?

"Herbert S. Houston, treasurer; George W. Wickersham, Vance McCormick, Cleveland H. Dodge, Oscar S. Straus, finance committee; Bush Terminal Sales Building, New York."

APPENDIX B.

[From the Christian Science Monitor, Oct. 7, 1919.]

"SHANTUNG ONCE MORE.

"The statement publicly made by Senator LODGE of his inability to support the Shantung clause of the peace treaty on any terms must strike the ordinary man as the only possible step for any person to take who, to an understanding of the conditions, adds a statesmanlike perception of the consequences entailed.

"It is scarcely necessary to recite once again the nature of the extraordinary surrender of the allied Governments to Japan in the Paris conference. It will suffice to say that, in spite of repeated declarations in favor of self-determination, a Province inhabited by some forty millions of people has had its future determined for it by five aliens in a French council chamber. Now, not only was this an unspeakable breach of the idea of self-determination but it was something even worse, for it was a decision to take the destinies of these 40,000,000 people out of the hands of their own national Government and to hand them over to the mercy of a foreign government which, up to the time of the signing of the treaty, had had no claim upon them at all.

"Now, who were the gentlemen who made this decision? They were really the prime minister of France, the prime minister of the United Kingdom, and the President of the United States. And this is all the more remarkable when attention is given to the record of the Japanese Government in dealing with these three powers. To understand this it is necessary to know how the secret treaties between Japan, on the one side, and France and the United Kingdom, on the other side, were obtained. During the course of Germany's submarine warfare there came a moment when it seemed to the admiralties in London and Paris that the percentage of losses was so severe that unless some means could be found of lessening them the war would be lost, owing to the destruction of food supplies and war matériel. In these circumstances the British and French admiralties applied to the admiralty in Tokyo for naval assistance. At this moment Japan was an ally of the two appealing Governments. Moreover, she was the ally who had suffered least of all in the waging of the war. France and the United Kingdom had put their last coin and their last ship, so to speak, into the struggle, and they now appealed to Japan—not to do the same thing at all, but merely to send ships into the Mediterranean in order to help to prevent the loss of war in which they were all allies. Japan's reply was simplicity itself. It was to present the terms of the Shantung secret treaties as the price of her acquiescence. France and the United Kingdom believed that they were unable to resist the demand. Whether they were or not is, so far as the Shantung question is concerned, immaterial. They accepted the terms, and the bond was signed.

"This was before the United States came into the war. When the United States did join the Allies, the United States sent a similar request to Japan for the assistance of cruisers. Japan declined to send these, and send them she never did. In the meantime, however, the seamen of the allied nations had proved equal to the task set them. Admiral Sims's proposal of the convoy system had been agreed to, and the world hardly yet grasps what it owes to Admiral Sims for convincing not only the British Admiralty but the British mercantile marine that it was possible to effect something which stereotyped training had induced both parties to the agreement to regard as almost impractical. In addition to this the depth bomb had been invented, and so in spite of the recalcitrancy of Japan the war was won.

"The war won, the representatives of the various nations arrived at Paris with their treaties in their pockets. Japan produced her secret treaties with France and the United Kingdom, and demanded her pound of flesh. It has been held that a treaty, no matter how gained, is a sacred undertaking, and that the allied nations could not break their treaties with Japan without subjecting themselves to the scorn of the world for treating these treaties as scraps of paper. But the interesting fact is that the allied nations not only did treat as an absolute scrap of paper the treaty between China and Germany, but at the instigation of Japan read into that treaty something which was never contained in it. The treaty between China and Germany expressly declared that the Chinese concessions in Shantung were nontransferable to any other nation. Therefore the treaty between Japan and Germany, by which Germany transferred to Japan her concessions in Shantung, was only another instance of converting a treaty into a scrap of paper. Japan acquired from Germany, by this treaty, something Germany had no power to convey. Yet on this iniquitous transaction is founded the theory of the sacred inviolability of the secret treaties between Japan, France, and the United Kingdom.

"It is evident from all of this that the secret treaties, as well as Japan's treaty with Germany, represented a bond similar to that which Shylock obtained from Antonio. And the comparison is much closer than appears at first sight. It will be remembered that again and again, during the present controversy, much has been made of the fact that Japan has promised to return to China her sovereign rights in Shantung. But those sovereign rights never were transferred from China to Germany, and therefore never could have been transferred by Germany to Japan. And it is exactly here that the comparison to Shylock becomes so peculiarly exact. It will be remembered in the court in Venice, when Shylock pressed his bond, Portia, in the garb of Balthazar, replied:

> "This bond doth give thee here no jot of blood;
> The words expressly are 'a pound of flesh.'

"Now, it is perfectly plain that the bond never gave Japan the sovereign rights of China in Shantung, and therefore that in proposing to return them Japan is in very much the position in which Shylock found himself upon that occasion.

"These, then, are the plain facts of the case. How the allied ministers ever permitted Japan to gain her ends is one of the mysteries of diplomacy, and the mysteries are many. The scales, however, have fallen from the eyes of the world since the gentlemen concerned set their hands and seals to those bonds in Paris. France and the United Kingdom may possibly still think that they are held by the treaties obtained from them during the war. But the Senate of the United States is under no such pressure."

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, no matter how scholarly, no matter how interesting, a discourse may be upon this great problem, it avails little unless it reaches to some conclusion that will settle something besides a mere matter of sentiment.

I do not believe that there is anyone in the Senate who would be pleased to see the German concessions retained permanently by Japan. I do not believe that there is a Senator on the floor who does not agree with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] that the purpose of Japan has been to control China. There is no question but that this little empire, with forty-five millions of people, must necessarily seek some outlet for her population and some territory in which she can expand her commerce. As other countries have pressed westward until the world has been divided up among the greater, more progressive, nations of the world, so Japan, starting in the line of progression very many years behind the western nations, seeks her outlet in China, and we will all agree, Mr. President, that whatever she may gain in China in the absolute control over the industries and commerce of that country may be detrimental to the commerce of the western nations.

But after we have agreed with these propositions, the question still stares us in the face, How are we going to settle it? What are you going to do to wrest this territory from Japan? Does the Senator from Massachusetts believe for a single moment that if we insert the name "China" in articles 156, 157, and 158, in lieu of the name "Japan," that has settled this question? What will be Japan's answer? Her answer will be, "Well, I am here, now what are you going to do about it"? What will be our reply? Will it be war? It must then be war or nothing, and I, Mr. President, am opposed to aiming a gun which is unloaded, and especially so when the party against whom it is aimed knows it is unloaded.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. McCUMBER. If we are not going to do anything in the matter of enforcing what we put into that treaty ourselves, to my mind it is far better, from the standpoint of national honor, as well as from the standpoint of a practical politic, that we do not threaten to do that which we do not intend to carry out. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator asked what we were going to do about it. I suggest that we take it up in unlimited debate.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think that is just how it would end.

Japan says, "We will not agree to this. We not only have a treaty with China, by which China solemnly agreed that the German concessions should be turned over to us, but with an immense cost in blood and treasure have driven the Germans out of China. We hold possession not of the Chinese rights, but we hold possession of rights which China of her own volition, whether through cowardice or not, turned over to Germany. We took them from Germany. We hold them by the power of conquest. Now, who is going to put us out of there by force?"

Will it be Great Britain? No, Mr. President. Great Britain has an agreement with Japan that she will sustain her in her claim.

Will it be France? No. Japan has an agreement with France that France will sustain her.

Will it be Italy? No, Mr. President. Italy has an agreement with Japan that she will sustain her in the holding of these German possessions, these leasehold interests.

Then, we are brought right back to the practical question of what we are going to do, and the only answer that the American people is given is that we will not do anything. We will simply express a dissent, and, Mr. President, that dissent settles nothing.

Mr. President, I maintain there is a better way. Of course, I am a believer in a league of nations to protect the territorial integrity of other nations, and if I can not attain the object through a league of nations by virtue of a treaty I at least have a great deal of faith and confidence in the moral influence of a world freed from the danger of war in compelling a nation to desist from a wrongful purpose. We have something in the treaty between Japan and China by which we have a hold upon Japan. We have an agreement whereby a world league will have a grip upon the situation in such a way that they can say to Japan, "We demand of you that you fulfill your obligations."

This whole objection to the Shantung provisions, Mr. President, is based upon the assumption that Japan will not keep her treaty stipulations. Now, it may be that she will not unless there is some other force bearing upon her to compel her to do so. But I would rather have the force of all of the great nations of the world back of the obligation to return than to leave it in the present chaotic condition, when all in the world that Japan has to do is to stand back upon her dignity and hold what she has secured.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. McCUMBER. Just for a question, Mr. President.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator think that Japan would yield this territory at the request of the league, or would the league——

Mr. McCUMBER. I think she would have to yield it if the league was of any value whatever.

Mr. REED. Or would the league have to use force?

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the league would not have to use force. The knowledge that the power to enforce was there would be sufficient to prevent the attempted wrong.

Mr. REED. If the league would not have to use force after it is organized, why is it that the league, which is now in existence, according to the statements of the proponents of the league, did not use its moral suasion to have Japan do justice at this time?

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, Mr. President——

Mr. REED. If Japan can bluff them now, why can she not bluff them after awhile?

Mr. McCUMBER. Japan can not bluff the world now. Japan is not doing anything further now than simply acting in compliance with her own agreements which she made with Great Britain, with France, with Italy, and also which she made with China herself.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Nobody, so far, is attempting to bluff Japan. No one is in a position to bluff her. But Japan, back of this treaty, made her agreement with China, and if there is any one thing that is made certain in the provisions of this league of nations it is the duty of the great nations of the world to not only themselves inculcate the moral obligation to abide by agreements, but also to compel other nations to faithfully comply with their agreements.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, does the Senator mean to tell the Senate and the country that Japan has a treaty with China entitling her to take over the alleged German rights?

Mr. McCUMBER. Why, certainly.

Mr. REED. That was the one that was secured by force very recently.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, we have gone over that question of securing a treaty by force from China until it seems to me that it is getting somewhat stale. China has not made a treaty in 80 years with these great nations that has not been brought about by coercion.

Mr. REED. And so, I suppose, if we have a league of nations——

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I did not yield for the Senator to make an address. I will let him follow me, if he wishes to do so. If he wishes to ask a question, I will answer it.

Mr. REED. Oh, very well.

Mr. McCUMBER. So far as the question of force is concerned, it applies to every treaty that China has made in the last 80 years. Great Britain obtained her territorial rights in China because of her superior power. France did the same thing. Belgium, Holland, and every other country that has secured any rights whatsoever in China secured them because China did not dare refuse. They secured them, Mr. President, exactly the same way as we secured the open door in Japan 50 or 60 years ago, when we sent Admiral Perry over to Japan, because Japan did not dare refuse. We were too important a power. The fact is, nevertheless, that the treaties remained.

What was the agreement made between Japan and China?

Before China would sign this treaty she demanded a note and an agreement with Japan, which was to be a part of the treaty itself and which did in fact become part of it, and this is what the Japanese minister wrote to the Chinese envoy:

EXCELLENCY: In the name of my Government I have the honor to make the following declaration to the Chinese Government:

When, after the termination of the present war, the leased territory of Kiaochow Bay is completely left to the free disposal of Japan, the Japanese Government will restore the said released territory to China under the following conditions—

Which are named. Then the Chinese minister replied:

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's note of this day's date, in which you make the following declaration in the name of your Government:

"When, after the termination of the present war, the leased territory of Kiaochow Bay is completely left to the free disposal of Japan, the Japanese Government will restore the said leased territory to China under the following conditions."

After that declaration was made by the Japanese representative, reiterated by the Chinese representative so that there should be no error, thereupon the treaty was signed. Therefore these conditions become, morally and in every other respect, a part of the treaty itself between Japan and China.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] just made this declaration:

In all her promises Japan has never fixed a time when she would return the German rights to China.

Is that true? Why, Mr. President, her statement fixes a time as definitely as it is possible for time to be fixed under those conditions. Remember, the war was not over. While Japan had taken possession by conquest of Shantung and had seized all that Germany held in China, the settlement of those German rights must remain inchoate until the treaty of peace, when the nations engaged in that war would determine what disposition should be made of the German rights and German territory.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Has not the President of the United States tried to have Japan state a date, a time when it will fulfill these obligations?

Mr. McCUMBER. And Japan has stated that she will fulfill the obligation in accordance with her promise. What is her promise? Let us read it and see if it answers itself.

Mr. REED. I am trying to get at just one question.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator means has she fixed a day of the month, a day of the week, an hour and a minute, no.

Mr. REED. No; nor the year.

Mr. McCUMBER. Nor the year.

Mr. REED. Nor the decade nor the century.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let us see what she does say. I want the Senator's attention to the language that is used:

When, after the termination of the present war, the leased territory of Kiaochow Bay is completely left to the free disposal of Japan, the Japanese Government will restore the said leased territory to China.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BALL in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. McCUMBER. In just a moment; one at a time.

When will this territory come under the complete right of Japan to dispose of? It will fall under her authority when the treaty is signed, because it is the treaty of peace that determines Japan's right, after all, to hold that territory. It is not under her free disposal until the treaty has been signed, and then there is but one meaning, and that is this, that she will proceed immediately—that does not necessarily mean within the next minute or the next hour or the next day, but as nations act it does mean that she will proceed forthwith to evacuate that territory and return it to China. If she fails to do that she will fail to keep, in good faith, her solemn obligation made with China.

I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. McCORMICK. The Senator from North Dakota, with his ripe experience, judges of the present and future conduct of individuals and peoples by their conduct in the past. Therefore I trust that he will seek to throw a little light on the future conduct of the Japanese in Shantung by some reference to the good faith in which they carried out their solemn and repeated disclaimers, first, to establish a protectorate in Korea and then their denial of an intent to annex Korea.

Mr. McCUMBER. The only difference is now that the Senator from Illinois would leave Japan in a position where she can do in China exactly what she did in Korea. I purpose to bind her to her obligation to return it. The Senator would release her from that obligation by throwing her outside of this treaty entirely. I stated, Mr. President, that with Japan signing this treaty we have got the civilized world with a grip upon her throat to compel her to comply with her agreement. We did not have that with reference to Korea.

Mr. REED and Mr. McCORMICK addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. McCUMBER. I will yield first to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it seems to me the point of difference is this, and I should like to hear the Senator upon it: Japan stole that country. She says now to the world, "Confirm us in our title and after we have been confirmed in our title we will give it back." Some of us say, "We refuse to confirm you in your title; give it back now." That is the difference.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, we get down immediately to the question of dealing with nations. No matter how she got into the war, Japan happened to be our ally in this war.

Mr. McCORMICK. Our associate.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will accept the phrase—our associate in this war, the same as Great Britain and France and Italy. I know, Mr. President, that since the war has practically closed a great many Senators prefer now to consider them as our enemies, and Germany seems to be more an object of solicitude than our friends who helped us to defeat Germany.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I have not taken that view myself. Now, Japan did not take this territory from China. The Senator forgets that Germany had it. Japan did not steal it from China. She took it with her military power in battle. She purchased it with the blood of her soldiers.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Just a minute. I am going to answer the Senator first.

Mr. REED. I want to call the Senator's attention to something he said——

Mr. McCUMBER. No, Mr. President, I will answer the Senator's first question now.

Now, having obtained it in that way, and having declared when she obtained it that she would return it to China, can the Senator see no impropriety whatever in saying to our associate in this war, "We do not trust you, you will not do it, and therefore we will force you to do it without first giving you the opportunity to make good"? There are some of the Japanese people who have a little pride, Mr. President, such as the people of other nations have. They have some feeling in the matter. They have some sense of national pride and honor, notwithstanding any charge that is made to the contrary, because no nation could long continue if it did not have some sense of honor. I would rather trust to that sense of national integrity at the present status and say to Japan, "We do trust you." And even if we do not trust her, we shall at least have the backing of the world nations under the league agreement to force her to comply with her treaty obligations.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield——

Mr. McCUMBER. I will yield for a question.

Mr. REED. I am going to ask a question. I am going to ask if the Senator, a few moments ago, when he said that some Senators were becoming more solicitous about Germany than they were about the rights of our associates, meant that? and if so, I want him to name the Senators.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, there have been a great many arguments on the floor of the Senate, arguments filled with hatred of our principal ally in this great struggle, and all the attempts that we have been making to prevent the adoption of a league of nations have been made upon the assumption that we must so guard ourselves in every particular that there could not be a decision against us even though we were in the wrong. In other words, we must control the situation completely at all times. That has been followed by arguments repeated upon the floor that we were, in effect, by this treaty securing such a grip upon the throat of Germany that we would strangle her to death for all future time.

Mr. REED. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. That is what I meant and that is sufficient for me.

Mr. REED. If the Senator will permit me, because I think it is a somewhat delicate question, I should like the privilege of interjecting a remark——

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not care to argue now. I want to finish my remarks. If the Senator wants to ask a further question, I will try to answer it.

Mr. REED. I want to make a suggestion to go with the statement the Senator has made. The cry of "pro-Germanism" has become very frequent here, generally more by innuendo than by direct statement.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I have not used the cry of pro-Germanism myself.

Mr. REED. The Senator came very near it, but if he wishes to retract it now, I have nothing to say; but if he does not——

Mr. McCUMBER. I have no desire to retract anything I stated.

Mr. REED. If the Senator does not propose to retract, then I propose to invoke the rules of the Senate and to have this matter settled right now.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I have the floor and I decline to yield.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I call the Senator to order.

Mr. McCUMBER. I decline to yield. We will see whether the rules of the Senate will be enforced or not.

Mr. REED. I call the Senator to order.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I decline to yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota has the floor.

Mr. REED. I call the Senator to order under the rules of the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. I decline to yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota has the floor.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I intend to occupy the floor until I close.

Mr. REED. I call the attention of the Chair to the rule of the Senate that when a Senator calls another Senator to order he must take his seat and the question must be settled.

Mr. McCUMBER. No, Mr. President; there is no such rule.

Mr. REED. I call the Senator to order, because——

Mr. McCUMBER. The Chair determines whether or not a Senator has disobeyed the rules of the Senate; the Chair does the calling to order, and not another Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri for a question?

Mr. McCUMBER. I will yield to the Senator from Missouri for a question.

Mr. REED. I am making this point, and I am making it within the rule of the Senate: A Senator can call any other Senator to order, whereupon he must take his seat, and the question of whether he is in order or not must be settled. I did not desire to do that with the Senator. I gave him a chance to explain his language.

Mr. McCUMBER. I yielded for a question.

Mr. REED. I asked the privilege of making a statement; the Senator declined to allow me to do so; and I am unwilling that an insinuation that impugns the honor of the Senate and the loyalty of the Senate shall go unchallenged upon this floor. If the Senator from North Dakota says he did not intend that, that is the end of it; if he stands upon it, I stand upon my point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The rule reads:

No Senator in debate shall, directly or indirectly, by any form of words, impute to another Senator or to other Senators any conduct or motive unworthy or unbecoming a Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. I stand upon that rule at all times, Mr. President. I am also ready to defend myself under that rule at all times.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair decides that the Senator from North Dakota has the floor and will proceed.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then, Mr. President, I will proceed.

Mr. REED. I call the attention of the Chair to paragraph 4 of Rule XIX.

Mr. McCUMBER. I decline to yield.

Mr. REED I am not asking the Senator to yield. I am standing on the floor——

Mr. McCUMBER. I decline to yield. The Chair has ruled that I have the floor, and I intend to hold it. I want the Senator to fully understand that I purpose to stand upon my rights, and the Senator has got some work to do if he takes me off the floor.

Mr. REED. Oh——

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator can not put it off in that way. I fully understand the Senator's purpose. I have not interfered with the Senator in any of the speeches he has ever made upon this floor, and I purpose to exercise my rights in debate.

Mr. REED. I call the attention of the Chair to paragraph 4 of Rule XIX.

Mr. McCUMBER. I decline to yield to the Senator. Let him understand that. I have listened to the Senator, Mr. President, for days and hours, and I have never interfered with him, although I disagreed with him very much. Mr. President, I want to know if I am at liberty to go on without interference?

Mr. ASHURST. Will the Senator yield to me? I rise as an amicus curia.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am always glad to yield for a question, but I will not yield the floor.

Mr. ASHURST. When a Senator calls another Senator to order it is the duty of the Presiding Officer to have the exceptionable language which is asserted to be offensive taken down and read, and after it is taken down and read from the desk, then it is for the Chair to determine whether or not the Senator was in order. Then an appeal lies from the decision of the Chair. That is the method in which such points are determined according to our precedents. The language complained of must be read before there can be any debate.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I submit that a statement——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order. Paragraph 4 of Rule XIX reads:

4. If any Senator, in speaking or otherwise, transgress the rules of the Senate, the Presiding Officer shall, or any Senator may, call him to order; and when a Senator shall be called to order he shall sit down, and not proceed without leave of the Senate.

So the Senator from North Dakota will yield until the words used by him to which the Senator from Missouri objected shall have been read.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I submit that the rule does not require the reading of the words. The Chair, I submit, must first pass upon the question as whether the rule has been infracted, if he recollects the words. If the Chair remembers the words, then obviously there would be no necessity of having them read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is going to insist on having the words read, as the Chair does not remember them.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Secretary is a better reader than I am, and I shall be very glad to have him read them.

Mr. REED. I have no desire to interrupt the Senator, but——

Mr. ASHURST. The question is not debatable.

Mr. REED. I am going to make a statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order. The words will be read.

Mr. REED. I am perfectly willing to withdraw the point and to let the Senator from North Dakota proceed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point is withdrawn and the Senator from North Dakota has the floor.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I should like to have the Reporter read what I said.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Reporter will read as requested.

The Reporter read as follows:

No matter how she got into the war, Japan happened to be our ally in this war.

Mr. McCORMICK. Our associate.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will accept the phrase—our associate in this war, the same as Great Britain and France and Italy. I know, Mr. President, that since the war has practically closed, a great many Senators prefer now to consider them as our enemies, and Germany seems to be more an object of solicitude than our friends who helped us to defeat Germany.

Mr. McCUMBER. That seems awful, Mr. President, does it not?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, since the Senator will not permit the withdrawal of the point, I ask the ruling of the Chair on the point as to whether or not that does not impugn the honor and the loyalty of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will sustain the point of order raised by the Senator from Missouri that the words which have been read do impugn the motives of some Senators in this body.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, may I go on?

Mr. REED. In order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the Senator may proceed.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I presume that everyone has his own views as to what constitutes an impugning of honor, and so forth. I have mine, and any remarks that have been made from any source have not changed my view.

Mr. President, there is a provision in the league of nations covenant itself to which I wish to call attention. One of the great requirements imposed by the covenant of the league of nations on the members of the league is a—scrupulous respect for all treaty obligations in the dealings of organized peoples with one another.

Does that mean nothing? Has it no significance? I think it has. So we have this condition: In 1898 Germany seized this territory from China and compelled China to acquiesce in her demands. Thus she obtained these rights. In 1914, or early in 1915, the German concessions were seized by Japan, not from China, but from Germany herself. What then happened? Great Britain, France, and Italy entered into an agreement with Japan that they would support her in holding possession of whatever she took from Germany. Japan was not satisfied with that, and also secured a similar agreement from China. I admit it was through coercion, just as the German rights were obtained through coercion; there is no question as to coercion in either case, and one act was as binding as the other; but the agreement between Great Britain, Italy, and France and Japan was not secured through coercion or duress. They agreed to sustain Japan. Now, the whole question resolves itself into a practical one.

If Japan refuses to turn the territory over to China, will Great Britain sustain Japan in that position? Will Italy and France sustain her? No one for a single moment doubts that they will. Then, if we will assume that we are not going to sustain her, we are brought right back to the simple proposition of what we are going to do. Will we go to war to compel Japan to return this leasehold interest to China? We know that we will not. Every Senator who has spoken here against the league of nations has made his plea upon the ground that we will not send American soldiers to die in a foreign country to establish or maintain the countries of the Old World. We will not send our soldiers to Europe 3,000 miles away; and, Mr. President, if we will not do that, certainly we will not send them to China 8,000 miles away. What will we do? I will tell you what we can do and what we ought to do. Instead of helping China break her contract and thereby driving Japan out of the league—because Japan never could honorably accept the amendment which is proposed—we could say to Japan as a member of the league, as one of the signatory parties to the agreement, "You have declared that you will return this German leasehold to China; you did not declare that you would do so 5 years or 50 years from now, but you said that you would return it when it came into your power to do so; and the moment this treaty is signed the power to perform your obligation is in existence, and we expect you to perform it."

Now, suppose Japan says, "I will not do it." What will follow? China, under the terms of the league of nations, can immediately file her complaint with the council, declaring that Japan fails to perform her obligations, in that she fails and refuses to return the Shantung rights to China as she agreed to in her note to China of May 25, 1915.

The result of her refusal means war, and we call upon the machinery of the league of nations to prevent the war by compelling Japan to fulfill her duty.

The Senator from Missouri asked me if I thought Japan would comply with that, after knowing what her history has been in Korea. I replied yes, because she has the world against her to compel her to do it, whereas she only had helpless China and Korea against her on the other occasions. That, Mr. President, is why I believe that it is by far the better policy to ask China to come into this league with clean hands and an unbroken record, to ask Japan to come before the league of nations exactly in the same way, and then to keep her hands clean by complying with her obligations.

Nor do we stop there. Once this treaty is signed, once this obligation is entered into between all the nations of the world, then we have the right, under the treaty and under the league of nations covenant, to compel any nation to conform to its provisions, and the principal provision of the league is that no nation shall unlawfully and by force hold the territory of another nation. That is all that we can expect in this case, Mr. President.

Just one word, and I close.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] stated that Japan has made only her unwritten promise.

Mr. President, I can not agree that it is an unwritten promise. The promise is signed by both the Japanese and the Chinese ministers, and it is in writing, and it is specific, and the promise is clear and unequivocal. I would rather have Japan a member of this league with the world against her if she fails in her duty than to leave her alone, because the moment we drive Japan out of this treaty and out of this league by the suggested amendments Japan will say to the world. "I will hold this territory by right of conquest," and the world is not going to dispossess her.

Nor is that all. The moment this treaty is signed, it means for China, first, the return of Shantung, and, secondly, that the world will guard her territory in the future. Now, I want to give her that security. I believe this league assurance will be worth more to China than the mere expression of a sentiment on the part of the United States that "we think Japan stole this territory from China," or that "Japan is not entitled to this German leasehold interest."

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, I should like to invite his attention to the fact that in addition to the written promise to which the Senator has just referred there is another promise, perhaps not in writing signed by the parties, and yet it is in writing, and I think it has the significance and implication of a written document. The minutes of those who participated in the peace conference reveal, as I am advised, that there was a promise made by Japan to restore to China the German concessions, and the minutes record that promise upon the part of Japan; and the minutes, I believe, are signed by the representatives of the powers.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not understand, Mr. President, that the minutes were signed. I do not think there is any question whatever but that Japan made the declaration. The President of the United States, who was present on the occasion, so declares; and the officials of Japan have again and again asserted, since that time, that they intended to keep sacred that obligation.

Just one other word, Mr. President.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] states that he thinks the German treaty was abrogated by the act of war. That would be absolutely true provided the German rights had not been transferred to Japan long before China went into this war on paper. I do not think it is in the mouth of China to say, "I transferred the German rights to Japan, and after I had transferred the German rights to Japan, and after Japan had seized them from Germany, I declared war on Germany, and thereby became reinstated with what I had transferred before I declared this war."

I agree, Mr. President, with all that the Senator has said with reference to the coercion that was used in this treaty, and I have no doubt but that the treaty will be complied with in all its terms, provided we keep Japan in a position where we can compel her to keep the treaty; and we can do that the moment she becomes a final party to the league. She may sign it before we do; but if we send it back to her changed, it ceases to be a treaty so far as Japan is concerned, and she would either have to agree to it or else she would have to repudiate it; and if she repudiated it she would stay out of the league, and, released of the league contract, with hand on the throat of China, with no power in a position to loosen her grip.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, nothing is more unpleasant to me than to get into an altercation with a brother Senator. When I asked the Senator from North Dakota to permit me to call his attention to the words he had spoken, which in my judgment impugned the integrity of Senators, if he had allowed me to call his attention to those words and had said that he did not mean to cast any reflection upon the loyalty of Members of the Senate, that would have closed the incident, and that was the way I had hoped it would be closed. But he declined to do that, and let his words stand. Simply in order that they might not go to the country unchallenged I resorted to the somewhat drastic method of calling the Senator to order.

I have the highest regard for the Senator from North Dakota, and maintain for him a personal regard. I did not want to interrupt him in his speech; I had no such thought, but I can not allow statements which impugn the honesty of purpose of men who are opposed to this league to go unchallenged.

I think the Senator from North Dakota, with the heat of debate upon him, said some things he did not mean; and I would have passed that, but other similar expressions have been made. There are a good many people who seem to think that those who differ from them on this league of nations are very bad men, very wicked men; that it is a species of heresy not to be willing to surrender the sovereignty of the United States into the hands of the representatives of a lot of foreign governments. I hope this debate can proceed without attacking the motives of men, because if it ever comes to an exchange of the kind of compliments the Senator indulged in, those who stand for the absolute national integrity of this Republic, who refuse to place it in any respect under the command or power of foreign potentates, can well place their loyalty, their love of country, their patriotism alongside of those who are willing to set up an international tribunal which, according to the language of the Senator himself, just uttered, has the right to compel nations to obey its will.

It is all well enough to talk about a league of nations compelling Japan to do what it ought to do; but it must be borne in mind that if the league of nations has the power to compel Japan to do what it ought to do, the same body has the power to compel the United States of America to do what it ought to do; and since that body is a law unto itself, and determines every one of these questions for itself, and settles for itself what it believes to be right and what it may believe to be wrong, it follows that a body having the power to compel America to do what it ought to do is a body which has the power to compel America to do what that body thinks America ought to do.

In other words, by the plain confession and statement of the Senator, the league of nations is a supergovernment, having the power to determine what America shall do and what America shall not do. So that instead of America determining that question for herself, as she has in the past, she must yield her right as a sovereign to determine for herself to a body composed of foreigners, and when a question comes up for determination in which America is a party, America does not sit—not a single living man who has sworn allegiance to the Republic sits. The case is determined by a body of foreigners. Questions that now are to be determined by the Congress of the United States and by the President, and ultimately by the people of the United States, are thus transferred to a body of men who owe us no allegiance, who may possess for us no disposition of fairness. So that when the Senator from North Dakota asserts, as he has asserted, that the league of nations can compel Japan to do what the league of nations says is right, under this treaty, that statement carries with it the unquestioned conclusion that they can compel the United States to do what they determine the United States should do.

Mr. President, there may be men who are willing to put the neck of Uncle Sam in that sort of noose, to throw the rope over a beam, and to place the other end of it in the hands of our ancient enemies, with permission to pull, pull, pull as long as they please. As for me, as long as I have breath and God gives me the power I shall say that the destiny of this Republic shall remain in the hands of the American people alone.

This brings me, Mr. President, to an analysis of statements that we frequently hear made. We hear it said that the league of nations will compel the right thing to be done, that the league of nations has the power to compel right to be done in this world; and the assumption is made in all these arguments that the league of nations will always discern the right and always with infallibility do justice and equity.

Gentlemen seem to forget that the power to decide a question and to apply coercion to carry out the decision, which is what the Senator from North Dakota has now plainly stated will always be exercised with infallible righteousness, carries with it the power to decide it wrong, and that there is no earthly tribunal that has ever been set up that is capable of always rendering a righteous decision. It is true, we must submit ordinary earthly controversies between individuals to earthly tribunals. But to what kind of tribunals? We submit them in our land to a jury summoned from the body of the county, from the vicinage; to a judge learned in the law and selected with reference to his impartiality, his wisdom, and his probity of character. They are submitted under a code of laws written by ourselves and for ourselves. Appeals lie from the nisi prius or trial courts to the appellate tribunals. It all must be done in the open.

Finally, as a shield over all, is the Constitution of the United States, under which the rights of a citizen may be protected even so far as the Supreme Court of the United States itself. And in all these controversies no juror can sit who has a prejudice or an interest, and no judge can sit who has a prejudice or an interest. The tribunal is selected with reference to its impartiality; and, too, it is a tribunal not only learned in and governed by our law but it is a tribunal trained to our methods of thought, to our ideals, to our religion; and all these elements enter into every case that is tried by a tribunal of our land. Yet, how often does justice miscarry, and how frequently is it found that errors, both of law and of fact, have crept in to bring a tragic end to what ought to have been a triumphant acquittal of justice.

Let me compare that, sir, if you please, with this league of nations. Let me very briefly point out why a league of nations not only is not likely to do justice, but why it can not do justice. I undertake to prove that the most impossible tribunal that ever was set up in the world is this tribunal called the league of nations. I care not, sir, whether you have resort to the council, dominated by five great powers, or whether you have resort to the assembly, where the representatives of 32 States sit.

In the first place, there is no law under which this tribunal convenes. There is no code, no statutory law laid down prescribing the rights of litigants. There is no constitution written that circumscribes or binds the powers of this assembly. There is no bill of rights for the individual nations. Since that day in 1215 when King John was forced to sign the Magna Charta, democracies and self-governing peoples have circumscribed their rulers with constitutions, bills of rights, and legal restrictions all tending toward governments of laws, such as the Government of the United States, and not governments of men, such as are the monarchies. Yet this covenant which is to make the world safe for democracy does away with all of these tenets of democracy and sets up a government of men and not a government of laws. There is a covenant, so called, by which the various nations enter into this tribunal, and, having entered, submit their various controversies and questions to the arbitrament or decision of various members of the tribunal, gathered either in the assembly or in the council.

Is either of those judicial in its character? That was the dream and thought that many men had who talked about settling world controversies without wars. But, sir, they are not judicial. They are political. Every man who sits upon either of these tribunals is the representative of a foreign Government. He owes no allegiance to anybody on earth except his own Government. It sets him up and it pulls him down at will. He does not need to be learned in any law; indeed, there is no code of laws for him to follow, for the laws of the various countries under which these men live differ as much as the color of skin and as the character of religions. They have no common code of law, no common code of morals, no common system of religion, and no common method of thought.

They come there, an aggregation from every part of the world—from India, from Siam, from the Hedjaz, from Liberia, from Haiti, from Ecuador, from Great Britain, and from all the other countries—each with his own ideas of right and wrong, each with his own conceptions of what is moral or immoral; and I remark, by way of parenthesis, that I have no doubt that every Jap believes that it is a duty to his country and a duty to his god, if he has one, to grab every inch of Chinese territory the moment the opportunity is so afforded.

This league of nations does not even acknowledge as its guide what has been heretofore called international law. You can not find in the entire covenant of the league of nations a codification of international law, or a recognition of what are its fundamental principles.

So that these men come in as the representatives of different kinds of governments, of different kinds of people, of ideals that are the antithesis of each other, and of codes of morals that are as different as day is from night. They come there, I repeat, not as judges of courts, not as men sworn to uphold the law or to bring forth equity, but they come as the representatives of their respective governments. I affirm now that it is my opinion that not one of these men who ever voted against the interests of his own government, no matter how just might be his vote, would ever dare go home again to his people.

Is it possible on any great international question that you can imagine to find this tribunal unbiased, as you expect a court to be? I will defy any Member of this Senate to point to a single great international question where substantially every nation of the earth does not have a selfish interest. Point me now to one, if you can. And in many of these cases they have a common interest against the United States.

Suppose the question were to be raised again of the Panama Canal tolls, and suppose that America were to assert what I believe to be her undoubted right, the right to open that canal to her own vessels, sailing under her own flag, without the payment of any toll. Suppose Great Britain were to protest and summon us as a litigant to the bar of either the council or the assembly, and Great Britain, being a direct party complainant, and the United States, being a direct party defendant, could not take their seats at the council table and the trial would proceed, let us say, before the council. France has an interest in free tolls, for if tolls are not free for her as they are for America her interest is exactly the interest of Great Britain in character if not in degree——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Let me finish my sentence.

Japan owns vessels. She has the same interest that Great Britain has. Italy possesses a maritime fleet, and she has an interest, as Great Britain has. Belgium, Greece, Spain—every one of those nations has an interest identical with the interest of Great Britain, yet they are not parties litigant and they can sit and vote, and would sit and vote, in the interest of their own nations. Does that bear any resemblance to a court? And yet it is to this tribunal, composed of interested parties, composed of foreigners, that we propose to submit great national questions.

I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I think the Senator's illustration is unfortunate. We would not be summoned to such a tribunal in such case. We have arbitration treaties with Great Britain that cover exactly such a case, and those arbitration treaties remain in force under the terms of the league of nations.

Mr. REED. The Senator's defense now to this infamous proposition is that in this instance we have treaties. He does not dare bring his case to the tribunal. He pleads that it will be decided by another tribunal and that we escape the inequities of such a decision as would be rendered by this interested tribunal, because, fortunately, we have a treaty that enables us to have an arbitration which may bear some faint resemblance to a proceeding in a court of justice.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Just a moment. The plea is like every plea I have heard from the lips of every man who undertakes to defend this document. It is a plea of confession and avoidance. They say, "What you say is true, but in this particular instance the league is not allowed to act." However, I call the Senator's attention to the fact that England, notwithstanding her arbitration treaty, can put us into the council at any time by a complaint. It is so written in the instrument.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. England can do nothing to us that we can not do to England.

Mr. REED. Oh, yes; she can. She has the votes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. England promises nothing that we do not promise. England incurs no obligations that we do not incur. They are purely reciprocal.

The purpose for which I interrupted the Senator was to show that these assertions about cases being brought before the council in this way are based absolutely upon entire ignorance of the document. The document contemplates arbitration. The document provides for arbitration. The league of nations is an extension of the idea of arbitration. We have led other nations in arbitration. We have urged arbitration, and the league of nations simply carries the proposition further. When the Senator says——

Mr. REED. If this is a question, go ahead.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. When the Senator says England would bring such a case as that against us before the council, it simply shows that he does not understand the thing at all. Great Britain would not. We would not. We would arbitrate the matter, just as we are bound by many treaties, not only with Great Britain but with other nations, to do.

Mr. REED. Now, Mr. President, it is too bad, really, that somewhere along the dark shadowy course of my intellectual existence I did not fall under the sunlight of the Senator's intelligence so that I might gain knowledge from him. But I happen to have read the covenant of the league of nations, and while I may be mistaken about anything, I affirm that there is not a first-class lawyer anywhere on earth who will take that document and say that we could not be compelled to try the case in the league. The language is plain. The various nations agree to submit to arbitration or to the council, and then the provision follows that either party can remove the case from the council to the assembly. While the Senator is talking about ignorance, I simply suggest to him that he read the document himself.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator deny that if Great Britain had such a controversy with us she would call it up under the arbitration treaties now in existence?

Mr. REED. I say Great Britain can call it up under the arbitration treaty or she can call it up under the league covenant.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; she can only call it up under the arbitration treaty. That is the only way she can call it up.

Mr. REED. I say more than that. All the Senator would succeed in doing, if he made that plea good, would be to defend against the league, not by answering my argument, but by saying in this particular instance we are not obliged to submit ourselves to this fearful instrumentality which you have set up, dominated by European and Asiatic countries.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator desire to misquote me? I have not said that. I said the council was not designed for such a purpose, and when he states that it was designed to pass on such questions, he shows that he does not understand it.

Mr. REED. I shall not characterize our distinguished Democratic leader as ignorant, as he characterizes me so often, and I repeat that it is my misfortune not to have sat at his feet and learned wisdom, but I thought I had an understanding of the English language.

Article 12. The members of the league agree that if there should arise between them any dispute likely to lead to a rupture, they will submit the matter either to arbitration or to inquiry by the council——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Has the Senator read it all?

Mr. REED. I am reading it. If you will wait long enough, I will read it all.

And they agree in no case to resort to war until three months after the award by the arbitrators or the report by the council.

In any case under this article the award of the arbitrators shall be made within a reasonable time, and the report of the council shall be made within six months after the submission of the dispute.

Article 13. The members of the league agree that whenever any dispute shall arise between them which they recognize to be suitable for submission to arbitration and which can not be satisfactorily settled by diplomacy, they will submit the whole subject matter to arbitration.

And for this purpose the court of arbitration to which the case is referred shall be the court agreed upon by the parties to the dispute or stipulated in any convention existing between them.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him there?

Mr. REED. I will let the Senator interrupt me in a moment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But I want to interrupt the Senator at that point.

Mr. REED. All right, since I am to learn.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The quotation which the Senator has just read is that the nations agree that if a question should arise which they agree should be submitted to arbitration, it shall be arbitrated. The Senator knows that Great Britain and the United States have already agreed that this is one of the questions which should be settled by arbitration, and yet he lugs in the statement that it is to be settled by the council.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Nebraska will not wait until I get through. If he does, he will see where he comes out. He will come out of the hole he went into.

Article 13 says:

For the consideration of any such dispute the court of arbitration to which the case is referred shall be the court agreed on by the parties to the dispute or stipulated in any convention existing between them.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is already existing.

Mr. REED. Can the Senator wait a minute?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; I can not. That is just what I am calling attention to.

Mr. REED. I understood what the Senator called my attention to, and his remarks actually penetrated my mind. I really understand what the Senator means.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I congratulate the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I ought to be congratulated, because it requires a great deal of brain power to always follow the Senator when he walks in such a high line. I continue reading:

The members of the league agree that they will carry out in full good faith any award that may be rendered, and that they will not resort to war against a member of the league which complies therewith. In the event of any failure to carry out such an award, the council shall propose what steps should be taken to give effect thereto.

Now let us go back.

Article 12 provides, as I have said—that if there should arise any dispute likely to lead to a rupture, they will submit the matter either to arbitration or to inquiry by the council.

Article 13 has to do with the question of arbitration. It is proposed there that there shall be arbitration. Let us see whether either party has to accept arbitration:

ART. 14. The council shall formulate and submit to the members of the league for adoption plans for the establishment of a permanent court of international justice. The court shall be competent to hear and determine any dispute of an international character which the parties thereto submit to it.

It shall have the power to determine any matter which the parties recognize as suitable to submit to it for arbitration under the foregoing article.

We may have a tribunal of arbitration or court of arbitration up to this point, but you have agreed in advance to go either to the court of arbitration or to the council. Now I come to article 15:

If there should arise between members of the league any dispute likely to lead to a rupture which is not submitted to arbitration in accordance with article 13—

That is, if one of the parties refuses to arbitrate—the members of the league agree that they will submit the matter to the council.

All any nation has to do is just to decline to arbitrate, and it goes to the council. Then—

Any party to the dispute—

may effect such submission by giving notice of the existence of the dispute to the secretary general, who will make all necessary arrangements for a full investigation and consideration thereof.

For this purpose the parties to the dispute will communicate to the secretary general, as promptly as possible, statements of their case with all the relevant facts and papers, and the council may forthwith direct the publication thereof.

The council shall endeavor to effect a settlement of the dispute, and if such efforts are successful a statement shall be made public giving such facts and explanations regarding the dispute and the terms of settlement thereof as the council may deem appropriate.

If the dispute is not thus settled the council either unanimously or by a majority vote shall make and publish a report containing a statement of the facts of the dispute and the recommendations which are deemed just and proper in regard thereto.

Now, we have had a dispute about the tolls. Great Britain declines to arbitrate. We go to the council, for it is the only place we could go, or they simply went to the council in the first instance by serving their notice. Nobody can deny that who is candid. I continue reading from article 15:

Any member of the league represented on the council may make public a statement of the facts of the dispute and of its conclusions regarding the same.

If a report by the council is unanimously agreed to by the members thereof other than the representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute—

I call attention to that because the Senate has been told and the country has been told that in no case can we be bound unless we vote against ourselves; but the decision binds if it is unanimous, except for the parties to the dispute who are excluded from sitting.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Binds us to what?

Mr. REED. Binds us to their decision. I will read to the Senator what it binds us to.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It binds us to what?

Mr. REED. To whatever they decide.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; it merely binds us not to go to war; that is all——

Mr. REED. Let us see if that is all.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is all we are bound to under the league of nations.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, of course, I am willing to indulge the Senator to any extent, but we ought not merely to get into a general conversation. However, I am not going to shut off his interruptions. The covenant reads:

If a report by the council is unanimously agreed to by the members thereof other than the representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute, the members of the league agree that they will not go to war with any party to the dispute which complies with the recommendations of the report.

Certainly the obligation not to go to war is there. If the decision is unanimous against us, we agree not to go to war; if it is unanimous against England, then they agree not to go to war; but if it is not unanimous, either party can go to war if it wants to. The only thing that can prevent war is a unanimous decision; so that all that is necessary to deluge this world in blood under this beneficent theory is one negative vote.

If the council fails to reach a report which is unanimously agreed to by the members thereof, other than the representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute, the members of the league reserve to themselves the right to take such action as they shall consider necessary for the maintenance of right and justice.

Suppose we took a question to the council; and suppose Great Britain felt cocky enough to try to whip Uncle Sam; and suppose that when we got into council one of Great Britain's pawns or dummy directors, sitting on that council, voted "no," and there was not a unanimous decision; what would at once result? Suppose that Greece, that has been Great Britain's chattel ever since Greece was set up, or Spain, that hates the United States with a hatred as deadly as was ever felt, because we reduced her to a fourth-rate power, or that Belgium, absolutely under the control and domination of Great Britain, or that France—and I would say nothing harsh of France; indeed, I desire to say nothing harsh of any of these nations—but suppose that France, dependent for her very life upon the British Navy and the British Army, should under British influence vote nay, thus making a nonunanimous decision—a hung jury, if you please—then the world would be free to go to war.

I have been led aside, but I think we shall hear very little more of the contention that all cases can not be forced into the council. If I cared to read further—and merely for the sake of continuity I think I will put it in—I could show that the case can go to the assembly:

The council may in any case under this article refer the dispute to the assembly. The dispute shall be so referred at the request of either party to the dispute, provided that such request be made within 14 days after the submission of the dispute to the council.

Either party can send a dispute over the Panama Canal tolls to the assembly by simply serving notice—a mere request. Yet you tell me that that is a matter for arbitration. I repeat it is a singular thing——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Just a moment. It is a very singular thing that every time one presents the enormities and dangers of this league of nations some Senator gets up and makes the plea of impotence for his league. He either pleads, as the Senator from Nebraska now does, that in this particular case we have a treaty of arbitration and hence we may have the benefits of arbitration instead of a decision by the league, or he pleads, as has been the case, that we can not be bound except with our consent; that it requires unanimous action; whereas every man who has read the league covenant and read it intelligently knows that in all that vast mass of cases where we are directly concerned, where the life of our own Nation may be at stake, we do not sit; that we are voiceless, silent; like a prisoner at the bar or a litigant in the courts, we have no right to take part in the decision whatever the nature of the cases that are thus to be referred.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator from Missouri think we ought to take part in the decision of our own disputes?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). The Chair will call the attention of the Senator from Nebraska to the fact that the rule requires a Senator desiring to interrupt a Senator who is on the floor to first address the Chair.

Mr. REED. I may be very old-fashioned, but I think, sir, as an American citizen, that when the fathers set up this Republic they set up a Government by the American people, in which the American people as sovereigns proposed to decide every question for themselves. Before the Revolution questions were decided by the mandate of an English King. Under the league of nations they will be decided by an English King and his satellites; or, if not by him, by monarchs of other countries who are not as good or as enlightened as he. That is exactly where the Senator from Nebraska and I differ. He thinks the United States ought to submit questions vital to its interests to a tribunal of foreigners; I think it should never submit such questions to any tribunal but a tribunal of American citizens. That is the difference between an internationalist and a nationalist.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. REED. I have not yielded the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair asked the Senator from Missouri if he yielded to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. REED. Oh, yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator started out with the proposition that if a dispute arose between the United States and Great Britain with regard to the Panama Canal tolls the matter would be taken jurisdiction of by the council of the league of nations.

Mr. REED. I said it could be taken jurisdiction of by the council.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I called the Senator's attention to the fact that we have made several treaties with Great Britain with regard to the Panama Canal and the tolls on that canal, and that we also have an arbitration treaty with Great Britain which provides that we shall arbitrate matters arising out of treaty construction. I also directed his attention to the fact that the league of nations contemplates that all such questions shall be settled by arbitration when the nations have committed themselves to arbitration. Yet the Senator persists in saying that he correctly gave an illustration of what might be submitted to the council.

Now, I want to say to the Senator that I am not entering any plea of confession and avoidance. I say that as to the matters which can properly be submitted to the council it is exactly the body that should pass upon them; and I say the covenant of the league of nations provides that some questions shall be submitted to arbitration, that other questions shall be submitted to inquiry, and that when the council reaches a decision unanimously all it can compel the losing nation to do is not to go to war. It does not inflict any other penalty upon the losing nation. That is for the preservation of peace.

The Senator takes the position here that where a dispute arises between the United States and another country the United States should sit as a judge in the case. Our whole course of arbitration has been that where a dispute arises between the United States and another country some other authority—a disinterested authority—should be called in to decide the case; and I am amazed that the Senator has taken the position that in an international question involving a controversy between two countries each country should decide for itself and should go to war if an agreement can not be reached.

Mr. REED. Oh, the Senator has war on the brain. He had war on the brain when, after the Lusitania had been sunk, after Belgium had been invaded, after German atrocities had been committed, after the democracy of the world was in danger, if it ever was, he introduced a bill here to stop the shipment of arms to the Allies, well knowing that if this bill had passed Germany would soon have been thundering at the gates of Paris and that England and France would have been compelled to capitulate.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator assert that I introduced any such bill as that after the Lusitania had been sunk?

Mr. REED. That is my understanding.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, the Senator's understanding is just about as accurate as it generally is.

Mr. REED. And the Senator's temper is about as good as it has been since he has become our distinguished leader.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like the Senator to correct that statement in his speech, because I did not introduce such a bill after the Lusitania had been sunk.

Mr. REED. If the Senator says he introduced it before the Lusitania was sunk, I will accept his statement. I am speaking only from memory.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will tell the Senator when I introduced that bill.

Mr. REED. Very well; when was it?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I introduced it on the first day that it was possible to do so after the war began.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Which was, as I recall, on the 2d of December, 1914.

Mr. REED. December—well, the war began in August.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And the Lusitania certainly was not sunk for almost a year thereafter.

Mr. REED. Very well; let us disregard the Lusitania. The armies of Germany, however, with iron heel, were upon the breast of Belgium, and with their forces marching upon Paris had already written the story of Germany's intent, and all the world knew that if the bill passed England, without sufficient arms or equipment and without sufficient food, and France, similarly situated, could not maintain the conflict. I do not think it lies in the Senator's mouth to lecture anybody.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I insist upon having accuracy maintained.

Mr. REED. I am allowing the Senator to put in his own dates, and have withdrawn my statement regarding the Lusitania. The Lusitania was sunk a little later than that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The mistake which the Senator makes is in accordance with the reckless statements he is making as to the meaning of the league of nations, reckless statements which he has made all over the country.

Mr. REED. I will print the Senator's bill referred to and the dates of its introduction and the sinking of the Lusitania later in my remarks, so that there can be no dispute about it. I will simply say to the Senator from Nebraska that I am as accurate as he is about anything; that I come pretty near being able to read a document and understand it as well as he does; and I say that when he says that I have made reckless and loose statements, he does not know what he is talking about. I say that every controversy of an international character can be thrown into the council, and finally into the assembly, for decision.

Let us see what they say are questions suitable for decision:

> The members of the league agree that whenever any dispute shall arise between them which they recognize to be suitable for submission to arbitration, and which can not be satisfactorily settled by diplomacy, they will submit the whole subject matter to arbitration.
> Disputes as to the interpretation of a treaty, as to any question of international law, as to the existence of any fact which if established would constitute a breach of any international obligation, or as to the extent and nature of the reparation to be made for any such breach, are declared to be among those which are generally suitable for submission to arbitration.

I go back now, and I read again the statement that—

> The members of the league agree that if there should arise between them any dispute likely to lead to a rupture, they will submit the matter either to arbitration or to inquiry by the council.

Again I read that—

> If there should arise between members of the league any dispute likely to lead to a rupture, which is not submitted to arbitration in accordance with article 13, the members of the league agree that they will submit the matter to the council.

So that all any nation has to do to escape arbitration and to get into the council is simply to decline to arbitrate, and the only place left is the council; and after the council, of course, the assembly. What is the use of denying plain language? What use is there in Senators trying to escape a fact of that kind?

There is not a lawyer in this body who does not know that if he were the adviser of a nation he would quickly tell them, if they wanted to escape arbitration and could get favorable action in the council, to decline arbitration, simply fail to agree on arbitrators, simply say you did not want to submit the matter to arbitration, simply say you did not think it was a question that ought to be submitted to anybody, whereupon the other body has the right to summon you before the council, just as you summon a man to court. There can not be any dispute about that. Dodging and twisting will do no good. The American people will finally know the truth about this document.

I have been led far afield. Suppose that the Senator is right. Suppose that in this case, because we have an arbitration treaty, we could escape being brought into this tribunal, and could insist upon arbitration—a thing that I utterly deny. The plea, in the first place, is a plea bottomed upon the fact that the Senator recognizes arbitration as vastly superior to this wonderful creation that is to settle all the ills of mankind. It is an admission that this great and wonderful and miraculous thing is not as good as old-fashioned arbitration. If so, in the name of God—and I say it reverently—why substitute it for arbitration, if it is as good as you claim? You simply can not meet the question, because I bring you sharply to the point where the entire tribunal is bound to be prejudiced.

But, suppose, sir, that this dispute does not arise over the Panama Canal between us and Great Britain. Suppose that Japan—the secret friend of Great Britain, the country with which Great Britain trades under the table, making treaties which she conceals from us at the very time her representatives stand upon that rostrum and invite us into the war—suppose Japan raises the question, instead of Great Britain. Now you have a beautiful question to settle. Great Britain sits on the council. She has already raised this question with us once, but she is not a party to the dispute; and so she sits, and every other nation that sits there in that Panama Canal question has a direct interest in the controversy, although it is not a party. Do you say that that bears any resemblance whatever to a court? Japan can raise that question, France can raise that question, because the treaty which England claims exists with reference to the Panama Canal and the tolls thereon is a treaty made in such language that every nation of the world can claim the benefit of it. Why, Liberia, if she has a boat, could claim a right to bring the question before this body. She could claim it without a boat, for she is interested in commerce.

Mr. President, let me follow this a moment. I have taken the question of Panama Canal tolls. Let me assume another question. Let us assume that a question arises with reference to the Suez Canal. What that question may be, we can not tell. You can not imagine a question involving the freedom of the Suez Canal, or the conditions upon which commerce shall pass through it, that does not directly interest every nation that owns a boat sailing the ocean; and every man who sits upon this tribunal, whether it be as a member of the council or a member of the assembly, will represent a nation having a direct and absolute interest in the case one way or the other. I repeat, it is so with relation to all international questions.

Let us take the question of the Dardanelles. It is an interesting fact that Great Britain for many years has assisted the Turk to hold control of the Dardanelles. It was always a mystery to me that at the crucial moment, when the Turk seemed about to go under, the powerful arm of Great Britain was reached out to rescue him. What will happen now, under this new condition, I can not say; but when one goes back to ascertain the reason for Great Britain's defense of the Turk it is found in the fundamental fact that Great Britain preferred to have the Turk control the Dardanelles rather than to have Russia control the Dardanelles. Why? Because if Russia had ever acquired the complete control of the Dardanelles, that vast territory which Russia holds and which is contiguous to the waters that are open through the Bosporus and Dardanelles and Sea of Marmora would have been open to world commerce, and a population could have been propagated there so great that the British feared them.

Suppose, now, the question comes up in regard to the opening of the Dardanelles. England, with her vast commerce, and with Russia lying contiguous, has a direct interest. France has a direct interest. But Serbia, the Balkan States, Austria, the new Poland, and all of these countries have a much more direct and immediate interest; and even the United States, far off as we are, has an interest. When that question comes up for decision it therefore can not be decided by a disinterested tribunal, for every man who sits will sit there with the knowledge that his own people and his own country have a direct and immediate interest.

Let me take up another question—the Adriatic. The problem of the Adriatic is a thousand years old. What is the real question back of the Fiume dispute? It is not the rights of certain nationals living in that city. It is the importance of that port with reference to the entire trade of the Adriatic. There are certain promontories, certain positions along the Adriatic, that in the hands of a great power would give it the same control over that sea, enabling it to close or open that sea at will, that Great Britain has over the Mediterranean. And so if that question ever arises before a league of nations, and you summon in the council to try it, there would sit there an Englishman with a direct interest, a Frenchman with a direct interest, and, if Austria is admitted, an Austrian with a very direct interest, an Italian with a direct and immediate interest, a Polander with a direct and immediate interest, and so on down the line. If you get into the assembly, everybody is interested; and if you stay in the council, everybody is alike interested.

This does not bear any resemblance to a court of justice. It is as far removed from a court of justice as day is removed from night; and yet many of the people of this country have an idea that we are setting up a judicial tribunal to decide according to justice and equity, when we are really setting up a political tribunal that will part the raiment of the weak nations among them, and upon the vestments of those who are defenseless will they cast lots.

Take any other question that you please—the question of the freedom of the seas. Great Britain asserts to-day her dominance upon the oceans. She has refused to reduce her navy by a single ship. She has said she will not accept a league of nations in lieu of the British floating fortresses. Great Britain always did have a lot of sense. She has it now. But if that question arises, there is no nation that has a vessel upon the seas that does not have an interest in its solution, and to some nations it is a question of life and of death. When the question comes before this tribunal for settlement, it will not be settled by judges of courts sitting there disinterested to decide the matter in the light of the cold law and the cold facts, but it will be settled by a tribunal controlled by interests, and fighting for the lives of their people and their nations.

What are the great questions? You can imagine one. Suppose we had a controversy with Mexico. This tribunal undertakes to set itself up to decide questions arising anywhere between members of the league and between nonmembers of the league, and between two or more States not members of the league at all. The best information we have to-day is that the British Government is acquiring vast oil rights in Mexico and that France is acquiring vast oil rights in Mexico. In my opinion that will speedily be followed by the assertion of the right of control, or the demand at least of the right to control them; and every conceivable kind of international controversy may grow out of it, and when it does, and the question will be taken into the council of the league, Great Britain will sit there looking after her oil holdings, with France looking after her oil holdings, Spain looking after the rights of her nationals, and Germany, if she is a member of the league, looking after her holdings. All these nations having an interest, will sit there on the case, to decide the matter, although they are not parties litigant thereto.

So, Mr. President, I might proceed. Take the question of Greece. There is not a question involving the integrity or power of Greece that can be raised that will not immediately touch every nerve that runs to every European Government. Greece was created for a purpose. It is maintained for a purpose. Its integrity and the character of its government are all matters that are of vital interest to the other nations of the world. When any question comes for settlement with reference to Greece these direct and positive interests are bound to control, and this will be a tribunal not to decide the justice of the case but the interests of the judges.

So one who has been in favor of an international tribunal, or in favor of arbitration to settle disputes, need not apologize if he does not subscribe to this document. It is as far removed from such a tribunal as it is possible to be. Suppose that the litigants in a court, with their witnesses, were to decide a case, and decide it by a vote, the parties at interest sitting there and voting—what relation would that bear to a judicial examination such as we have now, when the jury or the judge, or both of them combined, are selected because they are not interested? This tribunal that you set up is exactly the equivalent of calling in the interested parties in the case and taking a vote between them to settle the equities and right of a matter.

It is strange that men refuse to look these plain facts in the face. We have made some treaties of arbitration. But what is the difference between arbitration and this league? We agree with Great Britain to arbitrate certain classes of disputes, but in the first place, we do not agree to arbitrate those things that involve the life and death of the Nation, but if we did, we reserve the right to select an arbitrator, and they select an arbitrator, or two. So that at the time, with the issue before us, it may be possible to go out in the world somewhere and find two or three men who are fairly just and fairly disinterested, men who will sit as judges.

It would be quite one thing to submit a matter of that kind to the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, the Lord Chief Justice of England, and the highest judicial officer of France, if these nations had no particular and immediate interest, no direct interest. That might result in something approximating a judicial decision. You agree on your arbitration, and you pick your arbitrators in the light of the facts as they exist when the issue has arisen. So you refuse to take "AB," because he is too close in interest to another. You refuse to take "CD," because you know he is prejudiced. You agree on "H" and "I" because they are further removed, and of high character, and disinterested.

That may be done. It is frequently a doubtful expedient even then. But that has no relation to this proposition. Here we agree to submit the matter to the votes of the States themselves, the tribunal is fixed, and the parties are inevitably bound to be interested, either directly or indirectly. I for one now challenge any Senator to name me a great international question of any kind that nearly every nation in the world does not have an interest in. It can not be done.

I want now to ask the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] if this is not the bill he introduced:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
December 7, 1915.

Mr. HITCHCOCK introduced the following bill; which was read twice and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

A bill (S. 380) to prohibit individuals, partnerships, or corporations in the United States from selling arms, ammunition, artillery, and explosives of any kind for exportation during the existence of war except upon proof that said arms, ammunition, artillery, and explosives are not to be used in said war against a country with which the United States is at peace.

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be unlawful and treated as a breach of the neutrality laws of the United States for any person, partnership, or corporation to sell or contract to sell, or deliver or contract to deliver, during the existence of war between nations with which the United States is at peace, any arms, ammunition, artillery, and explosives of any kind whatsoever to be used against a country or nation with which the United States is at peace; and during the existence of war it shall be unlawful to sell for exportation or to export arms, ammunition, artillery, and explosives except upon filing with the Secretary of Commerce satisfactory sworn proof that said arms, ammunition, artillery, and explosives are not intended to be used in violation of this act.

Any person violating this act shall be fined not more than $100,000 and imprisoned not more than three years, and any arms, ammunition, artillery, and explosives the exportation of which is attempted in violation of this act shall be forfeited, one-half to the use of the informer and one-half to the use of the United States.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That was a reintroduction. The original was introduced in 1914.

Mr. REED. But this reintroduction meant that it had your approval when you reintroduced it, did it not?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes.

Mr. REED. And that was reintroduced on December 7, 1915?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes.

Mr. REED. The Lusitania was sunk on May 7, 1915—seven months before this bill was introduced. So I think I do not need to apologize for that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator stated that I introduced it. What I did was to keep it here at the end of the Congress, as every Senator does, and reintroduce it at the next. My bill was originally introduced in December, 1914. I want to say to the Senator that I never apologized for the introduction of that bill, and never expect to do so. The United States was a neutral country, under a proclamation of neutrality, and I believed that the constant sale of arms and munitions to the parties to the war would ultimately lead to embroiling us in the struggle. I did it in the interest of neutrality, and I did it just as later on I fathered a joint resolution here for armed neutrality in the effort to preserve neutrality; and when armed neutrality failed, because it was opposed by a small clique of Senators here who carried on a filibuster against it, I then supported and conducted through the Senate the joint resolution declaring a state of war with Germany, because that became the next step that was necessary. I endeavored as long as possible to stand for the idea that the United States was neutral. I endeavored as long as I could to do my part to keep the Nation out of war. When Germany made that impossible, I did what most of the other Senators did, I joined in the declaration of war against Germany.

Mr. REED. I have not been impugning the Senator's motives at all, but I made the statement that the Senator had introduced this bill after the Lusitania had been sunk. I made the statement from memory. I had not been looking up his record. The Senator challenged it, declared it to be unfair, the plain implication being that it was unfair to assert that after the Lusitania had been sunk he would have done such a thing as to introduce such a bill.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I did not denounce it as unfair. I said it was inaccurate.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I said I introduced the bill as soon as I could after the war had started.

Mr. REED. What were you quarreling about, if it did not do you any harm?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Because the Senator made the implication that following the sinking of the Lusitania I introduced such a bill, giving the impression that it was a sequence of it.

Mr. REED. Following the sinking of the Lusitania by seven months you did introduce the bill, and here is the bill.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The bill was in the Senate at the time the Lusitania was sunk, as the Senator knows.

Mr. REED. When a man reintroduces a bill he refathers it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It was merely continuing it, as other bills are continued.

Mr. REED. Let anybody have the benefit of that explanation who wants it. When I introduce a bill and then introduce it again I am not going to draw any lines between the original introduction and the reintroduction, as far as I am concerned. But I pass on. It makes no difference. The Senator was a loyal citizen of the United States. But he wanted to keep us out of the war, although the Lusitania had gone down, although German atrocity had written its bloody story on all of Belgium's soil and on all northern France. Then he wanted to keep us out. Now he advocates the doctrine that it is our duty to stay there forever and get in all the quarrels and all the rows that may happen in the next thousand years. It is a change of front, sir. If it was our duty to keep out then, our duty only to go in when Germany sank our ships and broke her faith with us, it was our duty to get out when we had helped to give Germany a sound whipping and made her recognize our rights.

You wanted us to keep out then, and I can read your language, because you did not want to embroil us in the quarrels of Europe. You stood by the ancient doctrine. Now you say, having gone in for a specific purpose, we must stay there forever. You admit your change of heart and say, like Saul of Tarsus, you have seen a great light that burned its way into the dark recesses of the soul and transformed you and made you into an evangel of the new magic, and I have no quarrel with you. But do not berate me because I failed to see the light at the same time. I was not on that road that morning.

Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] has been talking about loose statements. I would not accuse him of making a loose statement intentionally, but in the heat of argument we sometimes unintentionally make statements a little broad. He says if we get into the league of nations then the league of nations will make Japan do justice and that if she does not do justice she will have all the world against her.

Now, flights of fancy carry us into many beautiful countries and as we float along up in the ether we catch sight of many a glorious landscape. But let us get our feet on the earth. First, all the nations of the world are not in the league. Some 57,000,000 more white men are out of the league than are in it, and among the most erudite people of the earth—Sweden, with a little over three-tenths of 1 per cent of illiteracy, whereas we have about 11 per cent; Norway, Denmark, and Holland. Russia gave 6,000,000 of her men in our cause, and, though she broke faith afterwards, I still believe, I can not do else than believe, that that 180,000,000 will some day rise from the dust and stand in the sunlight of a better hour and will become a great and prosperous people.

Germany is out of the league. Austria is out of the league. The aggregate, as I remember—I reserve the right to correct my figures—is that some fifty-seven million more white men are out of the league than are in it. So that when the Senator talks about all the world being in the league the statement is a little broad.

Then China is not in the league, and there are 400,000,000 of those yellow men, and they are the best of all the yellow men. A good deal more than half the population of the world—white, black, yellow, red, and any other color—are out of the league; nor will they come in. There is no human being can answer that——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SUTHERLAND in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. REED. I yield for a question; I yield for anything but a speech; I will yield for any short statement. I just want to get through.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does not the Senator know that a number of the countries named by him have the matter under consideration, that the Parliament of Sweden is in session, for instance, in consideration of the matter and waiting for us to act? Switzerland has the matter under consideration, and most of the countries he has named are anxious to enter the league and have been invited to enter it, and undoubtedly will enter it.

Mr. REED. No; most of them have not been invited to enter, speaking by population. I have not any doubt they are discussing the question of entering the league. I know the fact, as the Senator stated, that there is discussion going on. I am discussing the question that the Senator says they are in or will be in, and I say nobody knows. But there are absolutely excluded from the league, without any right to join, Germany, Austria—perhaps properly—Russia, and Bulgaria. Of course, Turkey is out. We are going over there, I believe, with an army to control Turkey. That is one of the beneficent things of this league. Two hundred and fifty thousand of our troops are proposed by one of the advocates of the league in a bill here in the Senate for that purpose.

But if you have them all in—this is the second proposition—would they all have a vote? You say no. If they would not have a vote they would not have much to do with the decision, would they? If this is a case to be decided by the council, they are not members of the council. They might not want to fight for a decision of the council. That is the next step in the proposition.

But suppose that you brought it before the council for decision, how do you know, sir, that the council would decide the case equitably between Japan and China? Let us see the situation the council would be in. In the midnight darkness, long after the war began, in the most secret kind of secret diplomacy, France, England, Japan, and Italy agreed that Japan could rob China. Now, we are going to have a decision by the council, and I am going to show you that China never can get justice in that council in all human probability.

Comes the council now to decide the case, China having appealed to the council to right her wrongs against Japan and asking for the return of Shantung. They come in the council chamber and take their seats, wearing their robes of office, the representative of Great Britain, whose country signed the treaty turning this property over to Japan; the representative of France, whose country signed the treaty turning this property over in secret to Japan; Italy, whose country signed the treaty turning this property over in secret to Japan.

There is the dominating force in the council, committed to Japan by a prior decision, and one at least of those countries, Great Britain, bound to Japan by those close and intimate relations that exist between those two countries in their march of conquest in the Orient, one of them reaching to India and the other to China, and both with greedy eyes gazing upon new lands for conquest.

Now come in the other members—little Greece, that must do Great Britain's will, Spain, Belgium—Belgium, that could not take one breath of air did not the English fleet and the French Army protect her. And to this tribunal China comes against her powerful enemy, Japan. I would not try a sheep-killing dog before such a packed tribunal. There is not a man here whose conscience does not revolt at it, whose soul is not horrified at the spectacle.

But, sir, how shall China succeed? She must get a unanimous vote. If, of the seven men who sit there, there be but one who votes "No" to her claim, then where does she stand?

Here is one of the beauties of your unanimous-vote proposition. She stands then as a litigant in court stands where the jury has hung and there is no further trial. What then? Then the parties are left to their own devices. Then, in the absence of that unanimous decision, Japan is at liberty to take whatsoever steps she deems just and right. She can then, with the full sanction of the world, having proceeded in strict accordance with the league of nations, proceed to build her fortresses within the sacred soil of China. She can march her armed bodies across that land, and if China says but a word of protest she can make that the pretext to the world to go on with her march upon China, and there is no escape from that conclusion. She does it with the full sanction and authority of the league of nations, for she has conformed with their rules and regulations and under them has gained her acquittance and her license to make war.

A fine chance China is going to have of getting a unanimous decision against Japan, of getting any decision against Japan, when in the very process of the formation of this league Japan was still powerful enough by the mere rattling of her saber to have her loot guaranteed to her.

Get it back from Japan after you have given Japan the title and agreed that this is Japan's, and then decide it differently because Japan has informally said something? Let us have done with misrepresentation of facts on the floor of the Senate, with statements sent out here to the country that Japan has bound herself to return these Provinces to China. And yet the President, according to all the press reports—and we must look in the press reports for almost everything from the White House—has been trying to get Japan to give the very promise which Senators have told us here has been given.

Is Woodrow Wilson a man likely to ask for specific terms from a country that has already by inviolable contracts and agreements bound herself? I do not hold him in such esteem as to think that, and when he says we must make an agreement, undoubtedly an agreement in his opinion is necessary.

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] indulges in a species of argument that I do not think exactly does credit to him. This is the argument: Germany robs China; Japan took the loot away from Germany; it is all right to confirm the loot in the hands of Japan because China did not have anything to give away; it was already taken. That is to say, you can get good title by theft. Of course you can, perhaps, in a league of nations where you live in an exalted atmosphere where ordinary mortals can not penetrate; but, just as an ordinary mortal, I aver that you never can make good title to stolen goods and that one thief can not secure a fee simple title from another thief to the goods that have been stolen.

How would the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] like it if I went into his State and robbed one of his banks and he was chasing me and was not quite strong enough to overcome me, and the sheriff came along with a posse comitatus and captured me and took the money and then went down to the court—a league of nations court, where everything is done on high lines—and the court should decide that when I robbed the Senator's bank he lost title to his money, and that when the sheriff took it from me the sheriff took my title, which was a good title, and the court would award the money not to the bank but to the sheriff who robbed the thief? That is the philosophy that we are being taught. If we pursue these lofty courses much longer, we shall get so far away from the fundamental principles of justice as to have no longer any chart or map or compass or landmark to guide us.

If we were settling these things according to the old cold-blooded philosophy and China had stayed out of the war and done nothing, we might have said, "Well, Japan, you got that loot; that is a part of your swag; take it." But, sir, according to the old-fashioned brutal philosophy, even if it were rogues robbing and plundering, the honor among thieves would have repudiated the proposition to give to one of the parties the right to rob another who was engaged in the enterprise.

We were not supposed to be thieves. The world was struggling with this great giant, the Teutonic force. We called China in and China came. Part of her lands had been taken. It is not true that Japan took that peninsula; it is true that Japan and England took it. England was too honorable to claim that she owned the thing that was Chinese, but after her treaty with Japan she was not in a position to say that Japan should not take it. I say in all the history of the world I know of no similar picture of perfidy; nothing blacker in the annals of treachery and double-dealing between nations.

Behold the scene: French and English Armies are struggling to preserve their countries; they have been driven back and back until their hearts are almost in despair, brave and noble as are their hearts. The United States is entering the contest, having only one real interest, the vindication of our national rights, but being willing to help preserve and save others. The United States comes to China and asks China if she will not also cast her lot with the nations struggling against Germany. China sends 300,000 of her men with pick and shovel to dig in the trenches under that rain of hell that poured from the mouths of German guns. Chinese laborers lie there sweltering in their blood, along with British, along with French, along with Americans, but not along with Japanese—at least with very few of them, for I am informed that that country lost in the war only a few hundred men. So they fight to win a glorious victory. Then the day comes when China—her eyes swimming with delight, her heart buoyed up with the thought that now she is coming to a tribunal that will restore her to all her ancient rights and will take the oppressor's heel from her breast—finds that her fairest Province has been divided up, and that while she fought they were betraying her; while her sons died, they were dividing the profits.

There may be Senators on the floor who will vote for that sort of thing, but when they do let them not do it with the solace that they are doing it for the good of China. China knows her ancient and treacherous enemy, China knows her rights, and China knows that if this Province is honestly going to be returned the time to return it is now; that when a man asks a decree of court to confirm him in a title to property that is not his, upon the pretext that he is going to give it back after he has secured the title, that is the pretext of a rogue. That is the artifice of a man who does not possess common honesty. There is not a lawyer here but would say to a litigant under such circumstances that the time to turn it over is when the decree is written. Let us write it in the decree now and here that this great act of justice shall be done. But, no; the cunning Prussian of the Orient proposes to get a title sanctioned, warranted, and guaranteed by the league of nations with its holy seal affixed, and then it will settle the question hereafter whether it thinks that it is ready to give back this property that it has taken. It is a good thing to mix a little common sense even in our dreams. He who thinks on this matter from the practical standpoint of life must know that Japan, having laid her hand of steel upon the throat of China, does not intend to relax her grip.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. OWEN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas withhold the motion?

Mr. CURTIS. I am willing to withhold the motion for a few moments and yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. OWEN. I give notice that, with the consent of the Senate, I should like to address the Senate at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

RECESS.

Mr. CURTIS. I renew my motion that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, October 15, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, October 14, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Infinite Spirit, ever present, working in and through the hearts of men, grant that we may be tractable; that Thy kingdom may be ours to enjoy and advance, which means perfection for the individual and therefore for the race; that evil may depart and good be triumphant; that Thy will may be done in earth as in heaven; for Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. MCKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be recognized on a matter of personal privilege for a few minutes, and my reason for asking for this privilege at this time is on account of certain statements contained in an editorial published in the Chicago Tribune of the date of Thursday, October 9, 1919, a copy of which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask that it may be read in order that the Speaker may determine whether or not I am entitled to the floor as a matter of personal privilege to make a statement in connection with the same.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois raises a question of personal privilege. The Clerk will report the article referred to.

The Clerk read as follows:

[From the Chicago Tribune, Oct. 9, 1919.]

AN ILLINOIS CONGRESSIONAL MISTAKE.

Mr. McKENZIE, of Illinois, Republican member of the House Committee on Military Affairs, objected at a hearing before the committee to provision for the use of gas by American armies on the ground that it was inhuman and un-American.

Mr. McKENZIE'S thought is obviously twisted, but it comes to this, that American soldiers should be subjected to gas but should not subject their opponents to it. They should suffer the consequences and not be able to impose them.

This is a grand mode of rationalization, if the enemy is to be considered, but one which will be a little disconcerting to men who may have to offer their bodies as targets for congressional ideas.

Mr. McKENZIE, in whom we have to confess State ownership, is an example of congressional muddleness which operates to hamper American activity.

In the first place, as Gen. Sibert told the House Committee on Military Affairs, gas is not so deadly, by a difference of 26 per cent in casualties, as shot or shrapnel. That would be inconsequential if the alternative to the use of gas by American troops were the necessity of their being subjected to its use without the defense which gas could give them.

It happens that in the opinion of military authorities the use of gas is not inhuman. It would not matter whether it were inhuman or not. If American troops have to meet gas they should use it.

Mr. McKENZIE is a curious mollusk which we are sorry to say that Illinois raised on the hills of Jo Daviess County. He raised his voice in Congress time and again against rational military preparedness. He has done his best to see that American soldiers suffered the most when emergency confronted them.

DENT, the Democrat who was chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives when that committee needed a sane and rational man as chairman, was in part responsible for the defeat of the Democratic Party in the last congressional election.

The Nation will not stand for such Gibraltar-like obstinacy and idiocy. It will not stand for it, we hope, whether the idiocy is called Democratic or Republican. Such a Republican as McKENZIE in Congress does a great deal to bring the Republican Party in Illinois into disrepute. Many Republicans of McKENZIE'S type in Congress would defeat the party.

If Mr. McKENZIE can not change his ideas he can at least change his position. He ought to ask to be removed from a committee whose duties he so completely misunderstands. He could resign from Congress to the benefit of the Nation.

Mr. McKENZIE rose amid applause.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, let me suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that he get unanimous consent to proceed for whatever time he desires. I do not think the article gives the gentleman ground for rising to a question of personal privilege. I would not like to have the precedent made by a ruling of the Chair, if he does so rule, that that article presents a question of personal privilege. It is a mere criticism of a man's party affiliation and position in the party, and I suggest to the gentleman that he ask unanimous consent to proceed for such time as he desires.

The SPEAKER. As the Chair recollects the article, it uses the expression "Gibraltar-like idiocy." The Chair thinks that presents a question of personal privilege.

Mr. McKENZIE. It charges me with being a mollusk.

Mr. GARNER. I leave it to the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the article presents a question of personal privilege.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, this is the first time in my public service in this body I have asked the privilege of making a personal statement, and I would not do it now for my own particular benefit, but as a matter of justice to the people whom I have the honor to represent.

I am not unmindful of the folly of an individual entering into a controversy with a powerful newspaper. I appreciate that such a contest is futile. I have never done it, and I shall not now. I know that the Chicago Tribune reaches, perhaps, a majority of the homes in my district daily. It is our great newspaper in northwestern Illinois. I have been a subscriber to it and a reader of it for many years, and, regardless of its editorial policy, I have long considered it one of the great newspapers of the world.

The editorial in question is not the first scurrilous attack made by the editor of the Chicago Tribune on my character as a Representative of the people, but in his former attacks he has based them on my actions and statements made on the floor of the House, which are a matter of public record, and which are made known to the people of Illinois through the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; and with this sort of criticism I find no fault, although the method pursued by the editor of the Tribune is preeminently unfair, even in those criticisms.

The cause, or I think I might say the excuse, for the present unjust and bitter attack on me grew out of matter not transpiring on the floor of the House, but in a discussion of a matter pertaining to the bill for the reorganization of the Military Establishment before the Committee on Military Affairs of the House when Gen. Sibert, the head of the Chemical Warfare Division, was testifying before the committee.

For the information of the Members of the House and the country I might say that the Chemical Warfare Division was created as a separate activity during the war under the broad powers given to the President under the Overman Act, and for some time Gen. Sibert, a very capable and distinguished officer, has been at the head of this branch of the service, and is very much interested in having the Chemical Warfare Corps made a permanent corps in our peace-time establishment.

In the bill submitted for our consideration by the General Staff of the Army no provision is made for a separate Chemical Warfare Corps, but it was the plan of the staff to have all matters pertaining to chemical warfare placed under the jurisdiction of the Corps of Engineers, and when Gen. March appeared before the committee and when questioned relative to this matter he made the following statement, which I include in my remarks, and the same will be found on pages 53 and 54 of the hearings on the Army reorganization bill before the Committee on Military Affairs of the House:

Mr. MILLER. I would like to ask the general under what branch of the Army the Chemical Warfare Service comes?

Gen. MARCH. We have not got that in here, and if it is agreeable to the commitee I will discuss the Chemical Warfare Service a little later. In the enumeration of the five additional corps—the Transportation Corps, the Motor Transport Corps, the Air Service, the Tank Corps, and the Finance Department—the members of the committee will note that the War Department has not recommended that the Chemical Warfare Service be made a separate arm of the service, and that requires some comment, because the Chemical Warfare Service has been one of the services developed by this war, and it has done very good work.

In the consideration of the question as to what should be recommended to Congress on this subject, the War Department was led to adopt, after somewhat lengthy consideration, this view in regard to the matter. Chemical warfare, the poisoning of the air in war, is a thing that all nations want to avoid, just as they want to avoid the poisoning of wells, not because it is a question of killing combatants, but because noncombatants, old persons and women and children, must use the wells, they must drink water, and the trend of all humanitarian thought now is to make it so that all unnecessary horrors of war shall be eliminated as far as possible.

On the other hand, it is perfectly obvious that if any nation like Germany, without morals and without standing, should violate the laws of civilized warfare, the United States must not be caught without preparation to meet that sort of an attack. We must have a defense for that sort of thing, if we find a nation that is so beastly and so out of touch with modern civilization as to use that sort of warfare. When these methods were introduced, and as a means of combating such methods, the War Department proposed this idea, that we develop a section of the Engineer Corps for that purpose. That body has already furnished the officers who controlled the Chemical Warfare Service in this war. The section of the Engineer Corps is to be composed of technical experts. It was our idea that the men in this corps should make a study of chemical warfare defense; that the men in this section should make a study of poisonous gases and methods of defense against them; and that those men should be like a corps of college professors, or men who had been college professors of chemistry who would devote their lives to the study of gas defense, so that if the United States was ever put in the position of being attacked by anybody who would use such an inhuman method toward noncombatants, then we would have a response for that. We have on hand now a large supply of the necessary elements which go into and are a part of gas defense; we have a large supply of charcoal which is necessary in the manufacture of gas masks, and it is proposed to have that stuff turned over to a technical corps—the engineers—for a technical study of the subject, which would be going on all the time.

On the other hand, the practical application in time of peace of any method of gas attack can not be done. In time of war we load shells with poisonous gases and discharge them against an enemy, and as those poisonous gases blow out into the air they injure whatever persons or animals they come in contact with. But in time of peace we can not go out and discharge poisonous gases in that way in a field, and have them spread all around through the adjacent country, because they would kill the farmers and the stock living in the surrounding country. We can not discharge these big cylinders containing great masses of poisonous gases in time of peace because that gas would go wherever the wind would blow it, and it would do a great deal of damage. So the study in connection with this subject in time of peace would be a defensive study and not an offensive study. On that proposition it was apparent that if we were to organize a large corps composed of a major general, brigadier generals, and many other commissioned officers and a large number of men, the only thing they could do anyway would be to make these studies in laboratories, which would be absolutely necessary to keep up to date in the preparation of gases, etc., purely as a defensive method and not as an offensive method.

I am well aware of the fact that the Chemical Warfare Service people themselves are very much on the other side of the question. The so-called treaty of peace with Germany, in one of its section, stated that chemical warfare having been abolished, Germany is prohibited from importing the elements which make up poisonous gases. The idea of chemical warfare having been abolished, those who abolished it represented the sincere feeling of the representatives of the nations of all the world who were there that in future wars there will be eliminated the poisoning of noncombatants by the use of poisonous gases.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, after all, there are predatory nations who will not live up to agreements; otherwise we would never have had any wars. It is the breaking of agreements that has brought on wars. Suppose in the future some predatory nation may start again the use of chemical warfare; do you not think it advisable that this Government should have a sufficient force to continue experiments along that line so that we will know the antidote to any possible gas that an enemy might use, and have gas masks prepared speedily to meet the gas that an enemy might use?

Gen. MARCH. That is the solution we propose here. That is the very thing that is proposed to be done under the provisions of this bill.

Gen. Peyton C. March is Chief of Staff of the Army, and I am sure you will all agree with me that he has in him all the elements of a brave, stern, and thorough American soldier. He has long years of experience in our Army, both in the field and in the Staff Corps, and his views on the matter of chemical warfare and the use of poison gas as an offensive weapon of war are worthy of some consideration.

Gen. Sibert appeared before our committee at a later date and plead for the continuation of a separate corps for chemical-warfare preparation, which corps would require something like 125 officers and a considerable force of enlisted men. Being at the head of this service he naturally is an enthusiast, and thus we have a controversy between leading men of the Army as to the best method of handling this very important matter. However, that is a question we must determine, and really has nothing to do with the matter of which I complain in the editorial under consideration. That grew out of a colloquy over the use of gas as an offensive weapon, and I herewith submit a copy of the stenographer's notes taken at that time and will leave it to all fair-minded men to determine after reading the same whether or not I favor allowing our boys to submit to gas attacks from an enemy sufficiently barbaric to engage in that character of warfare without meeting such enemy with a like weapon. The following is the colloquy (see pp. 19, 20, 21, 22, 27, and 28 of the stenographic report of Gen. Sibert's testimony):

Mr. MCKENZIE. General, I think we all remember very distinctly how horrified we were when we read the reports of the first gas attack by the Germans on the defenseless French and English and the Canadians, and the fearful effect it had upon them, and how we charged them with being barbarians, and that they were not good soldiers, and that they were taking an undue advantage. I think we all agree that that was true. We charged them with taking an undue advantage because their enemies had no way of counteracting or neutralizing the effect of the gas.

What I want to find out from you is whether or not you would propose that this Government of ours, which has always stood for a fair fight and a sportsmanlike deal, even in war—whether you would advocate the building up of a Chemical Warfare Service to be used as an aggressive weapon, or is it simply to be used as a matter of defense in case we should be attacked by an enemy who would use that sort of thing?

Gen. SIBERT. I would have it as an aggressive weapon. But if I agreed not to use it, I would not use it. That was where the trouble came in. Germany agreed not to use it and did use it, and consequently the other people were not prepared, relying upon Germany keeping her agreement.

I want to mention one fact, and that is that this country is the only Nation that did not agree not to use gas before this war. At The Hague conference in 1899 and 1900 Germany, England, France, Russia, and all the other nations agreed not to use it, but we would not sign that agreement.

Mr MCKENZIE. You do not assume from that that we would undertake any such means of trying to whip our enemy?

Gen. SIBERT. Well, what is war?

Mr. MCKENZIE. I understand what war is, and I understand what a prize fight is. But a prize fight is fought according to certain rules.

The CHAIRMAN But every once in a while a foul blow is struck.

Mr. MCKENZIE. Prize fighters fight according to certain rules, and I believe war ought to be fought in the same way.

Gen. SIBERT. It is pretty hard to humanize the act of killing, and we have got to kill and maim enough men of the enemy fighting against us to enable us to impose our will upon the enemy before we can make peace, and the weapon used in doing it is not of much consequence. But if you want to put it on that basis the gas is the most humane method yet found, because of the total number of gas casualties we only had 1 per cent of deaths. Whereas from the shells and other things you had 28.4 per cent of deaths.

Mr. MCKENZIE. The fact is you can manufacture gas and at the same time you can carry on experiments and get gas masks and neutralize it, and if your army is well supplied with gas masks they need have little fear of the gas. My point is whether this Government would be justified in peace times in maintaining a separate arm of the service known as the Chemical Warfare Service to carry on the experiments so that we might be ready in case of war to utilize gas if we had to or decided to do so? My point is, Is it necessary to have a separate corps to look after that? Could it not be done either by the Ordnance Department or some other department, utilizing such men as yourself and some of the best chemists of the country and put them in there without having a separate corps, for I think we will all agree that on the battle field you could not have a chemical warfare corps fighting a battle and the artillery fighting a battle?

Gen. SIBERT. We do have them.

Mr. MCKENZIE. But they are under the command of one officer.

Gen. SIBERT. Certainly; and their training and equipment, in fact the training of the whole army in the defensive use of gases, the training of the artillery in the offensive use of gases, and the training of the special gas troops themselves, are done by the Chemical Warfare Service, and those troops go forward, and they will take greater part as time goes on. If you are willing to assume that the enemy will notify us if he discovers a new gas, so that we can be prepared, then I think your argument would stand.

Mr. MCKENZIE. Do not misunderstand me. I am in favor of all this investigation and experiment and keeping up to date on this matter, but I hope our country will never take the position that we are building up a branch of our Army so that when we get into war we are going to use gas to whip our enemies rather than utilize the old-fashioned implements of warfare.

Gen. SIBERT. What is the difference between that and the usual development of any arm of the service? Take the beginning of this war. The Germans had several times as many machine guns in proportion as anybody else. They had developed an unusual and murderous use of it, and as a result of that it caused the increase of our artillery four or five times. The French were simply decimated by this unusual thing that was developed. Would there be any difference between that and developing a chemical substance that would accomplish the same purpose, since we must admit that there must be a certain number of casualties before war can stop?

Mr. MCKENZIE. The only distinction I can see in that is it might be illustrated in this way, and that is the difference between assassinating a man and fighting him a duel. Of course, you would probably kill him in either event.

Gen. SIBERT. We fire a shell and it explodes in a group of men. The only question is whether you are going to blow a man to pieces or asphyxiate him.

* * * * * * *

Mr. MCKENZIE. I hope I have not been misunderstood in my position. If a man is mean enough to fight me with gas, I want to fight him back with gas.

Gen. SIBERT. And you would have gas ready to fight him back with in case he violated his agreement.

Mr. MCKENZIE. But it does not enter into my code of sportsmanship to fight that way. I would absolutely prohibit, if I had the power, the use of gas and the use of submarines in warfare. I would make them fight on the level.

Gen. SIBERT. When you come to define what you mean by level it gets to be a pretty hard thing.

Mr. KEARNS. How about dropping bombs from airplanes?

Mr. MCKENZIE. That should be prohibited, except where an army is located. Dropping bombs on defenseless cities is nothing more or less than murder.

Mr. KEARNS. I am talking about dropping bombs on an army.

Mr. MCKENZIE. That is all right.

The CHAIRMAN. There was another agreement of the nations, as I recall. No city that was not fortified was to be attacked with artillery or bombs or anything of that kind; but I understand in this war there were many attacks by both parties to the war upon unfortified towns.

Now I want you to listen to this:

Gen. SIBERT. They were made first and foremost by Germany, and the others were reprisal attacks. I look on the use of gas from airplanes or anywhere except in the area where it can be expected as inhuman. I look upon the use of bombs by airplanes upon defenseless towns behind the lines and where troops are not stationed as inhuman. I look upon the firing of artillery 70 miles into Paris as inhuman. But I do not look upon it as inhuman to use any implement of war that only kills soldiers if both sides know it can be used.

Mr. Speaker, the extracts which I have read, taken from the stenographic notes of the testimony of Gen. Sibert before the Committee on Military Affairs, cover all of my statements on the use of poisonous gas in war; and I submit to any fair-minded man if there is anything contained in my statements that would cause any man to believe that I stood for a policy that would require American soldiers to be subjected to such gas but not be permitted to use it on their opponents in defense.

I took no such position, as is very evident from my statements at the time; and the editor of the Chicago Tribune well knows I did not, and knew it at the time he wrote the editorial.

The editorial in that particular is an absolute falsehood; but that concerns the editor of the Tribune but little, for he evidently has a purpose in view, and to confine himself to the truth when referring to me is not a part of his policy.

It is true I was born and reared in Jo Daviess County, Ill., and in a way I am a Representative of the State in the Halls of Congress; but I am strictly within the truth when I say that I have never taken any particular pride in counting the editor of the Chicago Tribune as one of my constituents. So it is quite likely that our admiration for each other is fairly well balanced.

His statement, "He has done his best to see that American soldiers suffered the most when emergency confronted them," is equally false as his reference to my position on the matter of poisonous gas.

Again, his statement, "Such a Republican as MCKENZIE in Congress does a great deal to bring the Republican Party in Illinois into disrepute. Many Republicans of MCKENZIE's type in Congress would defeat the party." To be a menace to the Republican Party, with which I have been affiliated all my life and the principles of which I have taken great pleasure in supporting, would be a matter of deep sorrow to me. But when I think of my unwavering loyalty to my party I resent such a criticism coming from the editor of the Chicago Tribune, and with whose record as a Republican I cheerfully place mine alongside and submit to the Republicans of Illinois to be the judge as to which of us is the greater menace to our party. [Applause.]

In reference to his statement, "He ought to ask to be removed from a committee whose duties he so completely misunderstands. He could resign from Congress to the benefit of the Nation." In both of these matters I shall be glad to submit to the wishes of my colleagues on the committee and in the House whenever in their judgment I am a hindrance rather than a help in the settlement of some of the grave questions confronting us.

Finally, as to the statement, "He raised his voice in Congress time and again against rational military preparedness." It is true, Mr. Speaker, that I have in the past opposed the creation of a large standing Army in time of peace, believing it to be contrary to the spirit of our institutions. [Applause.] I am opposed to it now.

I stood for the preservation, enlarging, and federalization of the National Guard, which was done, and the glorious record made by the National Guard in the present war demonstrated the wisdom of such a policy. I am for the National Guard now and I want to see it preserved and strengthened still further. When we extended the limit of the draft law I contended that the boys of the age of 18 and 19 years should be placed in deferred classification and for which I was bitterly assailed by the editor of the Chicago Tribune. I felt then that it was not only humane but that it was sound military policy. [Applause.] I think so now.

Mr. Speaker, I might continue along this line indefinitely, but I shall not, but will simply say in conclusion that these attacks of the editor of the Chicago Tribune on one who has never harmed him is beyond my comprehension. But I want to say that this last editorial is as cruel and cowardly as the gas attack of the Germans on the defenseless English and Canadians, and a man who will indulge in this character of attack to achieve his purpose, whatever that may be, would make a splendid leader of a band of murderers, such as the Germans were who made that first deadly gas attack.

But, Mr. Speaker and colleagues, while such attacks are exasperating, for they are intended to belittle and besmirch a man's reputation among his friends, yet I shall go on performing my duty to the best of my ability in the future as I have in the past, continuing to have an abiding faith in the sense of fair play of the American people when they know the truth. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 209. An act for the relief of John T. Eaton;

S. 642. An act for the relief of Mary C. Mayers;

S. 430. An act to authorize the exchange of certain lands within the Fishlake National Forest, Utah;

S. 2758. An act providing for an exchange of lands between the Swan Land & Cattle Co. and the United States; and

S. 3159. An act granting the consent of Congress to the State road department of the State of Florida to construct and maintain a bridge across the Choctawhatchee River, near Caryville, Fla., approximately 170 feet south of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad bridge.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 1429. An act adding certain lands to the Idaho National Park and the Fayette National Forest in the State of Idaho.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following concurrent resolution, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Senate concurrent resolution 12.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That in the enrollment of the bill (H. R. 8624) entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel,' approved August 10, 1917," the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to strike out the word "an" in line 31 of section 106 of the bill as agreed upon in conference and to insert in lieu thereof the word "on"; also in section 112 where they twice appear and in section 114 where they once appear strike out the words "treasury of the District of Columbia" and insert in lieu thereof the words "Treasury of the United States to the credit of the District of Columbia"; and in section 118, line 5, of the bill as agreed upon in conference, strike out "for" where it first occurs and insert in lieu thereof the word "or."

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 209. An act for the relief of John T. Eaton; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 430. An act to authorize the exchange of certain lands within the Fishlake National Forest, Utah; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

S. 642. An act for the relief of Mary C. Mayers; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 2758. An act providing for an exchange of lands between the Swan Land & Cattle Co. and the United States; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

S. 3159. An act to authorize the State road department of the State of Florida to construct and maintain a bridge across the Choctawhatchee River, near Caryville, Fla., approximately 170 feet south of Louisville & Nashville Railroad bridge; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

EXPENDITURES IN THE WAR DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER. Under the special order one hour is allotted to the Special Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, one-half the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] and one-half by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT]. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, during the course of the Great War the United States Government obtained and collected in various ways large amounts of property, both real and personal, in this country and in Europe. Since the signing of the armistice steps have been taken, as you all know, to try to dispose of some of this property. At present our Government, through its War Department, is disposing of some of this material at various times. The Select Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, in making some of its investigations, has had its attention directed through the public press to a proposed sale of property belonging to the Government and located near Charleston, W. Va., at what is commonly called the Nitro powder plant. Finding that it was about to be sold, the subcommittee on ordnance went out there and took some testimony to disclose the facts relative to the conditions existing there, what property we had, and about what Congress ought to do about the situation, if anything.

The sale of that property is under the control of the director of sales. While primarily the ordnance branch of the War Department has control over it, it is being managed by the director of sales. At this time this sale has not been concluded, and is pending and undisposed of. The facts relative to the whole surrounding circumstances are such as to induce in the minds of our subcommittee, in which our entire committee concurred, the idea that we ought to present these facts in a brief way to the Members of this House, and indirectly to the people, so that they might be advised about them and so that, perhaps, if necessary, some steps in legislation might be taken that might help in the general disposition of this property. I will not have time in the short time allotted to me to go into the details of this, but can only touch the high spots as I go along. I would prefer not to be interrupted, gentlemen, unless it is something particularly important or something I forget, because I will not have time to get over it all if I am interrupted very much in the short time we have been able to borrow from other pressing business. The gentleman from Tennessee will have one-half of the time.

The powder program in 1917 was investigated by a commission that went to Europe to determine what we ought to do in making powder. Up to that time we had not made any, except in the Picatinny Arsenal and in private concerns. In 1917 we sent this Franco-American commission to Europe to find out something as to what we ought to do about manufacturing powder. When the commission reported back, immediate steps were taken to try to increase the powder production in this country. When the European war began the total production of powder in the United States was about one million and a half pounds a month. When we went into the war it had risen to a million and a half pounds a day.

The Du Ponts themselves a year prior to our entrance into the war produced most of the powder, and the production had risen to a million and a half pounds a day. The production, therefore, when we went into the war was about as I have stated, but we planned to increase the amount a million and a half pounds a day by manufacturing it in Government plants, and in carrying out that intention they proposed two Government-owned plants, one at Nitro, W. Va., and the other at Nashville, Tenn., called "Old Hickory." The Old Hickory plant was to produce 900,000 pounds and the Nitro plant 1,500,000 pounds a day, so you can tell something about the immensity of this program that the Government was about to embark upon.

The construction of these two plants cost, as nearly as your committee can ascertain, $90,000,000 at Old Hickory, Nashville, and $60,000,000 at Nitro, W. Va., or approximately $150,000,000 has been expended on the two plants for construction cost up to this time. This does not include operating costs, nothing except the building and construction of the two plants.

As to the wisdom or necessity for this extended program this committee will have more to say in the future. I will not now take the time to discuss it. I have my own ideas, and the other members of the subcommittee have their minds clarified, and we will develop it later. We do not have the time now to go into it, but at some future time we will make an extended report upon the necessity of that program. It is sufficient to say at this time that we have expended a large sum of money, and up to the time of the armistice we had obtained but little powder from the two plants, and not a pound of that powder was shipped to the other side.

The Old Hickory plant produced before and after the armistice and up to the time it was closed down finally 31,000,000 pounds of powder. There were produced at Nitro four and a half million pounds. All that powder is stored at these two plants and remains there to this day. The powder we used during the war was powder made by the Du Ponts and other people, and practically all the powder that was shipped to the other side was sold to France and England. In fact, the Chief of Ordnance testified that practically no American ammunition was used on the other side. The Du Ponts sold to the French and English and it was resold to us, but we used none of the ammunition that was made in this country unless we bought it in this way. We manufactured in the United States in 1918 536,000,000 pounds of smokeless powder, of which the Du Ponts manufactured 427,000,000 pounds. Of this only 270,000,000 pounds was floated to the other side. When the armistice was signed we had 200,000,000 pounds of smokeless powder in this country. Notwithstanding this, we were preparing to turn out 1,500,000 pounds a day from Government factories.

Nitro is located near Charleston, W. Va., on a bend of the Kanawha River, about 40 miles from the Ohio River. It lies in a farming country in the midst of the rich coal and gas and oil territory of West Virginia. It is about 16 miles from Charleston to Nitro. When Nitro was built there was nothing there. It is on the Kanawha & Michigan Railway line, and the tracks of this line run through it. There are no street car lines between Charleston and this plant, no villages, and the roads are indifferent.

So they started to build a plant out in the bend of the river, where all they had was a location. They bought about 1,800 acres of land, roughly speaking. In the summer of 1917 the Secretary of War asked the Du Pont Co. to build powder plants for the Government, and on the 25th of October, 1917, the Chief of Ordnance wrote a letter to the Du Ponts asking them to acquire the necessary lands for building these plants. Up to this time the Du Ponts, acting on previous oral agreements, had been trying to do this thing, had selected the location at Nitro as one of the sites, and had been sending one Daniel Cauffiel, as the agent of the company, to take options on certain lands needed for the powder plant at that place. Cauffiel had taken options on 22 tracts in this way.

Before we went into the building of this plant that land had been selling for from $23 an acre to the highest point, $160 an acre. Mr. Cauffiel obtained options on the 22 tracts and was holding them. On the 25th of October the Chief of Ordnance wrote to the Du Ponts telling them that they were authorized to build this plant and to acquire this land. At once the Du Pont Co. accepted the options, and on the same date, I believe, immediately after the acceptance of the options, the contract was canceled by the Secretary of War. It thus appears that the Du Ponts, who had the contract to build this plant, had it canceled on the day it was made. It does not appear in the record, but it is surmised that the Secretary of War thought the Du Ponts were getting too much of this business and therefore canceled the contract. In any event, it was canceled. Mr. Cauffiel had title to 22 of these tracts, and he has that title to-day in him. Seven of the tracts of land that were gathered up from the people who lived around there went directly to the Government. One of them had to be condemned, a small piece for which the Government had to pay $16,000. The other titles, as I have said, are still in Mr. Cauffiel, who is the agent of the Du Ponts and who did the business for them. I do not know whether the arrangements have been made for the transfer of title to the Government or not. Most of the papers were made out when we were investigating this, about the 1st of September, but were pending in the office of the Judge Advocate General awaiting some determination about what should be done. The contract with the Du Ponts provided a compensation aggregating 15 per cent for the construction of these plants. I do not know what claims they may have on account of the summary cancellation of it, although I am advised that Cauffiel is claiming a very considerable sum for commission on the business he transacted.

This plant was built on land to which we did not have title. We built a city there three and a half miles long and about a mile wide, which has everything in it that you can imagine. It is built in the bend of the Kanawha River, as I have said, where there is access to it by boat, and where there is a railroad line that runs out there. It was necessary to build everything that anybody needed to live in or live on. They put up 2,200 bungalows that were portable. They cost about $1,500 each. They are five-room bungalows. They have about 3,200 houses altogether, but the rest of them are made of tar paper, with batten construction. The buildings that housed all this great machinery were made of tar-paper construction on the outside, with batten, except some of the buildings for solvent recovery, which have fireproof walls, made necessary by the nature of the work that they do within the buildings. There is an immense amount of buildings there—all sorts of buildings—built for the purpose of housing this great plant which the Government was to build, and among other things they have a lot of buildings one would not ordinarily expect to see there. For instance, they have a hospital, with approximately 20 buildings composing it. At the height of activity out there, when we had 19,000 men employed, they had 100 physicians and medical officers working in the hospital, and they were about to build 54 modern houses for the surgeons. They had 112 nurses. When we were there on the 1st of September the hospital was still open, and they had 5 physicians and 37 other people working there and 16 patients. All this service in the hospital during the activities out there was free. It was possible for a man who worked there to get free service at the hospital. He also could get free drugs at the drug store. He got free gas, free water, free heat, free light—everything he got free, even the maid service, which was furnished by the contractors. They had maids who went around and attended to the housework for them. These things were done during the progress of the work and at the time when they had at least 19,000 people working there.

After the signing of the armistice, when the Ordnance Department took over control of this institution, the bungalow rent was given up, and from that time on there was no rent charged on the bungalows. So far as I could observe they had at least three Young Men's Christian Association buildings, and they had in the neighborhood of three men's club buildings, four women's club buildings, and four other Young Women's Christian Association and lodge buildings for women under construction. They had a community center that was a marvel, an immense thing, very expensive, of course, to maintain. They had 65 permanent houses for the officers of the institution. There was a moving-picture house and other amusement places. A schoolhouse to house 1,200 pupils was built. They were engaged in building an immense steel-arched auditorium, which would have cost at least $70,000.

After the signing of the armistice, when these men, one would suppose, should have been discharged and the force lowered a great deal, we found upon our examination that in some places the force had been increased. For instance, on December 14 the Thompson-Starrett Co., who were doing the construction work, had 2,901 men employed. On January 16, several months after the armistice, they had 1,673 men on the construction force. The Hercules Powder Co. on November 15 had 5,020 men working, and 15 days after the armistice was signed they had 5,395. They had hired approximately 400 more men. When we were there on the 1st of September, 1918, they had 1,485 people on the pay roll, but 215 of them were on leave at that time. It was costing the Government at that time $43,000 a week to keep the plant going. I am advised that that is practically the situation to-day, and that as long as this institution is held by the Government it will require approximately $40,000 a week to keep it going.

Soon after the armistice was signed we had a number of solvent recovery and dry houses there, and along about March 1 the Ordnance Department, for some reason we do not know, took a notion to ship in a lot of stuff there for storage. Immediately they started a force of 448 men at the height of activities to tear the insides out of 28 of those buildings, the bins and costly apparatus that had been put in there. They tore the insides out and went to shipping in empty shell cases and all sorts of things from all over the United States, shipped them in there and stored them in these houses that they had gutted in this fashion. It took about 500 men to do the work. This stuff came from all over the United States, some of it from Porto Rico, a good deal of it from Chicago. They filled up these houses with stuff, 50,000 tons of it. I asked Gen. Williams, Chief of Ordnance, the other day what they did it for, and he said they thought they were going to use those buildings for storage, and after a while they changed their minds and concluded they would not use them for storage. Of course, the object for which the buildings were erected was a powder plant, and this taking the insides out of them destroyed the buildings so far as their availability for that sort of use is concerned. They stand there to-day empty shells, full of cases and that sort of thing, which will all have to be removed, of course, when this property is sold. The Government in selling this property out there has been compelled to reserve tracts M and N, which contain a large number of these buildings, from the sale and to keep possession of them in order to have some place where they can store this property. Having moved this stuff into these buildings, they must now move it out and send it elsewhere at immense expense. Why they did it nobody seems to know. It was a costly thing to do and is to-day a deterrent to the ready sale of this property.

As I have said, there are approximately 50,000 tons of it in there, all shipped in since the armistice. They built a great number of public utilities down there, the vastness of which one could hardly comprehend by hearing about it. They built a waterworks system that had a capacity of 60,000,000 gallons of water a day. In other words, the pumping capacity of this station or waterworks was equal to that of a city of 600,000 inhabitants. It would supply the city of Baltimore nicely. They say, in explanation of this, that it was necessary to do this, because with the full capacity of this powder mill they would need that much water. That may be so; I do not know about that. We have as yet obtained no expert opinion; the only evidence we have is that this is probably true if they ever got to the full capacity of 625,000 pounds a day. But it remains there; it is very large and cumbersome and expensive to maintain, and anybody who buys that plant for ordinary manufacturing purposes can not maintain this public utility, which necessarily requires such an immense expense for maintenance.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman state how much money we have spent at Nitro?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I will tell the gentleman what we have spent on construction. We have expended $60,100,000 for construction. I do not know how much we have spent for operation. Now, there is a peculiar thing about that. In the first place, Mr. D. C. Jackling was appointed by the Secretary of War as Director of Explosives to build our powder plants. Mr. Jackling is a copper man. I think he was either president or vice president of several of the great copper companies, notably the Utah Copper Co. and the Nevada Consolidated Copper Co. And so far as experience in explosives goes I do not believe he had any. He was a copper man pure and simple; one of the leading men in that business. He made these contracts. He made a contract with Thompson-Starrett to build this plant on January 18, 1918. The War Department then made a contract with the Hercules Powder Co. to operate it. This latter contract was made May 9, 1918. These people kept their own books. Thompson-Starrett built it and spent $60,100,000 for this purpose. We have never found out what the cost of operation has been. We did not have access to the books of the Hercules Powder Co., unless by going to the Philadelphia claim office, where they have been checking up this matter as to how much the bill of the Hercules Powder Co. is for the 4,500,000 pounds of powder they made. We do not know. Their books were not there when we were. They had been taken to Philadelphia; but we do know this, that the Ordnance Department advanced the Hercules Powder Co. $14,349,214.20 to do this work, and they had that money. What they did with it we do not know. I understand there is a controversy between them and the Government as to whether they absorbed the whole of the $14,349,214.20 or not, but they got the money, and they have it so far as I know and so far as the inquiry by the committee shows. Following the ordinary rule, the Government has probably seen the last of it.

Mr. MADDEN. How much powder did they make?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Four and a half million pounds.

Mr. MADDEN. Then, it cost over $3.50 a pound?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. If they spent all the money. They got the money; I do not know whether they spent it all or not.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Recently I understand that bids have been submitted for taking over the plant?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I am going to state about that. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I used?

The SPEAKER. Seventeen minutes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I desire to save a little time after the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

The SPEAKER. The Chair is mistaken. The gentleman has only 7 minutes remaining. He has used 23 minutes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. That shows the difficulty about trying to handle a thing like this in 30 minutes. They advertised this thing for sale as a whole proposition. They got three bids. The highest bid was $5,800,000. Lying over on the table is the inventory of the property they had there. It is printed. It is full of articles. That inventory shows between $11,000,000 and $12,000,000 worth of property, about one-third of which is reserved to the Government. It is there; it is everything from overalls to thrashing machines. There is enough to stock any general store in the country—everything of which you can speak. There are hundreds of gallons of paint, and clothing, and everything you can think of. It is all there, and it goes with the sale, and the highest bid was $5,800,000. The cheapest bid was two and a half million dollars. I want to say something about this sale. Certain of the bidders got into Philadelphia and made a combination there, as far as we can observe. There was a bidder going to bid a reasonable bid, a chemical company that wanted to buy the plant and run a manufacturing establishment there. They had made arrangements with a prominent bank in New York to finance the operations. A day or two before these bids were opened the bank withdrew its support from the bidder, we are informed, as the result of a combination of these other bidders and with the obvious purpose of keeping down the bids.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Will the gentleman give us the name of that bank?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Well, I can, but——

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I think we ought to know.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I doubt the wisdom of it just yet. I will state it at the right time if this thing does not go off right. I have the name of the bank and will make it public if this sort of thing occurs again. After our committee had had its hearings at Nitro, we notified the Secretary of War we did not want these bids passed upon until we knew what they were. After the bids were received, we were advised what they were. Mr. Crowell, Assistant Secretary of War, then came and asked what we would suggest. We told him to reject these bids as insufficient. He agreed to reject them, and they are now receiving private bids for this property. Unless strict attention is given to the matter this great property, which, with its loose property, represents an investment of $70,000,000 at least, not counting the other $14,000,000 we perhaps put in the hole with the Hercules Co., will be frittered away.

I reserve the balance of my time until the gentleman from Tennessee shall have finished. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I acquiesced in the suggestion of the honorable chairman of this committee that, in this informal way, without making any written report, certain facts that had come to the knowledge of the subcommittee on ordnance of the Select Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, might be laid before the House. Whether it is wise or not was a question of some doubt in my mind, but upon the whole I could not see where any harm would occur. Some good might possibly result, and I felt if the chairman of the committee, who has given much labor and study to this matter, desired to do it and take the responsibility for it, I should acquiesce, and I did so, as the gentleman has stated.

Now, of course, there are no differences between the gentleman and myself as to the facts that have been stated by him, because with a single exception, to which I shall make reference, all of the matters to which he has referred have been taken in testimony, and that testimony has been published, and the hearings are available to any Member of Congress and to the public generally.

I think, however, that, due to the pressure for time, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] had to hasten so as that perhaps it would be best for me to amplify to some extent some of the statements of fact, to the end that impressions unfavorable to our country may not be improperly drawn. For instance, it was stated by the gentleman from Illinois, and correctly, that no powder from the plants built at Nitro and at Old Hickory, near Nashville, Tenn., was shipped abroad. That is true. But it should also be stated that in the very nature of things it was not physically possible to produce it in time to ship it abroad before the armistice was signed. The ground for the Nitro plant, as I remember it, was broken in February, 1918. Work on the Old Hickory plant began in March, 1918. And with remarkable expedition—and at a tremendous expense; there is no question about that—this work was pressed to the point where they were able to put the factories in production, I think at Old Hickory in October and at Nitro just before the time of the signing of the armistice. So no inference should go abroad, it seems to me, among the people, to the effect that because no powder was shipped abroad there had been carelessness or negligence at those plants, because I think there were no evidences of such.

Now, the gentleman has referred also to the character of buildings that houses the machinery and to their being temporary structures. That is true. It is in evidence before our committee that instructions issued by the War Department—I think the Secretary of War personally, perhaps, was referred to, though I am not certain—were to make the foundations of these buildings that were to house this machinery of the very best character of material obtainable, but in the interest of expedition and also because of the fact that it was not known how long the plant would be in production and how long the buildings would be needed, it was provided that the superstructure, the sheltering part of it, might be of the temporary character as described by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM]. As far as I am concerned, I think that was a wise policy.

The gentleman has referred to buildings that one would scarcely expect to see there. I do not know that I agree with the gentleman about that. The hospital unit did seem to be somewhat large to us there on that quiet day, Labor Day, that we spent there, and on the following day, when all the force had departed except about 1,200 of the employees there at the time. It was a very quiet period down there, and I fancy we did not get the impression that we would have gotten if we had been there some two or three days before the signing of the armistice, when anywhere from 20,000 to 25,000 men were engaged in this extremely dangerous business of manufacturing smokeless powder. And, so far as I am concerned, I am not, with the light that is before me, in any situation where I am disposed to criticize the size of that hospital unit that was constructed there.

Reference was also made by the gentleman from Illinois to the fact that after this matter was transferred to the Ordnance Department, after the Hercules Powder Co. contract had been canceled or suspended, rents were stopped on the bungalows that were occupied by the employees. That is correct, as I remember the testimony, but it is also in testimony that the wages to the employees were at that time, if I remember correctly, reduced, so that the reduction by the cutting off of the rents and the reduction in wages balanced substantially.

Reference was also made to the fact that after the signing of the armistice for a few days there were more men in employment by the Hercules Powder Co. than before. That is the testimony. My recollection is that the explanation of that as given was that laborers were on their way there in some instances, and further that substantially all this powder was really completed after the armistice was signed because of that which was in solution. It takes some 30 or 40 days, as I remember the testimony, to complete the finished article of smokeless powder. From the time that the original operation begins with the raw materials until it comes out in final form the manufacture of smokeless powder takes from 30 to 40 days, and that which was in solution and in the various houses at that time was completed, but no new raw materials were put into production after the time the armistice was signed.

Now, there were something over 1,200 men—I believe 1,280—in the employment at the time we were there, operating the power plant and the water plant, guarding the property that was there, and performing all the various duties incident to keeping the plant in a safe condition, and there were a large number upon leave. They were taking the annual leave which by act of Congress is allowed to Government employees. I presume that they are from time to time still continuing that down there. Whatever was done in that regard was, of course, in accordance with the laws of the Congress.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] asked a question of his colleague which brought a response that might possibly be misunderstood, about the advancement by the Government of some $14,000,000 and the amount of powder production. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] had stated that the Government had advanced something over $14,000,000 to the Hercules Powder Co., and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] inquired how much powder had been made, to which his colleague replied that it was four million and some hundred thousand pounds. That without some explanation, of course, might be calculated to leave a very erroneous impression—that the 4,000,000 pounds of powder had cost the Government $14,000,000. As a matter of fact, the armistice came suddenly and quickly. It came unexpectedly to everybody, to be sure. The Government had a contract with the Hercules Powder Co. to operate this plant.

The price that the Hercules Powder Co. was to receive was based upon the price of the raw materials that should enter into the manufacture of powder—sodium nitrate, cotton linters, sulphur, and all the various things that go into the making of smokeless powder—and they were to receive so much per pound upon each pound of powder made, based upon the price of the raw materials which entered into its composition.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Two and three-fourths.

Mr. GARRETT. Yes; 2¾ cents per pound. That is correct. I thank the gentleman. That was a continuing contract. They were preparing to make powder extending over a long period of years perhaps; certainly it was thought over 1919 and 1920. It was expressly provided in the contract made with the Hercules Powder Co. that advances might be made by the Government. There is a claim, I suppose, on the part of the Hercules Powder Co., filed with the Government, but we have no information about that. As the gentleman from Illinois has said, we do not know about that; but I think it is fair to state that I do not know of any effort on the part of the committee to find out about that yet. That is a matter on which we may take some testimony in the future. As I understand it, no witnesses have been called before us, and the committee up to this time has made no movement toward investigating this claim which the Hercules Powder Co. has filed against the Government. But that is the situation. There was a going contract. The Government has made an advance, and it would not be fair to leave the impression that that powder cost the full sum which was so advanced.

Now, about the bids on the property. Of course there is nothing secret about that. The Government advertised for bids. The Government advertised widely throughout the country for bids to sell the plant and the town as a whole, it being the opinion that it could be sold to better advantage as a whole proposition to some institution that might desire to operate it as a manufacturing plant than to attempt to tear it down and salvage it or undertake to deal with it in units. The tremendousness of this plan can scarcely be appreciated by one who has not visited it and actually seen the physical surroundings with his own eyes. It is a stupendous thing there. It has been testified before the committee that it is suitable for different characters of manufacturing, and yet it has also been testified and the common sense of men teaches them that it is going to be extremely difficult to use all the units of it in any one process of manufacture because it is so immense. The water plant, to which the gentleman from Illinois made reference, with some 60,000,000 gallons capacity, is necessary, according to all the testimony given before us, in the manufacture of powder—this kind of powder where they have the water-drying process, as it is called.

I do not know what that means. I never knew of water drying anything, but that is what they call it. These tremendous quantities of water are necessary, and in the course of manufacture they must have a filtered water for treating the cotton linters and all that. Absolutely pure water is required.

The Government advertised for these bids. The day that the bids were opened they were published to the world. The bids received were disappointing. They were disappointing to the officials of the War Department, as they were disappointing to all who had known of the cost of this plant originally; and as the gentleman from Illinois has stated, Mr. Crowell, the Assistant Secretary of War, under whose general direction this matter apparently is being dealt with, visited the committee. Of course we knew what the bids were before he ever came down. He asked the opinion of the committee concerning them. My recollection is that he was in turn asked what he thought about it. He said he preferred not to give an opinion himself until he had the view of the committee. But he said, "I will say this, that every adviser who has talked with me concerning this matter has advised that these bids be rejected."

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit one question?

Mr. GARRETT. Yes, indeed.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Was it the $5,000,000 bid that was withdrawn on account of the bank not continuing its support?

Mr. GARRETT. No. It was not that bid. I do not wish to say this in any criticism of the gentleman from Illinois, but I will say that I myself do not care to go into that question. We have certain information concerning that, that came to the committee privately, but we have nothing absolutely in testimony concerning that matter.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I was not particularly interested in that feature, but I simply wanted to know if the $5,000,000 bid still stood or was withdrawn?

Mr. GARRETT. All the bids have been rejected.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Has the gentleman any computation as to the fair value of that property?

Mr. GARRETT. I have not, I will say to the gentleman frankly, because I do not know. I will tell the gentleman what has happened there. Various manufacturing concerns have sent their experts there and have expended very considerable sums of money, some of them, in making a complete survey of the plant. Of course, I would have no idea about the value, because I know absolutely nothing of the value of that machinery. About the only thing that I might estimate anything on that is there, if I had time, would be to sit down and try to count up the amount of lumber that is in the buildings and try to find out what the salvage value would be. Personally I have no idea of its value. But I know what it cost us.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman will agree with the gentleman from Illinois that there is something in the neighborhood of $11,000,000 worth of actual movable property?

Mr. GARRETT. There are some differences of opinion about that testimony. I am not prepared to refute the statement. I do not care to dispute it. The gentleman has some figures that were presented to the committee that would indicate $11,000,000. The general sums mentioned before the committee would indicate $9,000,000 worth of loose material. But whether it is $9,000,000 or $11,000,000, I think it is immaterial for the present statement. There is a tremendous amount of loose material there, consisting of almost everything conceivable—commissary stores, piping, paint, beds and bedding—almost everything you can conceive of, and that includes also large quantities of raw materials—cotton linters, 27,000,000 or 28,000,000 pounds of cotton linters and hull fibers there, and something like a million gallons of alcohol, rectified and unrectified, and sulphur. I believe the sulphur has been sold. Various of the raw materials entering into the manufacture of powder are included.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the gentleman understand that it is the desire of the Government to sell this plant to some concern that will keep it going?

Mr. GARRETT. So far as the Government is concerned, I do not know. I presume their desire is to sell it in the way that will bring the greatest return to the Government. I should imagine that there could be no possible objection on the part of anyone, and that it would really be gratifying to everyone, if it could be sold and continued as a going concern for the benefit of that splendid community there and for the country at large; but I take it the primary interest of the responsible officials is to obtain the greatest return to the Government of the dollars and cents expended.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I understood from the statements of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] that a certain bid, if not actually submitted, had been prepared by a chemical company which was prepared to run the plant and produce powder there, but that at the last moment financial support was withdrawn and the bid was never submitted.

Mr. GARRETT. That information has come to the subcommittee—not to produce powder, I will say, but chemicals. It has not been placed in evidence, but that information has been given to all the members of the subcommittee privately.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the gentleman know the total amount of the bid?

Mr. GARRETT. I do not; and I do not think the committee does.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I think I can tell you.

Mr. GARRETT. Does the gentleman think it wise to do so?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I do not think it is wise to do so.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will not press the question if the committee desire to reserve it for a later day.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. It is very much in excess of any other bid.

Mr. GARRETT. That is my understanding—that it was very much above anything offered—but the exact amount I do not know.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SABATH. Is there any reason why the Government should not retain the plant and continue to manufacture powder for the use of the Army and Navy?

Mr. GARRETT. What possible use does the gentleman think the Government could have for a plant that would make 625,000 pounds of smokeless cannon powder per day in time of peace?

Mr. SABATH. How much money does the Government spend in time of peace for powder?

Mr. GARRETT. All that the Government needs in time of peace can be manufactured at the Picatinny Arsenal. And let me say to my friend that I understand it to be the present policy to retain, and put in a stand-by condition, as it is called, the Old Hickory plant down at Nashville, which has a capacity of 900,000 pounds per day.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Has the gentleman been able to fix an approximate amount below which it would not be wise for this plant to be disposed of.

Mr. GARRETT. No; I can not. There are various elements which enter into it. I have already expressed my lack of information of the elements upon which a price could be fixed. This property, of course, ought not to be fooled away, but it is easy enough to see that the Government can not expect to get any $61,000,000 back for it, the approximate amount which it spent upon it. It ought not to be fooled away, but at the same time we must keep in mind that there is a pay roll of some $43,000 per week there now—that is, it is costing the Government about $43,000 a week for its upkeep at the present time.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. I yield to the gentleman from Delaware.

Mr. LAYTON. I would like to ask what your information is, from your study of this question in the committee, as to the wisdom of the policy of the Government in going into the manufacture of powder at the outbreak of the war. Do you not believe that right at the beginning, if the Government had called in the powder companies and had agreed upon a fixed price for powder, the Government would have secured its powder more expeditiously and at an infinitely lower cost, in that way?

Mr. GARRETT. No, sir. Let me say to the gentleman that every ounce of powder that was being produced, and that could be produced, by American manufacturers at the time of our entrance into the war, in April, 1917, was being taken by the allied countries abroad.

Mr. LAYTON. The gentleman does not catch my point.

Mr. GARRETT. And if we had gone to the domestic manufacturers and had taken our supply from them, it would simply have deprived the countries associated with us of their supply.

Mr. LAYTON. The gentleman does not catch my point. If I am running a dry-goods store, it is very much easier for me to enlarge my plant and to have larger operations than it would be to go out to some strange place and start a new one. If the Government had gone to the E. I. du Pont de Nemours Co. and to the Atlas Powder Co. and to the Hercules Powder Co., and to the various other powder companies, and had said to them, "Enlarge your plants; you are masters of this business, and we will agree upon a fixed price per pound," could they not have carried out their European contracts and at the same time have given our Government what it needed much more cheaply than the Government got it by manufacturing it itself?

Mr. GARRETT. I get the gentleman's point. He means, had new units been built?

Mr. LAYTON. That is what I mean, exactly.

Mr. GARRETT. I can not say that it would have been better. That is not a question which the committee have considered.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. GARRETT. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Would it have been possible for the Government to have made any reasonable contracts, with the uncertainty as to how much powder the Government would need?

Mr. GARRETT. I am sure it would have been absolutely impossible for the Government to have procured anyone to enter into any contract whereby these concerns would at their own expense have added new units. I am sure it would have been impossible. If the Government had had new units added to the existing powder plants, the Government would have had to pay for them, just as it had to pay for the construction at Old Hickory and at Nitro. I have no doubt of that. Of course no manufacturer in his right mind would have added new units on such an uncertainty. During the year 1918, according to the testimony before this committee, the average daily consumption of artillery powder by the British forces was a million pounds a day. The average consumption by the French forces was at least that, if not more.

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. I will.

Mr. LAZARO. In view of the fact that many investigations are being conducted and that the Government is being criticized for money that was spent, with very little to show for it when the armistice was signed, is it not a good idea, in the interest of fair play to all concerned, to call attention to the fact that we did not know how long this war would last and that it was wise to do everything we could to prepare ourselves for a long war?

Mr. GARRETT. Why, certainly; and we ought at all times not only to keep that in mind ourselves, but when we speak upon this matter to remind others of that fact.

We were really just getting ready for war when the armistice was signed. [Applause.]

Mr. LAZARO. It is not so much a question of what we had at that time, but what we would have had had the war continued.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. GARRETT. Under the leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD I wish to refer to the matter of the land titles spoken of by the gentleman from Illinois, because I think it would be unfortunate for the Government in its negotiations for the sale of this property if any cloud should be cast upon the title.

It is true that a Mr. Cauffiel, as agent for the Du Ponts, who at that time were acting as agents of the Government, negotiated options upon much of this land, a Mr. Crawford, a real estate agent of Charleston, W. Va., being his (Cauffiel's) agent. It was very desirable to not have it become known that this land was being bought for Government use for the very good reason that the price would be thereby affected. The Government sought to avoid this. Title to a number of the tracts was taken in Cauffiel's name, but it is well understood that he holds it merely as trustee for the Government, and from the testimony before the committee I am sure no prospective purchaser need have the slightest fear of title. Some of the tracts had to be condemned and suits are now pending in the courts, but these suits involve merely amounts of damages and compensation and title is not affected.

Another matter upon which I venture to comment is the Virginian Power Co. settlement, referred to by the gentleman from Illinois in his second speech.

I understood the gentleman to say that the Government had sold to the Virginian Power Co. certain material and had received but about $81,000 therefor. Without a fuller statement, this might easily be misunderstood. The facts briefly are these: The Ordnance Department, largely at the suggestion of the Fuel Administration, which was naturally anxious to conserve and develope the coal supply at that time, entered into a contract with the Virginian Power Co. to furnish a certain amount of power to the Nitro plant and also to build for the Government transmission lines to several mines in that section of the State. After the signing of the armistice, when there was no longer a necessity for the power at Nitro, negotiations were opened with the Navy Department, which has a permanent ordnance plant at South Charleston, and recently a contract was consummated whereby there was transferred to the Navy Department the rights of the War Ordnance Bureau in the greater portion of the plant constructed for the Government.

The lines to the mines, however, were sold to the Virginian Power Co., along with other properties. These properties so sold by the Government to the power company were:

1. The transmission line to the mines.
2. A substation.
3. A warehouse.
4. A hoist house.
5. A lean-to.
6. Certain stores at Cabin Creek, W. Va.
7. Certain stores that have been purchased, but not yet shipped.

The last item amounted, as I recall it, to about $19,000.

The total cost value of all these seven properties, as shown by the evidence before the subcommittee, was $422,504.60.

This was the actual cost of construction and purchase of these properties under war conditions.

In the negotiation of the settlement a total value measured by present prices and conditions of $390,385.05 was agreed upon.

The original contract with the Virginian Power Co. gave it the option to purchase the property, and it had 5 years in which to do it. An average depreciation of 7½ per cent per year for 5 years was allowed upon all except the goods mentioned in No. 7 above. These were taken at actual cost. The sale price to the Virginian Power Co. was, therefore, $269,505.54.

The Government was indebted to the Virginian Power Co. for power furnished from July, 1918, to December, 1918, and for other purposes in the sum of $187,700.50. This amount it was obligated to pay and would have had to pay in cash. It was taken as cash by the power company in the sale, and therefore the check given the Government was for $81,805.04, but the actual amount received by the Government for these properties was $269,505.54. This should be clearly understood and no erroneous impression should go abroad that only about $81,000 was received for these properties.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, a few words in closing. Some of the things I forgot to mention I will mention now. For instance, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] spoke of cotton that was required in this manufacturing plant. We found when we got out there that there were at the plant approximately 68,000 bales of cotton, linters, and hull-fiber cotton. Most of it was lying out of doors. It had been put on the ground early in the year, some of it in February, and, aside from one storehouse recently built, most of the 68,000 bales had stayed out all summer. It was decaying on the outside, to what extent I do not know, except that Mr. Sloan, assistant director of sales, told us privately that some in his judgment was entirely gone. It had laid out and is practically worthless now. That is reserved from this sale.

I want to call attention briefly to the settlement that was made with the Virginian Power Co. Early in this matter it was ascertained that it was necessary to have power for the plant. We had in the plant 34 boilers generating 34,000 horsepower, a magnificent steam plant, as good a one as I ever saw. There was installed a small electrical unit generating 3,000 kilowatts of electric energy. Instead of making its own power the War Department made a contract with the Virginian Power Co., an outfit that had a power station 35 miles away, at Corbin Creek, on the Kanawha River, by which the power might be brought from that place to this plant, and by which we would install in the works of the Virginian Power Co. a turbogenerator that would generate 20,000 electrical kilowatts. The Government also agreed to finance the operations of this company and furnish it the money to build power lines to various villages and coal mines in the valley. Approximately $2,900,000 has been paid to the Virginian Power Co. for this purpose. By the contract the Virginian Power Co. was to have five years in which it could buy all this apparatus and machinery at its option, and for its value less depreciation.

From that on to the end of the operation electrical energy came over that line. They hitched up a sort of a ramshackle line along the Kanawha & Michigan Railway, and run the current down this line and into the plant, and we bought power from that institution for the ordinary operations of the plant, using also what little current we made on our own 3,000-kilowatt unit.

As has been said, the contract with the Virginian Power Co. provided that the Government should advance the money to them to buy the right of way between other places and various coal mines and to build the various lines from these coal mines and scattered plants and the line up to Nitro. They bought those, and after the war was over it was found that they had good copper lines between their plant and all the surrounding mines and small settlements in that country, together with the necessary transformers and stations. So to-day the Virginian Power Co., that at the time we began operations was practically insolvent, as shown by the tax assessor's books in West Virginia, has, built by the Government, power lines all over the country and a practical monopoly of the Kanawha Valley. It has recently effected a settlement with the United States by which they pay the United States for all these lines, right of way, and loose material approximately $81,000. They also, at the same time, have taken a contract to furnish power to the naval ordnance plant at Charleston for a term of years. The merest contemplation of this settlement can not fail to impress the reader with the thought that the Government has aided and abetted the Virginian Power Co. to obtain a monopoly in the Kanawha Valley, that it has made a settlement with that company all to the advantage of the company, and that the manifest effort in the first instance was to prevent the Government from developing its own power at Nitro, so that the field might be left open for the Virginian Power Co. I am attaching hereto a copy of these contract settlements.

My conclusions are these: I have found in my experience what seems to me a disposition among Government agents and employees to disregard to some extent the interests of the Government of the United States in making settlements and to look first at the interest of the fellow who is making the settlement for the Government, forgetting that they represent the United States of America, forgetting our Government has rights that ought to be protected. Every man who makes a settlement for the United States, every agent of the United States Government, ought at all times to remember the interests of the people of the country whom he represents, because he represents the taxpayers of the country.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I want to see if I understand the facts as presented by the committee. Something over $60,000,000 was spent in the erection of this plant. Somewhere between $9,000,000 and $10,000,000 is there to-day in movable property. A bid that was substantially larger than any of these actually submitted was in process of submission, but in order to finance that bid it was necessary to have the support of a large bank, and that bank at the last moment withdrew its support on intimation from somebody somewhere to the bank that it would be better to do so. The highest bid actually submitted was $5,800,000.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. That is the exact situation.

Now, I want to add this: There is a disposition among some of those who are doing business with the Government to assume that the public purse is a public grab bag, where he who grabs most is most to be envied. I desire to say very emphatically that, so far as the committee of which I am chairman is concerned, we expect to vigilantly survey these settlements, so far as we are able, and the contractor who has by fraud or circumvention driven an unjust bargain with the Government will receive our most earnest attention.

MEMORANDUM OF ADJUSTMENT BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND THE VIRGINIAN POWER CO., DATED SEPTEMBER 5, 1919.

This memorandum of adjustment, made this 5th day of September, 1919, between the Virginian Power Co., a corporation created and organized under the laws of the State of Massachusetts, and having its office and place of business at Charleston, in the State of West Virginia, hereinafter called the Power Co., party of the first part, and the United States of America, acting through and represented by R. H. Hawkins, lieutenant colonel, Ordnance Department (hereinafter called the Contracting Officer), acting under direction of the Chief of Ordnance and by authority of the Secretary of War, party of the second part, witnesseth:

Whereas the Congress of the United States has declared by joint resolution, approved April 6, 1917, that war exists between the United States of America and Germany; and

Whereas an administrative unit having been created in the office of the Secretary of War and designated United States Government Explosives Plants, and the said Secretary of War having appointed D. C. Jackling director thereof; and

Whereas the national emergency required the construction of an explosives plant at Nitro, W. Va., under a contract authorized by the United States; and

Whereas the Secretary of War and the Fuel Administrator of the United States requested that in the execution of the work and in the operation of said plant consideration be given to the conservation of fuel; and

Whereas the United States approved such a plan and proposed the substitution of central station electric power for electric current generated at said explosives plant; and

Whereas under date of March 1 and March 8, 1918, the United States of America and the Virginian Power Co. entered into agreements for the purchase of rights of way and the construction and installation of certain transmission lines thereon and for substations, generators, boilers, and auxiliaries therefor in connection with the power company plant and power system at Cabin Creek Junction, W. Va., known as the construction contracts and for the delivery of power to the Government explosive plant, at Nitro, W. Va., which latter contract is entitled "Contract for electric power operating"; and

Whereas the signing of the armistice by the United States of America, the Allies, and the central European powers have brought about a cessation of hostilities, thus eliminating the need of the aforesaid explosive plant at Nitro, W. Va.; and

Whereas the United States of America no longer desires the delivery of electric power at said Government explosive plant, at Nitro, W. Va., by the said power company; and

Whereas the Secretary of War, on the 6th day of December, 1918, issued an order to the said D. C. Jackling, the director of the United States explosive plant at Nitro, W. Va., to proceed at once to suspend, cancel, adjust, and settle all contracts made necessary by the discontinuance of the construction work upon said explosive plant at Nitro, W. Va., and authorize the sale of such materials as could be most advantageously salvaged in that manner; and

Whereas on February 4, 1919, the Secretary of War issued an order relieving the said Director Jackling of all functions and duties of every kind whatsoever in connection with the contracts hereinbefore mentioned and transferring such functions and duties to the Chief of Ordnance by him to be performed or by such officer as the said Chief of Ordnance might designate and appoint; and

Whereas on February 8, 1919, the said Chief of Ordnance appointed J. M. S. Waring, lieutenant colonel, Ordnance Department, United States Army, as his special representative to carry out the provisions of the order made by the Secretary of War on February 4, 1919, as aforesaid; and

Whereas on the 17th day of July, 1919, the said Chief of Ordnance issued an order instructing his special representative, the said Lieut. Col. J. M. S. Waring, to submit an agreement with the said power company adjusting the obligations between the parties hereto growing out of the contracts aforesaid:

Now, therefore, in consideration of the premises, mutual agreements, terms, and stipulations hereinafter set forth, the said power company covenants and agrees to pay within 15 days from the execution of this agreement to the Treasurer of the United States $81,865.04 by certified check, or in such other form as may be acceptable to the said Treasurer of the United States of America, and the power company further agrees to serve to the United States power for its use at the naval ordnance plant at South Charleston, W. Va., according to the terms of and under the provisions of a proposal heretofore submitted to the United States hereafter exhibited with this memorandum, and both parties hereto mutually agree to the cancellation of the contract dated March 8, 1918, and designated "Contract for electric power operating," and same is hereby canceled.

1. The power company admits the payment of all those costs incurred by it under said contract of March 8, 1918, designated as "Contract for electric power operating," that are shown in Exhibit 1, herewith made a part of this memorandum, and releases the United States from any further obligation on these costs.

2. The power company agrees to acquire rights of way and do the necessary construction work for the installation of transmission lines and substations for the delivery of power to the United States naval-ordnance plant at South Charleston, W. Va., according to the terms and conditions of said contracts of March 1 and 8, 1918, which provide for the purchase of the right of way and construction work, respectively, both of which are to remain in full force and effect.

3. The power company admits the adjustment and settlement of all costs of construction under the two contracts last mentioned as listed and shown in said Exhibit No. 1.

4. The United States of America agrees to and does herewith sell, transfer, assign, deliver, and grant unto the power company such title as may now be vested in the said United States of America, all rights of way for transmission lines shown in Exhibit No. 3 herewith made part of this memorandum, and all transmission lines and substations constructed at the request of the United States Fuel Administration, specifically set out in Exhibit No. 2, herewith made a part of this memorandum; also the storehouse, hoist house extension and lean-to on the premises of the power company at Cabin Creek Junction, as shown in Exhibit No. 2 aforesaid; also a miscellaneous quantity of merchandise, material, equipment, and supplies now in the possession of the power company, and shown in said Exhibit No. 2; but nothing included in this paragraph shall embrace the material, equipment, or supplies now in the possession of the power company which may be required for the construction of the transmission lines to the said naval-ordnance plant at South Charleston, and as shown by Exhibit No. 4, herewith made a part of this memorandum.

5. The United States of America acknowledges adjustment and settlement for all materials herein or heretofore transferred to the said power company, as shown in Exhibit 2, attached hereto.

6. The power company covenants and agrees that no Member of Congress, or Delegate to Congress, or Resident Commissioner is or shall be admitted to any share or part of this agreement or to any benefit which may arise therefrom; but under the provisions of section 116 of the act of Congress approved March 4, 1909 (35 Stat., 1109), this stipulation, so far as it relates to Members of or Delegates to Congress or Resident Commisioners, shall not extend or be construed to extend to any agreement made with an incorporated company for its general benefit.

7. The power company expressly warrants that it has employed no third person to solicit or obtain this contract in its behalf, or to cause or procure the same to be obtained upon compensation in any way contingent in whole or in part upon such procurement, and that it has not paid or permitted or agreed to pay to any third person, in consideration of such procurement or in compensation for services in connection therewith, any brokerage, commission, or percentage upon the amount received by it hereunder, and that it has not in estimating the contract price demanded by it included any sum by reason of any such brokerage, commission, or percentage; and that all moneys payable to it hereunder are free from obligation to any other person for services rendered or supposed to have been rendered in the procurement of this contract. It further agrees that any breach of this warranty shall constitute cause for the annulment of this contract by the United States, and that the United States may retain to its own use from any sum due or to become due hereunder an amount equal to any brokerage, commission, or percentage so paid or agreed to be paid.

In witness whereof the said power company has caused its corporate name and seal to be hereto affixed by its vice president hereunto duly authorized, and the said United States of America has caused this agreement to be executed by its duly authorized representative.

THE VIRGINIAN POWER CO.,
(Signed) By H. G. SCOTT, Vice President.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
(Signed) By R. H. HAWKINS,
Lieutenant Colonel, Ordnance Department, United States Army, Contracting Officer.

Witness:
HELEN HIETT.

This agreement made the ——— day of ———, A. D. 1919, by and between the Virginian Power Co., a corporation created under the laws of the State of Massachusetts, having an office and place of business at Charleston, W. Va., hereinafter called the Company, party of the first part, and the United States, hereinafter called the Consumer, represented by the Secretary of the Navy, party of the second part.

Whereas the Congress of the United States having declared by joint resolution approved April 6, 1917, that war exists between the United States of America and Germany; and

Whereas the national emergency required the construction of an explosive plant at Nitro, W. Va., which contract was authorized by the United States; and

Whereas the Secretary of War and the Fuel Administrator of the United States requested that in the execution of the work and the operation of the plant, consideration be given to the conservation of fuel; and

Whereas the United States approved such a plan, and proposed the substitution of central station electric power for electric current generated at the explosives plant; and

Whereas under date of March 8, 1918, the United States Government and the Virginian Power Co. entered into agreements for the construction and installation of certain transmission lines, substations, generators, boilers, and auxiliaries therefor, in connection with the company's plant and power system at Cabin Creek Junction, W. Va., known as the Construction Contract, and for the delivery of power to the Government explosives plant at Nitro, W. Va., which latter contract is entitled "Contract for electric-power operating"; and

Whereas the signing of an armistice by the United States of America, the Allies, and the central European powers having brought about a cessation of hostilities, thus eliminating the need for the aforesaid explosives plant at Nitro, W. Va.; and

Whereas the United States no longer desires the delivery of electric power at said Government explosives plant at Nitro, W. Va., but desires that new arrangements be made for the delivery of said electric power:

Now, therefore, this agreement witnesseth, That the said party of the first part and the said party of the second part do covenant and agree to and with each other as follows:

First. The Company will furnish and deliver and the Consumer will take and pay for electric power for its requirements at the naval ordnance plant, South Charleston, W. Va., in the form of 3-phase, 60-cycle alternating current, at the pressure of approximately 44,000 and 66,000 volts at the high-tension switch at said naval ordnance plant, South Charleston, W. Va., in an amount not exceeding 20,000 kilowatts, based on a 90 per cent power factor, for the remainder of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920. In case of necessary shut down of the Government 20,000-kilowatt unit installed in the Cabin Creek power station of the Company, the Company will provide for service to the Consumer capacity not exceeding 14,000 kilowatts, based on a 90 per cent power factor.

Second. The Company agrees to furnish and the Consumer agrees to take a minimum of 12,000,000 kilowatt-hour each and every year during the life of this agreement, as renewed from time to time beginning from date of commencement of service: Provided, however, That the minimum demand agreed to be furnished by the Company and taken by the Consumer during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, shall be a minimum average of 500,000 kilowatt-hour per month. If the Consumer does not take the minimum amount of power contracted for the difference shall be billed and paid for at the rate prevailing in the month or months in which the deficiency occurred.

Third. The company will endeavor at all times to furnish a continuous supply of electric power to the consumer; but the company will not be liable for any damage that the United States may suffer by reason of failure of the supply of electric power caused by accident or any other cause beyond the company's control. It is understood, however, that whenever possible the company will give the consumer notice of its intention to shut off the service, and that so far as possible the service will be shut off only at such times as will cause the consumer the minimum of inconvenience. As part consideration for this contract, the consumer agrees to reimburse the company for any costs or damages that may be awarded or adjudicated against the company by reason of injuries to persons or property accruing or resulting from any use of such electricity within the limits of the Naval Ordnance plant, except that the consumer shall not reimburse the company for injuries to the persons or property of the company's employees.

Fourth. The consumer agrees to pay the company for all electric power delivered and taken or contracted for by the consumer as recorded by the company's meter installed on the high-tension side at the Government substation located at the naval ordnance plant, South Charleston, W. Va., at the following rates:

A charge of 6 mills ($0.006) per kilowatt hour, when the cost of coal to the party of the first part is $1.75 per short ton delivered at the power plant of the company at Cabin Creek Junction, W. Va. Should the price of coal to the company at said plant per short ton be increased or decreased from the price given above, the rate per kilowatt hour shall be increased or decreased one-tenth of a mill for each 10 cents of such increase or decrease. Bills for said electric power shall be rendered monthly by the company to the Government on or before the 10th day of each month for electric power consumed during the preceding month. Maintenance of meters at high voltage being difficult, it is agreed that the company may measure power delivered to the consumer at 6,600 volts, and adjust such measurement to measurement at 66,000 or 44,000 volts by using a factor representing the loss in transformation, which factor shall be determined by the Government.

Fifth. The consumer shall at all times have access to the plant and property of the company for the purpose of ascertaining if proper precautions are being taken for providing reserves in case of emergency, and further to ascertain whether equipment furnished by the Government is being properly maintained as required by this agreement, or for such other reasons as may be deemed necessary or desirable, and it is further agreed that the consumer shall have the right to advise the company regarding the operation of the plant or the maintenance of the equipment owned by the Government.

Sixth. The consumer shall advise the company from time to time of its prospective needs for electric power, in order that the company may more efficiently and economically operate its station, and at the same time provide the capacity required by the consumer.

Seventh. It is agreed and understood that the company shall have the right to operate the apparatus and equipment furnished by the Government for the generation of electric power at the Cabin Creek plant of the company whenever in its judgment it shall be considered necessary or desirable.

Eighth. The company shall have the right to connect up on Government line No. 2 an industrial load, the character of which shall be subject to the approval of the United States not exceeding an aggregate maximum demand of 3,000 kilowatts; in return for this concession the Government shall have the right to use the company's present two-circuit line from Cabin Creek Junction to Charleston, W. Va., for the delivery of electric power to the Naval Ordnance plant at South Charleston, W. Va., whenever occasion demands. In case of failure on the part of the company to deliver electric power of the required capacity over Government line No. 2, the aforesaid two-circuit line shall be capable of delivering a capacity of 14,000 kilowatts to the naval ordnance plant.

Ninth. In the event of dispute as to the accuracy of the company's meters, the consumer shall have the right to make a written request to have them tested and, if necessary, recalibrated, and, if found to be incorrect, proper allowance shall be made, but not for a longer period than 30 days prior to the time when written complaint of such inaccuracy is made. If the company's meters are found to be correct within 2 per cent above or below standard, the expense of the test and recalibration shall be borne by the consumer; otherwise the cost of the test and recalibration shall be borne by the company. If the meters of the company are found to be incorrect by more than 2 per cent above or below standard, then the bill for electric power from and including said 30-day period to the time of test shall be corrected accordingly; otherwise no allowance shall be made by either party. If for any reason the electric power furnished by the company and taken by the consumer shall fail to be registered by the meters, the amount of such power shall be determined by the consumer from the best available data, judged by previous registrations and by knowledge of the Government load, and payment therefor shall be made accordingly.

Tenth. The company will, during the life of this agreement, or as renewed from time to time, repair and maintain at its expense all apparatus and equipment furnished by the Government at the Cabin Creek plant of the company; and, further, the company will furnish all labor necessary to maintain in operation power transmission line No. 2 and the line from Charleston to South Charleston, the consumer to furnish all materials required for such maintenance of transmission lines.

Eleventh. The United States will, without expense to the company, supply all necessary rights of way for transmission lines on its property and a suitable place thereon for the installation of such equipment of the company as may be necessary for the supply or measurement of electric power to the consumer.

Twelfth. The consumer will not permit anyone to interfere with the meters or other appliances of the company, and will further take precautions for the protection and safe-keeping of such meters and other appliances.

Thirteenth. The company shall have the right of access to said premises at all reasonable times during the period of this agreement and on its termination for the purpose of reading meters or inspecting or repairing appliances used in connection with the furnishing of electric power under this contract, or for removing its property, and for any other purpose proper under this agreement.

Fourteenth. Under and by virtue of that certain contract for construction work by and between the Government and the Virginian Power Co., dated March 8, 1918, the United States will furnish necessary line materials, generators, boilers, substations and auxiliaries, procure or cause to be procured necessary rights of way, and construct or cause to be constructed an electric transmission line extending from the company's plant at Cabin Creek Junction, W. Va., to the Naval Ordnance Plant, South Charleston, W. Va., to be known as Government line No. 2, and also a transmission line extending from the terminus of the company's present two-circuit line in the company's substation at Charleston, W. Va., to the Naval Ordnance Plant, South Charleston, W. Va., adequate for the furnishing of electric power as herein provided. During the continuation of this agreement, or until such time as the contract to purchase is enforced, the company will pay to the United States semiannually, on or about the 1st day of July and the 1st day of January next following, covering the preceding six months' period, the following rental:

(a) For the generators, boilers, substations, and auxiliaries furnished by the Government and installed at the company's plant at Cabin Creek Junction, W. Va., an annual rental equal to 9 per cent of the cost of the demand capacity used by the company, after deducting from the total maximum demand of the Government and the company a demand equal to the company's agreed existing capacity, 20,000 kilowatts, plus the actual demand capacity furnished the Government, determined as follows:

Let A = maximum demand in k. w., measured at the company's plant at Cabin Creek Junction, W. Va.

Let B = total demand in k. w., measured at the outdoor substation at the Naval Ordnance Plant, South Charleston, W. Va., in the same hour in which A is measured.

Let C = cost to the Government of the equipment furnished and installed by it at the company's plant at Cabin Creek Junction, W. Va.

Then $\frac{C}{20000}$ (A—(20000 plus B) = cost of demand capacity upon which an annual rental shall be paid.

"Demand" as used above shall mean the kilowatt hours of output in one integral hour; maximum demand shall mean the demand occurring at the time of maximum load on the Virginian Power Co.'s system.

Fifteenth. In case of interruption of service due to causes beyond the control of either of the parties hereto each party shall use the greatest possible speed in rectifying the cause of the trouble; in such case neither party shall have any claim against the other for damages caused by inability to give or take power as provided in this contract during the period of disability.

Sixteenth. The period of service under this agreement shall be from the date of the commencement of furnishing electric power to the consumer, and continuing thereafter until in the judgment of the Government the need for electric power under this agreement no longer exists; not extending, however, beyond June 30, 1920, except that after said date this agreement may be renewed from year to year, at the option of the Government, in order to insure continuous service.

Seventeenth. The Government, by its duly authorized representative, shall at all times be afforded proper facilities for the inspection of all plants and equipment engaged in furnishing services under this agreement, and at all times shall have access to the premises and to all books, records, correspondence, plans, drawings, receipts, and memoranda of every description of the company pertaining to said services.

Eighteenth. The Government reserves the right to terminate this agreement upon the termination of the period of service, as defined under clause 16 above, provided, however, that the Government shall give the company written notice 30 days prior to the date of termination of its intention so to do.

Nineteenth. The company agrees to purchase the equipment furnished by the Government to the company used in supplying electric power to the naval ordnance plant, except the transmission line along the K. & M. right of way, within three years from the date of receipt of written notice from the Government so to do; provided, however, that the company shall not be forced to purchase the apparatus prior to June 27, 1924, or permitted to purchase same until they have received notice so to do, and that the Government shall have the right to renew this contract throughout this three-year period, as provided under paragraph 16 above. The price to be paid the Government for equipment purchased under this contract by the company shall be determined by a board of three members, one member of which shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Navy, one by the company, and the two members so appointed shall appoint a third. If either party dissents from the decision of the board, then the question shall be referred to the Court of Claims, whose decision shall be final. Nothing herein contained shall prevent the Government from disposing of its property at the best price obtainable, except that upon receiving an offer for the disposal of any portion of its property used in the furnishing or the transmission of electric power under this agreement the Government shall notify the company of the receipt of such offer and a preferential right of purchase shall be accorded the company, which right, however, must be exercised by the company within 10 calendar days after the receipt of such notice in writing.

Twentieth. In the event of the failure of the company to comply with the stipulations of this agreement, as hereinbefore set forth, the consumer shall have the right to procure the necessary electric power in such manner as may be deemed best for the interests of the Government. In case of failure of the company to so operate and maintain its power stations and transmission lines and the transmission lines and the property of the Government used by the company as to provide a suitable and continuous supply of electric power to the naval ordnance plant, South Charleston, W. Va., during the continuation of this agreement the consumer may require the company to make such changes in its operating force and equipment as shall in the opinion of the consumer be necessary in order to provide said continuous and reliable supply of electric power for the naval ordnance plant, South Charleston, W. Va., and such maintenance of Government property.

Twenty-first. No transfer of this agreement or of any interest therein shall be made by the company to any other party, and in case of the violation of this provision the consumer, reserving all rights of action for any breach of this agreement by the company, may refuse to carry out this agreement with either the transferer or the transferee. However, subject to the option of the Government to annul this agreement under the circumstances as stated above, should the company sell, dispose of, or transfer the plant and equipment to be used in the performance of this agreement to any other party or parties such sale or transfer shall be made only on the conditions that the successor of the company in the ownership of the plant and equipment shall assume the obligations of this agreement and perform the stipulations therein set forth according to their true intent and meaning, said successor to be bound as fully and to the same extent by the provisions of this agreement as is the company.

Twenty-second. No Member of or Delegate to Congress, or Resident Commissioner, is or shall be admitted to any share or part of this agreement, or to any benefit which may arise therefrom, but, under the provisions of section 116 of the act of Congress approved March 4, 1909 (35 Stats., 1109), this stipulation, so far as it relates to Members of or Delegates to Congress, or Resident Commissioners, shall not extend or be construed to extend to any agreement made with an incorporated company for its general benefit.

Twenty-third. In the performance of this agreement the said company shall not, directly or indirectly, employ any person undergoing sentence of imprisonment at hard labor which may have been imposed by a court of any State, Territory, or municipality having criminal jurisdiction, nor permit such employment by any person furnishing labor or materials to said company for use in fulfillment of this agreement.

Twenty-fourth. The company shall hold and have the United States Government and all officers and agents thereof harmless from and against all demands of any nature or kind for or on account of the use and continued use of any patented article, combination, or process which may apply to or affect the articles, materials, or services furnished under this agreement.

Twenty-fifth. The party of the first part expressly warrants that he has employed no third person to solicit or obtain this contract in his behalf, or to cause or procure the same to be obtained upon compensation in any way contingent, in whole or in part, upon such procurement; and that he has not paid, or promised or agreed to pay, to any third person, in consideration of such procurement, or in compensation for services in connection therewith, any brokerage, commission, or percentage upon the amount receivable by him hereunder; and that he has not, in estimating the contract price demanded by him, included any sum by reason of any such brokerage, commission, or percentage; and that all moneys payable to him hereunder are free from obligation to any other person for services rendered, or supposed to have been rendered, in the procurement of this contract. He further agrees that any breach of this warranty shall constitute adequate cause for the annulment of this contract by the United States, and that the United States may retain to its own use from any sums due or to become due thereunder an amount equal to any brokerage, commission, or percentage so paid, or agreed to be paid.

Twenty-sixth. Subject to the consent hereto of the Secretary of War or his duly authorized representative, upon the signing of this agreement, the obligation of the Government to take and of the power company to furnish power under the "contract for electric-power operating," entered into under date of March 8, 1918, by and between the United States of America and the Virginian Power Co., shall cease and determine, but all other rights and obligations thereunder unless specifically modified herein shall remain intact.

In witness whereof, the parties aforesaid have hereto placed their hands the date first hereinbefore written.

THE VIRGINIAN POWER CO.,

Memorandum.

The equipment, material, supplies, transmission lines, etc., which are transferred to the Virginian Power Co. by the United States of America by virtue of contract of which this memorandum is a part, consists mainly of rights of way, poles, fixtures, hardware, conductors, insulators, transformers, switches, and appurtenances of same, also the hoist-house extension, leanto, and storehouse at Cabin Creek Junction, but equipment at Cabin Creek Junction which is contained in the list of material in the possession of the power company and to be used in constructing lines to the naval ordnance plant on rights of way owned by the Government or the transmission line on the Kanawha & Michigan Railway is not included.

The equipment, material, supplies, transmission lines, etc., transferred are more especially described in the following sheets:

U. S. 3.

Burnwell to Leewood, 4.53 miles, 44,000 volt, single circuit, wood pole transmission line, B-arrow arms, 2/0 stranded copper, 40-foot wood poles, Thomas disk insulators No. 1129, Thomas pine insulators No. 4000.

Wierwood to Milburn, 8.82 miles, 44,000 volt, single circuit, wood pole transmission line, wishbone cross arms, 2/0 copper conductors, 40-foot poles, Thomas disk insulators No. 1129, Thomas pine insulators No. 4000.

U. S. 3.

Changing copper on Sun-Pax line, 4.76 miles, from ¼-inch copper clad to 2/0 stranded.

Changing copper on Paint Creek Co. line, 5.34 miles, from No. 2 solid copper to 2/0 stranded copper. Total length 10.10.

U. S. 4.

Layland, W. Va., 44,000–23 volt, wood substation, 3–300 K. V. A. Westinghouse transformers.

Berry to Layland, W. Va., 6.06 miles, 44,000 volt, single circuit, wood pole transmission line, wishbone cross arms, No. 2 copper conductors, 40-foot poles, Thomas disk insulators No. 1129, Thomas pin insulators No. 4000.

Layland, W. Va., 2,300 volt wood pole distribution line, 35-foot poles, Thomas disk insulators No. 1074, Thomas pin insulators No. 1009, 3/0 copper conductor. Total length 15 miles.

U. S. 5.

Gamoca to Ansted, 5.75 miles, 44,000 volt single circuit, wood pole transmission line, wishbone arms, ¼-inch copper-clad conductors and ground wire, 40-foot poles, Thomas No. 1129 disk insulators, Thomas No. 4000 pin insulators.

Ansted, W. Va., 2,300 volt single circuit, wood pole distributing line, No. 2 solid copper, 30-foot poles, Thomas disk insulators No. 1074, Thomas pin insulators No. 1009.

Ansted, W. Va., 1.05 miles 2,300 volt, single circuit, wood pole distribution line, 2/0 stranded copper, 30-foot poles, Thomas disk insulators No. 1974, Thomas pin insulators No. 1009.

U. S. 5.

44,000–2,300 volt, wood substation, 3–200 K. V. A. Westinghouse transformers, 30-foot poles, located at Ansted, W. Va.

U. S. 6.

Appalachian tie line, 12.1 miles, survey only for tie line from Hot Coal to Mulles, W. Va.

U. S. 7.

Campbells Creek line, Dana to Big Bottom, 3.74 miles; 44,000-volt, single-circuit, wood-pole transmission line; bow-arrow arms; 40-ft. poles; ¼" copper-clad conductors; Thomas disk insulators, No. 1129; Thomas pin insulators, No. 4000.

U. S. 8.

McAlpin, W. Va., 44,000–2,300-volt, wood substation, 3–200 K. V. A. Westinghouse transformers, 30' poles.

44,000-volt single-circuit, wood-pole transmission line, bow-arrow crossarms; 40-ft. poles; Thomas disk insulators, No. 1129; 2/0 stranded copper conductor.

McAlpin, W. Va., 0.04 miles, 2,300-volt, single-circuit, wood-pole transmission line; 30-ft. poles; 2/0 copper conductors; Thomas disk insulators, No. 1074; Thomas pin insulators, No. 1009.

U. S. 9.

Mordue, W. Va., 44,000–2,300-volt wood substation; 3–250 K. V. A. Pittsburgh transformers; 30-ft. wood poles.

U. S. 10.

Emerson to Eunice, 3.36 miles H. T.; 0.46 miles L. T.; 44,000-volt, single-circuit, wood-pole transmission line; wishbone crossarms; 40-ft. wood poles; ¼" copper clad conductors; 2,300-volt, single-circuit, wood-pole distribution line; 30-ft. poles; 2/0 copper conductors.

U. S. 11.

Paint Creek Coal Mining Co., at Benner, W. Va., 1.13 miles; 44,000–2,300-volt substation and 2,300-volt distribution line to mine No. 2; solid copper conductors.

U. S. 12.

Kellys Creek Colliery Co., Ward, W. Va., 0.52 miles, 2,300-volt, single-circuit, wood-pole distribution line from war substation to mine No. 5.

U. S. 14.

Powellton, W. Va., 0.208 miles H. T. 44,000-volt, single-circuit transmission line; wishbone crossarms; ¼" copper clad conductor; and 2,300-volt, single-circuit distribution line to Vulcan mine, 1/0 solid copper conductors.

U. S. 15.

Vincova, W. Va., 44,000–2,300-volt wood substation and 2,300-volt distribution line; No. 2 copper conductor.

U. S. 16.

Berlin, W. Va., 44,000–2,000-volt wood substation; 3–100 K. V. A. Pittsburgh transformers; 30-ft. poles.

U. S. 17.

Beards Fork, W. Va., 44,000–2,300-volt wood substation; 2–200 K. V. A. Westinghouse transformers.

U. S. 18.

Minden, W. Va., 44,000–2,300-volt, double-circuit, steel substation.

Minden, W. Va., 0.23 miles, 44,000-volt, double-circuit, wood-pole transmission line; bow-arrow crossarms; 40-ft. poles; ¼" copper clad conductors; Thomas disk insulators, No. 1129; Thomas pin insulators, No. 4000.

Minden, W. Va., 2.29 miles, 2,300-volt, single-circuit, wood-pole distribution line; 30-ft. poles; Thomas disk insulators; Thomas pin insulators, No. 1009; 4/0 copper conductors.

One brick warehouse, including floor slab. Both warehouse and floor slab are supported by a concrete settling basin, the title of which remains vested in the Government.

One brick leanto, being an extension of the Virginian Power Co.'s control room.

The extension to the Virginian Power Co.'s hoist house, this structure being of brick.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have 10 minutes more and that I may have 5 minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois shall have 10 minutes additional, and that he shall have 5 minutes additional. Is there objection?

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I regret, but the Committee on Education can not give way further. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, may I call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio to the fact that we are asking for only 15 minutes more? There is one phase which the gentleman has discussed to which reference was not made in his original statement, and to which I would like to refer a moment. I am asking that he have five minutes more than I.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, we have given way before, and this is the third time that we have given way. Others are asking us further to give way, after the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] is through. We must have some place where we shall stop, and I object.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I shall have to make the same request, although I never do that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE BUDGET.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 9783) to provide for a national budget be given a privileged status in order that it may be called up without bringing in a rule at the conclusion of the consideration of the bill H. R. 4438, the vocational education bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the budget bill be given a privileged status so that it may be taken up after the education bill. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—and I shall not object—I want to ask the gentleman how much time we are going to have to discuss the bill?

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I have talked with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], the ranking Democratic member on the committee, and we have rather come to the conclusion that it would be better not to ask any definite time to be fixed in order that free opportunity may be given for discussion of the bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I think that bill is one of the most important that has been suggested in this Congress. It is an entirely new departure and should be thoroughly discussed, and of course the speeches should be confined to the subject.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Unless we have assurance that we will have free discussion of it, I would object.

Mr. GOOD. Mr Speaker, I would say to the gentleman that when we reach the bill I shall ask that general debate be confined to the bill. So far as I am concerned, I want to say that absolutely full and free discussion of the merits of the bill shall be given every Member of the House who desires to speak.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is very important, and the House ought to know now how much time shall be given to a discussion of the bill, so that both sides may be given an opportunity to be heard. I shall object to any unanimous consent unless we have an understanding that both sides shall be given an opportunity to be heard on this all-important proposition, as was pointed out by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I have just said that, so far as I am concerned, I shall do all I can to see to it that the discussion shall be full and free, and that anyone who wants to speak on the bill shall be given full opportunity to discuss it.

Mr. HAUGEN. If that is the purpose, then the gentleman can have no objection to now fixing the time for general debate, when he asks unanimous consent. I think the gentleman should ask for a limit of time, so that we may know what is going to take place, so that we may be assured that the opposition is going to be heard as well as the proponents of the measure.

Mr. GOOD. I will say to the gentleman that the bill that I have referred to has no relation and does not refer to the resolution changing the rules of the House. That will not be brought up under this bill at all.

Mr. HAUGEN. I only wish it could be brought up in connection with this bill, so that we might discuss the two propositions at one time, so that it might be decided whether we are going to increase the Appropriations Committee or decrease the committees to one. If we are going to adopt this system, one which has been condemned, discredited, and discarded by other nations that have tried it, there ought to be full and free discussion of the subject, and if we are going to force it on the House now by unanimous consent, then we should understand that free opportunity shall be given to those who are opposed to the bill as well as to the proponents of the measure. If the time is to be disposed of, let it be divided and fixed now, so that the opposition may be heard as well as the proponents.

Mr. GOOD. I will say to my colleague that if unanimous consent is not given it will be necessary to ask for a rule. The rule which will be asked for will not limit the debate. We do not desire to limit debate now, because if we should fix on 12 hours, the amount that has been talked about for debate, there might be objection on the floor of the House to agreeing to that much time. I am willing that the House shall debate it for 12 hours or longer time, if Members want to discuss it. I have no disposition to shut off debate. I think debate should be free and open. I hope the gentleman will not object, because that will simply mean that we must take up an hour in discussing the rule.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, generally it has been customary for the House to determine and not the Committee on Rules or any other committee. That matter can be discussed and arranged at that time.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Of course, I take it that it would be impossible to undertake to fix the time now in advance of taking up the bill, but I want to supplement what the chairman of the committee has said. There is no disposition upon the part of any member of the Special Budget Committee or any Member of the House to prevent free discussion of this bill. We all recognize that it is one of the most important pieces of legislation that has been brought before the House. It is the disposition of every member of the committee, in connection with the chairman, to see to it, so far as we can, that everyone who wants to discuss it may have the fullest and freest opportunity to do so.

Mr. HAUGEN. There is no question that it is a most important question to depart from established practice and plunge headlong into a proposition that has proven a failure and been condemned in other countries, and which other nations are now turning heaven and earth to get away from. You are now going to foist it upon the country in 12 hours of debate——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There has been no suggestion as to how many hours of debate.

Mr. HAUGEN. You are not willing to leave it to the House to determine the debate that shall be granted. It has been customary when unanimous consent is made that we agree upon a time, that we may have an idea as to when the matter is to be disposed of.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Why resort to this practice? What is the necessity of it? Are you so afraid of it? Why should not light be shed upon it?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I object.

INDUSTRIAL VOCATIONAL REHABILITATION.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 4438.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 4438.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4438, with Mr. MADDEN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4438) to provide for the promotion of vocational rehabilitation of persons disabled in industry or otherwise and their return to civil employment.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, the committee amendment, I suppose, will take precedence over any other amendment?

Mr. WALSH. We do not have to vote on a committee amendment before another can be offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON: On page 4, line 1, beginning with the word "that," strike out all of the balance of the paragraph and insert in lieu thereof the following: "The vocational rehabilitation provided for herein shall be given under the supervision and control of the State board, and all courses shall be available, under such rules and regulations as the Federal board shall prescribe, to all persons in such destitute circumstances that they are financially unable to provide their own rehabilitation, disabled in industrial pursuits, including agriculture, trade, commerce, manufacturing, mining, transportation, all mechanic arts, and to civil employees of the United States disabled while in the performance of their duty: Provided, That persons who have received compensation for injuries and other disabled persons who are able to pay for same may be given rehabilitation training upon paying reasonable tuition therefor."

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNER. There is a committee amendment pending. Is it not the practice that the committee amendment shall be disposed of before other amendments are offered?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that is the practice; but it has not been called up by the committee. In this case the gentleman from Texas was recognized before any member of the committee undertook to call up the committee amendment.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I called the attention of the Chair to the matter.

The CHAIRMAN. But the gentleman from Texas had been recognized before the gentleman did that.

Mr. BLANTON. And I am also a member of the committee, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. That would not make any difference as to the committee amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, during the general debate on this bill the other day I called the attention of the committee to the fact that in stating the purpose of this bill in the beginning it stated that it was to provide rehabilitation to those disabled persons who were unable financially to provide it for themselves, and yet when this bill attempts to define the persons who would be entitled to this training it left out entirely those persons disabled who were in destitute circumstances and who were not able to pay for the training. The colloquy which occurred between the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] on this very subject showed conclusively that the bill does not do that which it intends and purports to do. The preamble of the bill starts out by saying that it is to provide rehabilitation to those persons who are without sufficient means to provide for their own rehabilitation, yet the chairman admits that the bill will do nothing of the kind, as the only persons it will furnish any relief to are those able to pay tuition for such training, for when the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] asked, "What about those persons disabled who are in destitute circumstances and who are not able to pay for it," the distinguished educator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] answered, "Oh, they are unfortunate; they are unfortunate." Now, disabled persons who have property and money do not need any consideration from Congress so far as rehabilitation is concerned. They can go to the best institutions and employ the best talent of this Nation and be rehabilitated and retrained educationally. It is the poor devil who has nothing, who has had his arms or legs or eyes taken from him, who has to meet the world in competition, and who has nothing in the way of property—he is the one, if any, who should be entitled to this training.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In a moment. He is the one who should get this training if anyone should get it at all. Now, I called the attention of the chairman to that fact, and I call the attention of this committee to the fact, that the only provision in this bill that names the persons to whom these courses shall be given is found in subdivision 5 under section 2 of the bill. It says that civil employees of this Government shall be entitled to it, and that was an amendment which was suggested by the Senate committee, if you please. If you pass this bill as it is in its present state you would find that no persons are entitled to this training except civil employees of this Government who have been injured during the course of thier employment. I now yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I did not catch the gentleman's amendment clearly. Does it provide that any person in any walk of life or pursuit shall obtain the benefits of this bill?

Mr. BLANTON. It provides that every person in any one of these industrial vocations, including farming, who shall become injured and who is in destitute circumstances and unable to pay for his rehabilitation shall receive this training free.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Why not provide for every destitute person, take all in?

Mr. BLANTON. It takes all persons in except soldiers, and soldiers are provided for by another law. It provides for every class of employee in this land in destitute circumstances, unable to pay for this training, and it should provide for them if such a bill as this is passed at all.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I will.

Mr. BEE. I am in sympathy with the gentleman's statement, but I think the gentleman's use of the word "destitute" is in a rather offensive sense. It rather carries the same meaning as the word "pauperize."

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, no; it does not. It does not carry it to my mind, because I have been in destitute circumstances myself in my earlier life, and I was not ashamed of it, and did not consider it was a disgrace either to me or to any other person similarly situated. It is no disgrace to be poor or in destitute circumstances.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent for two minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. As I understand it, the gentleman's amendment provides for those unable to pay for rehabilitation.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; and that is the very purpose of this bill, as stated in its preamble.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman is a member of the committee. This bill provides rehabilitation for persons generally.

Mr. BLANTON. It says that in the preamble, but when it goes to make provision for it in the bill it just provides for one class, and that is the civil employees of this Government, as contained in subdivision (5).

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Do not the provisions of this bill run to Indians?

Mr. BLANTON. Please do not take up further of my time, because I have only two minutes.

Now, gentlemen, if we are going to carry out the purpose and intent of this bill there must be a provision in it that will take care of a poor person who, as I said the other day, looks through the glass of life darkly. He is the person who should receive the benefits of this bill. He is the one who is entitled to rehabilitation, and without this amendment he may not get it, according to the statement of the chairman in reply to the gentleman from Michigan the other day.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] injects into the bill the item of compensation.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, no.

Mr. FESS. This bill is not written on that basis at all. This bill is simply contributing by the Federal Government a fixed sum, written in the law, for the use of the State, under the approval of the Federal board, and nobody is excluded. There is not anyone excluded from the training. There are 38 States of the Union that maintain compensation commissions administering compensation laws. We do not interfere with them. This is simply opening the training schools for the admission, as administered by the States, for the training of these employees who come to the schools. The Government is not contributing any money at all to individuals, as is the case in the Federal rehabilitation of disabled soldiers. This is not on that basis at all. And I hope that no member of the committee here will be prevailed upon to make out of this a training bill. It is purely a cooperation with the States, in which the Government gives no money to any individual, but gives it to the States to be used in the schools directed by the States, and will not mix the element of compensation in with the training feature.

Mr. ROSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield to my friend from Pennsylvania.

Mr. ROSE. I was present the other day during the colloquy between the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], and now we have the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]. I would like to have the gentleman from Ohio explain the colloquy between himself and the gentleman from Michigan the other day.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman from Texas thinks the Federal Government ought to assist a poor cripple to get into the school by paying his allowance while he is in there.

Mr. BLANTON. I hope the gentleman will not misconstrue my statement. I provide for no allowance, but merely for the tuition. No allowance whatever.

Mr. FESS. The tuition is not charged to anyone unless the State itself will charge it, and that would have to be on the approval of the Federal board. The gentleman's amendment, if he does not mean to support the individual in the school, does not add anything to the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Nothing but his tuition and board; no allowance whatever.

Mr. FESS. The board may be allowed providing the State that is directing the school would permit it, but that would have to be with the approval of the Federal board. I do not think this Congress wants to allow the Federal Government to step over into the States and dictate what shall be done in the States. This would be done by the State boards on the approval of the Federal Government.

Mr. BLANTON. That is what the bill seeks to do.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It says that it shall be under a general plan of supervision determined by the Federal board, and it is either that or nothing, probably. If that is not the case, I would like to know.

Mr. FESS. No money will go from the Federal Treasury unless the use of it is to be approved by the Federal board, and this is by a general plan or provision.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Then there will be no escape from what this Federal board proposes, and we have been through that before.

Mr. FESS. The Federal board will probably do something about the manner in which the administration of the appropriation in the State will take place, but it is wholly a matter of the States, with the approval of the Federal board.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The Federal board telling the States what to do.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman from Washington would not vote money out of the Federal Treasury to go to a State without any suggestion as to how the money was to be used. But we do not step over into the State and control it. We simply say to the State, "If you want it, you accept it upon the approval of the general plan."

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I would not vote for a measure by which the Federal Government would draw the State into this thing.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I am opposed to this amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], because it simply shows the absolute illimitable operation of this bill if it is ever passed. On Saturday I made some remarks, and I am going to make a few more. The principal objection to this bill, in my mind, is—and I wish the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] would listen to what I have to say just now—that it starts up or initiates or begins a brand-new kind of expenditures by the Congress of the United States.

Now, there is no question in the world about that. For instance, on page 8 is set out a lot of salaries. Beginning on line 11 it is provided:

> No salaries shall be paid out of the fund provided in this section in excess of the following amounts: At the rate of $5,000 per annum, to not more than one person; at the rate of $4,000 per annum each, to not more than four persons; at the rate of $3,500 per annum each, to not more than five persons; and no other employee shall receive compensation at a rate in excess of $2,500 per annum.

Now, the number that are under this bill that might receive $2,500 per annum may be very numerous, and what are these men going to do? The $5,000 fellow will tell the $4,500 fellow what to do, and he will tell the $3,500 fellow what to do, and he in turn will tell this brood of $2,500 fellows what to do, and the Government will be loaded down with a lot of salary drawers down there that could not be elected dog pelter in the communities in which they live. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. FESS. This is not in the form of an amendment, but it is in the form of a supplement to the Smith-Hughes Act. The Smith-Hughes Act provides for the use of money in the 48 States. That is for the vocational education of pupils in school. This uses the same facilities to train we already had, adding the additional feature of salvaging the human wreckage which unfortunately is crippled in the industries and on the farms; and in order to use the existing institutions now used by the Smith-Hughes bill, there will be a different sort of training, and medical officers will be required. We provide here for four surgeons to be utilized for the purposes of 48 States in cooperation with the States. The Smith-Hughes Act has 14 districts. Each one is presided over by a director. There is a provision here that there may be an additional person to a district to take care of the industrial cripple. This limitation was put in to secure the thing which my friend the distinguished ex-Speaker is complaining about, and the limit of expenditure is fixed in the appropriation authorized to be made for the administration in the bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know that economy is an exceeding dry theme—dry as a powder house. Anything in favor of cutting down the expenses usually devolves upon the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and his associates and fellow members, because they seem to think that that duty is devolved upon them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to have five minutes more. Dr. FESS used up my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Economy is also a disagreeable subject. It is unpleasant to stand up here and undertake to defeat anybody's plan or scheme. But nevertheless and notwithstanding, I have made up my mind that the time has come when it has to be done. [Applause.] It does not make any difference how unpleasant it is; it is a most important performance to try to secure economy. When I was a boy there was an old rough country doctor in the neighborhood I lived in who was a great hand at making epigrams, and he said, "The most sensitive nerve in the human anatomy is the nerve leading to the pocketbook." I believe it, and we are liable to find it out before very long, when the people conclude they will express their opinion.

While not a pleasant or a cheerful subject, everybody almost is and must be interested in economy, and this bill starts up a brand-new way to spend money. Innumerable bigwigs, male and female, are going about over the country preaching thrift. The Hon. William Gibbs McAdoo, when he was Secretary of the Treasury, Director General of Railroads, and so forth, and so on, and so forth [laughter], in order to encourage thrift stated that he wore half-soled pantaloons. That was a very good example he set, but he did not have that kind on the day we met Pershing over in New York. [Laughter.]

Mr. Secretary of the Treasury Carter Glass made a speech in Richmond some time ago urging thrift, in which he stated that the suit of clothes he had on he had worn five years, and he proposed to continue to wear it until it fell to pieces. [Laughter.] That was a very valuable example. I am not making fun of it at all.

Everybody is enjoined to practice thrift. If you and I and the rest of us are disposed individually to practice thrift, why should not the Congress of the United States practice thrift? [Applause.] And this is the very place to begin. We are the most extravagant people on the globe, and always have been, simply because we are the richest people on the globe. But here is a deficiency staring us in the face of $3,500,000,000 this fiscal year. Where are you going to get the money? How are you going to pay it? Why, there are only two ways in the world, maybe three, to do it. One of them is by economy—a little here and a little there. Another is to increase taxes. The other is to issue bonds, and issuing bonds simply postpones the evil day. They must be paid at last by taxes, together with the interest thereon. We are habituated to extravagance. Hence economy is very difficult for us to initiate or carry into practice. I do not see how 90 per cent of the people of the United States, with these high prices prevailing, manage to make buckle and tongue meet at the end of the year, and in a country where granaries are bursting with grain and cattle feeding on a hundred thousand hills, a large part of the people in this country are hungry. A lot of anemic children are growing up that never will develop into robust men and women.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. FESS. A point of economy: Has the gentleman considered the proposition of taking 22,500 total cripples per year, restoring them and making them self-producing—whether that is economy or not?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I think it is; but I say it belongs to the States. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has again expired.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to have five minutes more, since I have got started.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri may be allowed to finish his remarks, whatever time it takes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri be allowed to complete his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I think that the purpose underlying this bill is a good and laudable purpose. I do not object to that. This plan of a dollar from Uncle Sam and a dollar from the States is very seductive. These legislators will say, "Why, Lord, Lord; here we are getting some money out of Uncle Sam. Let us vote for this bill." [Laughter.]

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Does the gentleman think the Smith-Hughes legislation was a mistake?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No; I do not.

Mr. FESS. Does the gentleman think the Smith-Lever legislation was a mistake?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No; I do not.

Mr. FESS. Does the gentleman think the land-grant-college system was a mistake?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not; but that was away back yonder about the time I was born. As I stated on Saturday, Uncle Sam was land poor when Senator Morrill introduced that bill to give public lands to schools, colleges, and universities. And I say that now, notwithstanding what some of these doctrinaires say, Uncle Sam has no good agricultural land left. There is a whole lot of it that can be made good if you will spend enough money on it for irrigation or drainage. Undoubtedly there are some Indian reservations that will be opened up for settlement after awhile, but they are not a drop in the bucket.

Those bills that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] has named go pretty far themselves. This bill goes much further. The gentleman himself will not deny that this is a brand-new scheme for the expenditure of public money. He can not deny that.

Mr. FESS. If the gentleman will permit, I am not inclined to deny that, because the rehabilitation of the industrially crippled is entirely new for State, Federal, or municipal Government. It is a matter that we are entering upon.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], while he is on his feet, if it is right and proper for the United States Government to employ a lot of doctors to go around and patch up people who are crippled, why is it not a proper function to patch them up for every disease that they may have?

Mr. BUTLER. Tuberculosis.

Mr. FESS. Probably we will do that yet.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. For smallpox, measles, or tuberculosis.

Mr. FESS. I think it would be better to do that than to keep them in sanitariums and poorhouses.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. But is that a national function or a State function?

Mr. FESS. Both.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Are we abolishing the States or not?

Mr. FESS. No; we are encouraging the States; stimulating them. If my friend will yield, past experience has shown that the increase of Federal appropriations for the purposes we have been discussing has not been material, while the increase of State appropriations has reached ten times the original amount; and this amount, if it increases, as I think it will, will not be an enlarged toll on the Federal Government, as the Smith-Hughes Act has not been and as the Smith-Lever Act has not been, but it will be an enlarged toll on the State governments, if they see fit to do it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The very statement of the gentleman himself ought to beat this bill—that it will go on enlarging. Now, where does the State get its money? From taxation. Where does the National Government get its money? From taxation; and we tax the very same people.

Mr. FESS. Has my friend realized the amount of tax that this bill entails on the individual?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes; I realize it.

Mr. FESS. Five cents apiece.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Suppose it is. You start in with a million dollars, and I am willing to bet my ears that if you pass this bill it will be $2,000,000 or $3,000,000 next year. And it will go on until it will be one of the most expensive concerns under the Government of the United States.

Mr. FESS. The first year it is $500,000, the second year $750,000, and the third year it reaches the limit of $1,000,000, and it will not be increased after that if we follow the past experience of the Federal Constitution.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is the limit now in this bill?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The way I made the mistake about the $1,000,000 was in listening to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], who said it was $1,000,000. But if you start this thing, that does not keep Congress from raising the limit.

Mr. FESS. We have not raised it on these other matters.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. They have not been running long enough.

Mr. FESS. The land-grant colleges have been running since the days of the youth of my distinguished friend.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes, they have; but this is not a parallel case at all to that.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman says the amount of those appropriations has not been raised. My recollection is that the Agricultural appropriation bill this year carried $1,500,000 to supplement the permanent appropriation of the Smith-Hughes bill.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman is chairman of the Apropriations Committee. He ought not to allow anything of that kind.

Mr. GOOD. That is under the jurisdiction of the Committee on Agriculture. The gentleman said that the amount of the appropriation under the Smith-Hughes Act had not been enlarged, and I call his attention to the fact that the last Congress did appropriate $1,500,000 in excess of the permanent appropriation carried in the Smith-Hughes Act.

Mr. HAUGEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I can not let that statement go unchallenged. The facts are that the Committee on Agriculture reduced the appropriation for the work $3,000,000 below what it was a year ago instead of increasing it, as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] has stated.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. How much was the appropriation?

Mr. GOOD. You did not reduce the permanent appropriation.

Mr. HAUGEN. We reduced the annual appropriation $3,000,000 below what it was a year ago.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman's committee has no control over the permanent appropriation carried by the Smith-Hughes Act.

Mr. HAUGEN. The permanent appropriation had nothing to do with the appropriation bill.

Mr. GOOD. Certainly.

Mr. HAUGEN. But my statement is that we reduced the amount in the annual appropriation bill for this purpose $3,000,000 below what it was the year before.

Mr. GOOD. Yes; but it did carry $1,500,000.

Mr. HAUGEN. It carried $1,500,000 instead of $5,000,000, which it carried the year before.

Mr. GOOD. That is what I say.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. When I see these Republicans quarreling I think of the one hundred and thirty-third psalm—

Behold, how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity.

Or as the late Mr. Brosius, of Pennsylvania, rendered it on one occasion—

Behold, how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in mutiny.

[Laughter.]

We are extravagant in Congress; we are extravagant in the State legislatures; we are extravagant in the city councils; we act just exactly like money grew on trees.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. This bill provides for dictation by the Federal Government of courses of study. The gentleman from Missouri has plenty of time, and we are all pleased at that; we should like to hear the gentleman say something about the advisability and safety in the Federal Government dictating the study to be pursued in States.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not think the Federal Government has any right or license to do anything of that sort. That was the reason I was talking about the Bureau of Education the other day.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. We have the same thing in the Smith-Hughes bill. The Federal board dictates the course of study.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If there is anything wrong in the Smith-Hughes bill, the gentleman from Ohio ought not to cite it as a precedent.

Mr. FESS. I do not think there is anything wrong in the Smith-Huges bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not know whether there is or not; I have not read it for some time. Mr. Secretary Glass made a speech the other night in Washington, in which he warned Congress that it must let up on all of these unnecessary expenditures; that we are drifting on the rocks. You all know Secretary Glass as well as I do. He is a very able man to begin with, and the duties of his office compel him to study these matters more than any of us study them. Nobody wants to see the United States bonds hawked around over the country at a discount, and nobody wants to see a new issue of bonds if it can be avoided. There is no man in the House that wants to vote for an increase of taxation, and the people do not want it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will.

Mr. STEPHENS of Ohio. In the matter of thrift, would it not be a good idea to have the prohibition ban raised, so that they could sell the large amount of whisky in bond, so that we might raise $500,000,000 in taxes?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The gentleman knows how the House voted and how the Senate voted. In the whisky business the jig is up. [Laughter and applause.] I understand that they are selling moonshine down in Georgia and that country for $15 a quart. I will tell you gentlemen what will happen about these agencies. Every fellow wants to magnify his office. It happens right here. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] is magnifying his office by bringing in this bill, and all the people in the departments and bureaus will magnify their offices. You set this thing agoing and the United States Government agents will be scouring the country finding people who are crippled in order to spend money on them. I am opposed to it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In addition to scouring the country to find men to spend money on, the probability is that the bureau will issue newspapers and monographs and mimeographs at the cost of the Government on the subject.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I have no doubt that that is true. The printing bills of this Government are simply outrageous and scandalous. It does not make any difference who runs it.

One thing more: Nobody appointed me to lecture the Republicans. You men came in with a great blare of trumpets and pronunciamento about what you were going to do. One of those things was that you were going to economize. Here you are, the most extravagant set the sun ever looked down on [laughter and applause on the Democratic side], if you let Dr. FESS get these bills through. I suggest to you gentlemen on the Republican side, that even if the Democrats sit mute on this bill, you should defeat it for your own sakes. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I want to welcome the honored and beloved gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] to the ranks of the economists. I did not discover any great amount of enthusiasm on his side when in the early days of this session we trimmed the appropriation bills nine hundred and thirty-six million and some odd dollars below the amount they carried when his side had them before the House in the last session of Congress.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. All that grew out of the coming of peace, did it not?

Mr. MONDELL. Peace and war one time and another as occasion arose have been made the excuse for a great many things. Gentlemen on that side are now very anxious that we shall not increase the number of Federal agents running hither and thither throughout the country, but in the time of war the gentlemen were very willing, perfectly willing, not only willing but anxious, to increase the Federal agents and agencies to an unlimited extent, by the thousands and tens of thousands, costing millions and hundreds of millions, and they charged it all up to the war.

If a bill came in giving a few deserving Democrats some soft jobs at the expense of the Federal Government, if anybody complained, why, we were not patriotic, we were not supporting the administration in the vigorous prosecution of the war. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

When at the end of hostilities we trimmed a few appropriation bills $1,680,000,000 below the estimates of the administration and $936,000,000 below the guess of the Democratic majority of the last session, gentlemen say it is due to the coming of peace.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Suppose all of that is true, and I do not think it is, is that any justification for an appropriation in a brand-new line that there is no call for?

Mr. MONDELL. No; I think it is not, but I propose to proceed to analyze the proposition before us, if I may be allowed to do so, to prove that this is not an appropriation for which there is no call. I said yesterday that probably no man on this floor has been more emphatic and outspoken in his opposition to unnecessary extension of Federal authority than I. I have sometimes claimed to be about the best Democrat in Congress in that line. Our dear friend and former colleague on the Democratic side, Charley Bartlett, insisted that he was the best Democrat who ever came down the pike in that regard. Charley, however, was willing to admit that next to him was Uncle Joe, and he was good enough to tag me as entitled to honorable mention in that connection. I have never been, and I am not now, in favor of undue or improper extension of Federal authority, jurisdiction, and control, and for two reasons: First, because my experience is that frequently it is not wisely exercised, and, further, because I know of no way under heaven among men whereby self-government may be maintained and continued except by putting on the people of the communities the responsibility of taking care of their own affairs. [Applause.] I think you can easily break down the institutions of free government by unduly centralizing government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 10 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, if we are to continue to have a government of the people, for the people, and by the people the people must learn to govern themselves by exercising the duties and responsibilities of self-government in the communities, in the States, in the municipalities. That is one of the reasons why undue and improper extension of Federal authority, jurisdiction, and control is unwise.

But there is a vast difference between improperly, unwisely, and unduly extending Federal jurisdiction and providing for Federal leadership and Federal encouragement. This is a day of combination, a day when every association of any sort or kind engaged in a useful work or purpose has a central head or body generally covering and embracing the Nation. It has come to be universal in our plan of organization to have a central head controlling or at least encouraging and promoting useful enterprises and activities, and that is what is proposed under this bill.

May I digress for just a moment for a further discussion of the matter of economy? Of course, when the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] assailed us as being extravagant, and grossly so, he forgot that up to this time this Congress has not appropriated any moneys at all during this session except those necessary to maintain the Government under a Democratic administration, and maintain the Government for a period that should have been provided for by the appropriations of the last Congress. [Applause on the Republican side.] If you had done your duty in passing the appropriations for the present fiscal year and for the balance of the fiscal year which ended the 1st of last July, it would not have been necessary for us to have made an appropriation up to this time except for the expenses of the session of Congress.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. In just a moment; and up to this time we have not appropriated a dollar—oh, we have appropriated a few dollars to run the Congress, but we have appropriated practically no money at all, except the appropriations necessary to carry on the Government during the period for which the last Congress ought to have made appropriations; and in doing that we have saved, as I said, $1,680,000,000 below the estimates and $936,000,000 below the bills of last year, not counting the very great saving we made below the estimates on which the recent or present pending deficiency bill is based. I think they amounted to about $50,000,000 or somewhere thereabouts, and our appropriations were, as a matter of fact, about $15,000,000.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman know that, as a matter of fact, this Congress has increased the appropriations for every department in this Government except in the case of the Army and the Navy and the Shipping Board? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MONDELL. On the contrary, this Congress has reduced the bills of the last Congress $936,000,000 below the same items in the bills of the late Democratic Congress—I am sorry I have to say it so often—and $1,680,000,000 below the estimates; and the recent deficiency bill—the one now pending—was reduced, as it passed the House, from $50,000,000, approximately, of estimates to $15,000,000 as it passed the House.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, I can not yield to enable the gentleman to make a speech and excuse his party.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Was not that saving, to which the gentleman referred, in the Army and Navy appropriations made at the instance and suggestion of the Secretaries of War and the Navy?

Mr. MONDELL. On the contrary, in the first place, the savings were not altogether in those lines. In the second place, as I said on this floor at the time, the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy and the officers of the War and the Navy Departments haunted, as the gentleman from Tennessee knows, the corridors of the other end of the Capitol, after we passed the Army and the Navy bills, trying to get the Senate to increase those appropriations above those the House made. The gentleman knows that. He knows that we had to decline to agree to a conference report in order to reduce the Army bill by $85,000,000; and we reduced it, as I recall, some $250,000,000 below what the Secretary of War was demanding at that very moment. Let no man say that it was due to the cessation of hostilities when at the very time these bills were being considered both the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy were demanding more money than we gave them.

I want to call just one or two things to the attention of gentlemen who have been suddenly stricken with a spasm of economy, who have suddenly come to a very conservative view of what the Federal Government should do. There is no more useful bill, no more important bill, no more altogether indispensable bill passed by the Congress than that providing for the Department of Agriculture. There are some very interesting items in it, and I desire to call some of them to the attention of gentlemen who have suddenly become panic-stricken lest the Federal Government shall become extravagant in its expenditures and lest we spend money for purposes for which we are not justified in spending it. The current appropriation act for the Department of Agriculture provides an appropriation of $525,000 for the purpose of the inspection and cure of scabies in sheep and in cattle, and diseases of that character. It is a very useful work, but gentlemen who voted for it, gentlemen who voted for a half million dollars for the eradication of those diseases in domestic animals, should not be so tremendously disturbed when we propose to appropriate $200,000 a year to superintend the work of returning to lives of usefulness the industrial cripples among 110,000,000 people.

I notice that in that same bill there is an appropriation of $1,500,000 for the control and eradication of tuberculosis in domestic animals.

I think it is a wise work, a helpful work, a hopeful work. I am quite inclined to the opinion that while primarily the responsibility is upon the localities to take care of their own cattle that are tubercular, still there is a very good argument in favor of the Federal Government expending $500,000 to eradicate and a million to repay the owner whose cattle are killed in order to eradicate tuberculosis, but when gentlemen enthusiastically support appropriations of a million and a half for the purpose of reducing tuberculosis among domestic animals I do not think they are highly justified in objecting to an appropriation which at the most can not be over two-thirds that amount for the purpose of encouraging and aiding the States of the Union in restoring crippled humanity. [Applause.]

In this same bill we appropriate about half a million to eradicate, or rather help control, hog cholera. The bill also provides three-quarters of a million to help destroy the cattle tick in Texas. It strikes me as curious that gentlemen think that hog cholera and Texas cattle tick are proper subjects for Federal attention and appropriations, but that the rescue of humanity from lives of crippled helplessness is not. Verily, I do not understand the philosophy of gentlemen who insist we may properly do for swine what we may not do for humanity.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, as a sincere friend of the proposed legislation I deeply regret that any phase of a political issue should have been injected into this controversy. Let us try this case, gentlemen, upon the merits of it and not upon false issues. I have never seen before legislation presented to this House against which there were offered more specious and ad hominum arguments. For instance, as I pointed out a day or two ago, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] says there is no general demand for this legislation, and that sentiment was reiterated a few moments ago by the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK]. What is the proposition? Out yonder scattered all over this country to-day are 300,000 men and women disabled more than 50 per cent, and that much of an incubus, that much of a handicap upon the community, that much of a loss to the economic employment of this Nation. It is true they have no lobby here looking after their interests. Why, if the economic loss of some business interest of this country of $1,000,000 a year were involved the corridors of this Capitol would be swarming with special advocates to represent that interest; and yet that vast silent, unfortunate multitude of American citizens, invested with wonderful potentiality to be developed, are silent and not represented by any lobby, and I want to say to you, gentlemen of this House, speaking only for myself, that their very silence, knowing their condition, makes a wonderfully articulate appeal to my humanity and to my sense of justice to that particular part of society. [Applause.]

Mr. RICKETTS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have not the time. I desire to answer some of the arguments that have been made. The gentleman from Massachusetts says that Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, and New York and a few of the great, rich Commonwealths of this country are going to have their taxpayers to contribute something to aid industrial cripples in Alabama.

Why, gentlemen, I dare say there are five and possibly ten times as many of these unfortunate men in the great old Bay State as there are in my State of Alabama. Are you going to raise that character of an issue upon a great humanitarian proposition like this? I want to say to you that the people of Alabama, and I believe I voice their sentiments, feel just as kindly to any unfortunate man in the State of Massachusetts as they do to their own citizens down there in the Sunny South. [Applause.] Let us not, gentlemen, as I say, consider this question upon false premises and upon specious arguments. And the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] draws a great many red herrings across the trail of the merits of this bill in order to befog the issue and get your minds drawn away from the merits of the legislation by saying that it is only the case of the camel getting its nose under the tent and there will be no end of appropriations of this character to follow. Gentlemen, there is only one appropriation pending of a half million dollars to help the States get going to rebuild and remake men and women, so that instead of their being a dead economic loss and charges upon the community, they may reenter the industrial and commercial life of the Nation, and by earning this money themselves possibly be able to pay taxes to carry on its great purposes for others.

Mr. MOON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I regret my time is limited, unless I can get an extension of time——

Mr. MOON. For a matter of information purely. How much would it give to each cripple in the United States if we pass this measure?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will state to the gentleman from Tennessee it is not proposed to make a direct appropriation to any cripple.

Mr. MOON. I mean if it were divided——

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will ask my friend if he has read this bill?

Mr. MOON. Oh, yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then the gentleman must know, as an able man and as a critic of legislation, that the purpose of this bill is simply to afford Federal aid and stimulation of half a million dollars under a general plan of supervision vested in the Vocational Board, just like it is under the Smith-Hughes bill for which my friends on this side of the aisle, I expect, almost unanimously voted, to appropriate that sum of money to be divided among the States in proportion to their population to that of the United States, the burden being upon the State and the people of the States through their legislatures to put the machinery into operation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I would like five minutes more as I was the author of the original bill here and a good many arguments have been made against it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to speak for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I regret to have to ask that of the House after so much time has been consumed. I want to see this bill stand upon its merits. I could not undertake to figure out how much money it would mean to each man——

Mr. MOON. Would it not be less than $3 apiece after the expenses are paid?

Mr. BANKHEAD. If it meant only 1 cent each, as a matter of argument, it is a proposition to enter this field and have it developed with the aid of these public entities of the Nation and the State. They say what we offer them, as I stated before, is a proposition making appeal to the sentimentality of the members of this committee. This is not essentially a sentimental bill. It is essentially an economic measure of the soundest common sense, and if you analyze it in that spirit you will see it will accomplish that result.

We are talking about a period of reconstruction. My friend from Texas [Mr. HARDY] said it was a trespass upon States' rights, and he hesitated to do it. When the boll weevil came across the Mexican border and into the State of Texas my friend did not raise that issue. It was only in the State of Texas, but it meant a national menace to the cotton production of the whole country, and they asked and accepted an appropriation from the Federal Government to repel that insidious invasion. When floods come upon the country, essentially, under that doctrine, the people of the States should take care of it, and yet we have precedent after precedent where the Government has gone to the aid of particular units of society.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I would like to say to the gentleman on this flood question——

Mr. BANKHEAD. We will waive that. If that is offensive to my friend, as appearing illogical to his position, I will withdraw it.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I just wanted to correct the gentleman's statement about getting appropriations to aid flood sufferers.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Here was a new kind of boll weevil that appeared in Texas last year, the pink boll worm, and they said that unless we stopped it it was going to destroy the cotton crop, and they went before the Agricultural Committee, and I expect my good friend voted for it, when, according to the logic of his argument, it was simply a matter for the State of Texas.

We have spent millions of dollars directly for educational purposes. Under the Smith-Hughes bill we spent $3,000,000,000 to educate normal children in the schools under the same machinery as proposed in this bill. Why? You gentlemen—and every one voted for the bill, I suppose—conceived the idea that the individual elements of our society would form the aggregate of national intelligence and efficiency. The same is the case here.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. If the gentleman will yield, I would like to say that we have been removing the tick from cattle by appropriations in the Agricultural bill, and I have not heard any of the gentlemen objecting to that.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is right.

You talk about economy. I see where a bill is up in the Senate to give $15,000,000 more for aviation. If it comes over here, we could lop off about one-half a million from that and put it to this purpose. There are many cases where you can save appropriations for meeting this issue.

Mr. THOMAS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will.

Mr. THOMAS. This bill is not confined to American citizens, is it? Is it not a fact that any alien or any unnaturalized person could take advantage of this bill?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Well, that question is not raised directly in the bill. It would be a question for the State boards to decide.

I want to say that there is another misapprehension. They seek to leave an impression here that the Federal Government is going to put its strong arm upon the educational institutions of the States, and these institutions we propose to aid. Not so at all. If you will read the bill, you will see that it provides this money shall be expended under the absolute control of the States. [Applause.]

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wyoming, in a few eloquent remarks upon economy in behalf of this bill, sought to convey the impression that another half million dollars spent on a new venture was a common thing to do. The gentleman from Wyoming comes from a State where but for the expenditure of Federal money it would be a howling wilderness to-day. [Laughter.] And there are a few other States in the same category. Because the people out there have come to rely upon the Federal Treasury for all improvement, they have lost the spirit of initiative and individual enterprise.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the other day the distinguished gentleman from Iowa, my good friend Judge TOWNER, sought to offer as a cure for Bolshevism in the country a Federal expenditure of money to cure unfortunate cripples. Well, we have had many cures suggested for Bolshevism. That is rather a novel one. But I submit that if we put our attention to problems seeking to conserve the Federal Treasury and to problems seeking to restore to the States their original prerogatives and to keep the Federal Government along its proper lines and within its lawful jurisdiction, we will be doing much to inspire confidence in both Federal and State Governments and discourage Bolshevism. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. But it is when the Congress of the United States responds to these appeals such as has been made here that the Bolshevists and socialists and the wild-eyed theorists begin to think that the Government is made for their particular benefit, and that they owe no duty to the Government, but that the Government must spend money for their particular benefit.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Does not the gentleman from Massachusetts know that about the only sure cure for Bolshevism is a good stout rope and a telegraph pole?

Mr. WALSH. I know they use that cure in Texas for other things besides Bolshevism; and in Alabama also. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I want to say and reiterate and reenforce, if I may, in my feeble way, the suggestion of the gentleman from Missouri that this is a new departure on the part of the Government, and the hearings do not show any great demand from any one of these 38 States that have workmen's compensation laws, from any considerable portion of our population, that we should embark upon this enterprise and start spending money. As for getting the camel's nose under the tent, to which I referred Saturday, and to which the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] made mention a few moments ago, I submit if we seek to alleviate the sufferings of the poor unfortunate who has lost one finger or two fingers, or an arm, it will be only a short time when these same benevolently inclined gentlemen, most of them distinguished educators, however, both those advocating the bill and those appearing before the committee, will come in with a scheme whereby we shall furnish to the unfortunate medical service at the expense of the Federal Treasury.

Now, when you appropriate money from the Federal Treasury you make it conditional that the States shall appropriate a like sum, and you are imposing by this appropriation upon the States the requirement that they shall appropriate the money, for if they do not they bear their burden of expenses by contribution to the Federal Treasury for the benefit of the States which do seek to take advantage of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I believe I have been as consistent a supporter of economy as any Member of this House. I have worked as much to keep down appropriations as any other Member. But there are some debts that this Nation ought, in good conscience and honor, to pay, and one of those is the debt that it owes to these men who have been crippled in building up great industries of this country. It has often been a subject of remark that our industries have expanded more than those of any other nation, that great fortunes have been built upon them, and that our progress in all of these industries has been beyond the wildest imagination of a few years ago. But the path of this progress has been strewn with thousands of these derelicts for whom it seems so many gentlemen care nothing, and for whom it seems this great Government took no thought.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], my colleague, in a former discussion of this bill referred to the fact of the development of Bolshevism. We all know that this world is full of unrest, and in this respect this country is like the remainder of this globe. One of the charges that has been made most often against this Government is that it is built and maintained solely for the interests of the rich and the powerful, while the poor, the crippled, and the needy may go their way, and when somebody gets up here on this floor and wants to appropriate a little money for them it will be dashed aside in the interest of economy.

I have thought, Mr. Chairman, as this discussion has proceeded, that perhaps after all there was some reason for that belief when gentlemen can say that they will vote millions for the extermination of the cattle tick, millions to eradicate hog cholera, millions to get rid of the boll weevil, and oppose the granting of a few thousand dollars to raise the wretched ones who have been crippled in industry from a condition where they are neither able to be of use to the community or society or able to take care of themselves. Then it seemed to me that there might, after all, be some justice in that charge.

Gentlemen say we are embarking upon a new policy. Why, we have been engaged in that policy for lo these many years. We discovered a long time ago that in these great movements for the benefit of society, great movements to uplift mankind in this country, Congress had to take the lead. The State legislatures would not take it. So we passed the Lever bill for the encouragement of education in agriculture. So we passed the Smith-Hughes bill for vocational education in the States. So, now, we offer this small sum as an inducement to the States to do their share, and possibly more.

Gentlemen say there will be an increase in these appropriations. I do not believe it. It has not been so in a similar case with respect to the Smith-Hughes Act, which is framed on exactly the same lines as this bill. The appropriations to carry out this bill have not been increased.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will try to get the gentleman more time. I would like to know about this: This is a long paragraph, with many provisions. We want to get some facts about it. The gentleman keeps referring to the Smith-Hughes bill. That is education for persons residing in the States, is it not?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And this is for all persons, no matter where they reside. Take, for example, a port where a large number of sailors come, not citizens of that State, or where there is a large number of aliens, not citizens of that State. Are they to be assisted under Federal prompting still further than the degree to which they are now taken care of by the States?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Iowa may have five minutes more.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, a committee amendment is pending.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I have an amendment that I wish to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. A committee amendment is pending.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask that my amendment be again read.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas will again be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON: On page 4, line 1, beginning with the word "that," strike out all of the balance of the paragraph and insert in lieu thereof the following: "The vocational rehabilitation provided for herein shall be given under the supervision and control of the State board, and all courses shall be available, under such rules and regulations as the Federal board shall prescribe, to all persons, in such destitute circumstances that they are financially unable to provide their own rehabilitation, disabled in industrial pursuits, including agriculture, trade, commerce, manufacturing, mining, transportation, all mechanic arts, and to civil employees of the United States disabled while in the performance of their duty: Provided, That persons who have received compensation for injuries and other disabled persons who are able to pay for same may be given rehabilitation training upon paying reasonable tuition therefor."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—aye 1, noes 72.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FESS. I ask for a vote on the committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 4, strike out "the industry and otherwise" and insert "industrial pursuits, including agriculture, trade, commerce, manufacturing, mining, transportation, and all the mechanic arts."

Mr. BLACK rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized.

Mr. TOWNER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], a member of the committee, wishes to be recognized in favor of the amendment, the Chair will recognize him. If not, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] will be recognized.

Mr. FESS. Just one word, Mr. Chairman, and then I will give way to the gentleman from Texas. The phrase "industry or otherwise" has no limitation, and while it is true that this phrase was in the Senate bill it was thought by the House committee that it would be well to limit it by using the explanatory expression "industrial pursuits, including agriculture, trade, commerce, manufacturing, mining, transportation, and all mechanic arts." That is the reason why the phrase was stricken out and this language inserted.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield to my friend from Minnesota.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. As I understand it, the bill, as originally drawn, would cover a man who was injured in an accident which is in nowise connected with the industry in which he was employed. For instance, if a mechanic were on his way to the factory to work and were run over by a street car or automobile, the bill, as originally drawn, would take care of him, but as it is now drawn he would not be injured in the industry in which he was employed, and he would not be taken care of. Am I correct?

Mr. FESS. I think the gentleman is not correct. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], who is the author of this amendment.

Mr. TOWNER. In the case the gentleman mentions, as the bill is drawn, a man going to or coming from his work would be entitled to this, just the same as he now is under the general law. He is assumed to be in employment when he is going to or coming from his employment.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Let me assume this state of facts, that on a Saturday afternoon or upon a Sunday, when he was not going to or coming from his work, he was injured by an automobile, a street car, or in some other way, would he then come under the provisions of the act?

Mr. TOWNER. He would not come under the provisions of this amendment.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The State of Minnesota, anticipating favorable action by the Congress upon this act, has passed a law which reads as this was originally drawn, "in industry or otherwise." They intend to take care of men injured, whether in industry or in any form of accident. Now, what would be the effect of a change in the law regarding a State which has passed a law in the original form of this bill?

Mr. TOWNER. It would have no effect, because of the fact that they would approximate their bill to this law, and it would have no effect except as it pertained to those particular provisions which might be included in the one and not included in the other. I think no difficulty would arise.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLACK. I wish to use five minutes in a discussion of this amendment, and of no other feature of the bill.

The bill, as originally written, and as I understand as it passed the Senate, would include persons who were injured or disabled in any sort of way, whether by accident while at work or by accident off duty; but the amendment now proposed by the committee would limit the benefits of the bill to those who were disabled under certain conditions, for instance, who were disabled while engaged in industrial pursuits, including agriculture, trade, commerce, manufacturing, mining, transportation, and all the mechanic arts.

Now, I contend that if we are justified in passing this bill at all—if it is a proper subject for congressional legislation—it must be based upon the general-welfare clause of the Constitution. Gentlemen have spoken—I remember, in particular, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN]—of the debt that the Government of the United States owes to men employed in industry. I submit that so far as the general welfare is concerned, the Government would owe the same duty to any man who was disabled under any condition, unless by his own willful misconduct. Why do I say that? What do I base that assertion upon? We are going to provide the money to carry out the purposes of this bill by general taxation, which will fall upon all classes of the public. We are not going to tax industry especially to pay the expenses of this bill. We are not going to tax agriculture in any particular way to pay the expenses of this bill. We are not going to tax the mechanic arts in any special manner to pay the expenses of this bill. We are going to tax the general public; and therefore I say that if a man is disabled within the meaning of the purposes of this bill, whether in industry of otherwise, unless by his own willful misconduct, he ought to receive the benefit of this act. If the committee votes down the committee amendment I shall offer an amendment "except by his own willful misconduct." I will do that for the reason that it would probably be unwise from a standpoint of public policy to permit a man to take advantage of his own wrongful conduct.

Mr. LAYTON. Why make that reservation at all about willful misconduct?

Mr. BLACK. It is not in the bill.

Mr. LAYTON. I know; but if I apprehend the spirit of this bill, it is to make good that which is bad, to return to a state of capacity what is incapacitated, for the general welfare of the country. Why limit it at all? Why not leave the words "in industry or otherwise," so that any man or any boy who is injured will receive the benefit of it?

Mr. KITCHIN. It will do what you want if you strike them both out, leaving simply the words "who is disabled."

Mr. BLACK. The words "except by his own willful misconduct," which I have suggested, are not in the bill now, and the only reason I suggested them was that it might be against public policy for the Government to take up the rehabilitation of a man who had disabled himself by his own misconduct. But that is only a suggestion of mine. I do say that the bill ought to be general in its application and ought not to be limited by the provisions suggested by the committee amendment. For that reason I hope that the committee amendment will be voted down and that the bill will be allowed to remain as it was originally written in that respect.

Mr. LAYTON. I thoroughly agree with the gentleman to this extent: If we are going to pass this bill at all, I see no reason why we should limit it in its application.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, if I may have the attention of the committee, I will say that the reason for this amendment is simply this: The bill is a vocational education bill. It is drawn for the benefit of those who are in employment. That is the object of the bill all the way through. The bill has been drawn for that purpose. It is in a sense a complement to the Smith-Hughes Act, which was for vocational education.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman permit one statement?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

Mr. BLACK. It is true that the Smith-Hughes Act is a vocational bill, but at the same time it is open alike to all the citizens of the country, and I am thoroughly in sympathy with the idea, and that is the suggestion I make, that it be just as broad as the population of the country.

Mr. TOWNER. But the gentleman does not recognize that this is for the purpose of taking care of those people who are in employment and who have been injured in employment. Now, our experience and the experience of all the nations has shown that these men can in most cases be reeducated in a very short time so that they can return to employment. Ordinarily it takes only a few weeks to rehabilitate these people and put them back in employment.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BEE. I want to ask the gentleman from Iowa if the purpose of this bill is not to eliminate the economic loss by reason of the destruction of the earning power of the man?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; that is one of the objects of the bill.

Mr. BEE. Then what difference does it make to the economic welfare of the country how a man is injured, as long as the loss is suffered by reason of his injury?

Mr. TOWNER. That is very true, I admit; but we can not include everything. Now, this is intended as a particular act for a particular purpose. It is intended for the purpose of supplementing the act for the education of these men. We assist the State in educating them for a particular employment. They come into the employment, an accident happens, they are disqualified for continuing it. The men are not able to take care of themselves. We do not want to extend it to people who can take care of themselves. This amendment is a limitation on the bill and not an extension. It is to put back again the men who have been stricken out of employment; it is to put them back into employment, so that they may be again self-supporting, instead of being a burden on the State and the Nation.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Suppose a man has been working every day and he takes a day off for recreation and is injured, under the bill would he be entitled to the benefits?

Mr. TOWNER. No; I think he would not. The gentleman from Minnesota has called attention to the law in his State. I think the States would take care of those exceptional cases.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Does not the gentleman think the man should be entitled to the privilege just the same as though he had the accident while he was at work? Does the gentleman see any practical difference?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. TOWNER. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TOWNER. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that that may be true, but we can not draw the line between a case of that kind and a case which would include everybody that was incapacitated by sickness or injury. We want to keep it as close as we can, the bill being itself a vocational bill. We want to help those in occupations, to help workmen that ordinarily have not laid up enough to support themselves and their families and have not enough to pay for sickness or accidents. We want to put them back into the industries.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Has the gentleman any figures showing the proportion of accidents in industries to the number of accidents outside?

Mr. TOWNER. No; the experts have never been able to determine that. They are pretty well able to determine the accidents in industry, because they can get reports and pretty accurate statistics, but general accidents to men outside—a man going along the street, clerk in a store, men engaged in no occupation—nobody can tell how many accidents there are.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. There is a publication gotten out by the Carnegie Institute giving a survey of the State of Michigan, and that publication states that of all accidents only 11 per cent occur in industries.

Mr. TOWNER. I think that must be largely a matter of speculation, because, gentlemen, experts who testified before the committee said that it must be a matter of speculation as to the number of accidents outside of industries.

I recognize that it would be a generous thing to do, but gentlemen say that we should not unduly extend the operations of this act. This, being a vocational bill, ought to be limited to those engaged in the vocations, who are in employment, who are the workmen of the country.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. This bill would include a hired man working on a farm who lost a leg in his employment. He would be entitled to the benefits of the act. Does that apply to the hired girl making biscuit on Sundays?

Mr. TOWNER. I think it would.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Would it apply to the wife of a laborer in the city making biscuits on Sundays?

Mr. TOWNER. I think not; she would not be in employment.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. I will.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Is it not a fact that in some States where compensation is made it is charged to the industry?

Mr. TOWNER. There may be some States which have that provision, but most of the States do not.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Do not the major portion of the States have it?

Mr. TOWNER. I think not; I am not certain about the number.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. If your bill goes to its logical conclusion, distributing your relief on broad morals, you will become a communist, will you not?

Mr. TOWNER. The gentleman is assuming a thing that has no justification, no reason, nor any good sense, nor any good judgment. I am not a communist; far from it.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, I am for the bill and for the amendment now before the House.

The rehabilitation of a human being who has met with an accident and who has lost a limb or limbs or an eye in the occupation in which he may be engaged and thereby is unable to enter into the occupation which means existence to him and those dependent upon his earning power for a living is virtually the lifting from the depth of utter despondency to happiness, in the fact of again acquiring the ability to earn a living and to feel he is a live being of consequence and able to forget the handicap endured from accident.

That men terribly maimed do lose heart in contemplation of the future I can testify from personal experience, and that men can be rehabilitated I know from observation. Several notable cases have occurred recently at Mooseheart, Ill. The Loyal Order of Moose of the World, a fraternal order consisting of nearly 600,000 members in the United States and Canada, six years ago bought 1,014 acres of splendid land on the Fox River, 35 miles west of Chicago, for the purpose of taking orphan children of members of any age up to 16 years for the purpose of giving to each a good common-school education and at the same time teaching them a vocation. Thirty-five different trades are taught there and there are in this institution 765 children—orphans. There were necessarily some crippled children among them. One boy with the right arm lost, taken off at the shoulder socket, and face and body horribly burned, became head of the life-saving corps, is the most expert swimmer and diver in that part of the country, owns and runs and repairs his own automobile, and can do about anything that anyone with a whole body can do; has become a finished photographer and is the official photographer at that institution.

Another with a deformed leg, of which he had no use, studied gas engines and is now the superintendent of a large garage in Indiana at a good salary. Another with a withered arm is an athlete and has taken most of the honors in running, jumping, and shot putting in the meets with neighborly high schools, and has finished as a mechanical engineer. These are some instances.

When the World War was at its height the Government wanted to fit soldiers to go to the front who understood concrete and cement construction; several hundred soldiers were stationed at Mooseheart to take three months' training in that work and were sent from there finished workmen, and since the endeavor to rehabilitate maimed soldiers and sailors 55 of them have been placed there and soon 100 will be located there to be taught trades, and the Federal board has offered large inducements to the chief engineer at Mooseheart to take charge of cantonments and camps where rehabilitation is being carried on for soldiers and sailors.

I simply make these statements as to what is being done at Mooseheart as proof of what can be done in the work of rehabilitation. The Mooseheart schools are not connected with the State, but are supported entirely by a small contribution by each member of the Order of the Loyal Order of Moose.

The State of Pennsylvania has gone into the work of rehabilitation of industrial employees on a large scale, a report on which for the State I will insert in the RECORD, if permitted. I understand other States are also doing this work.

The last several Congresses have appropriated large sums of money for the building of highways under practically this same plan. They have appropriated sums of money in every Congress that I have been a Member of for the experimental eradication of diseases among animals, tuberculosis of animals, killing of the boll weevil, and other like work, and to my mind it is high time and the necessity is much greater to take care of human beings and their happiness, than some of these other enterprises. [Applause.]

The following is the law of Pennsylvania that I referred to:

An act providing for the establishment of a bureau of rehabilitation in the department of labor and industry, and conferring upon the commissioner of labor and industry the power to supervise and direct the rendering of certain physically handicapped persons fit to engage in remunerative occupations; providing for the appointment of a chief of the bureau, subordinate officers, and employees, and furnishing suitable accommodations; and making an appropriation.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted, etc., That (a) the term "bureau," as used in this act, shall mean bureau of rehabilitation.

(b) The term "commissioner" shall mean the commissioner of labor and industry.

(c) The term "physically handicapped person" or "persons," wherever used in this act, shall mean any resident or residents of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania whose capacity to earn a living is in any way destroyed or impaired through industrial accident occurring in the Commonwealth.

(d) "Rehabilitation" shall mean the rendering of a physically handicapped person fit to engage in a remunerative occupation.

SEC. 2. A bureau of rehabilitation is hereby established in the department of labor and industry. The central office of the bureau shall be located in the city of Harrisburg.

SEC. 3. The commissioner, with the approval of the governor, shall appoint a chief of the bureau of rehabilitation, who shall be subject to the direction and supervision of the commissioner, and shall fix his salary, which, when so fixed, shall be paid out of the sums hereinafter appropriated.

SEC. 4. It shall be the duty of the chief of the bureau of rehabilitation to direct, as hereinafter provided, the rehabilitation of any physically handicapped person: Provided, That said duty of the chief of the bureau shall not be construed to apply to aged or helpless persons requiring permanent custodial care, or to blind or deaf persons under the care of any State or semi-State institution, or to any epileptic or feeble-minded person, or to any person who may not be susceptible to such rehabilitation.

SEC. 5. The chief of the bureau of rehabilitation shall have power with the approval of the commissioner—

(a) To establish relations with all public and private hospitals to require prompt and complete reports of any physically handicapped persons under treatment in such hospitals. The persons thus reported may be promptly visited by representatives of the bureau of rehabilitation, who shall make record of their condition, and report to the chief of the bureau, who shall then determine whether the person is susceptible to rehabilitation. Such persons as may be found susceptible shall be acquainted by the chief of the bureau with the rehabilitation facilities offered by the State and the benefits of entering upon remunerative work at an early date. Any physically handicapped person who chooses to take advantage of these rehabilitation facilities shall be registered with the chief of the bureau, and a record kept of every such person, and the measures taken for his or her rehabilitation. The chief of the bureau shall proffer to any such person counsel regarding the selection of a suitable occupation and of an appropriate course of training, and shall initiate definite plans for beginning rehabilitation as soon as the physical condition of the person permits.

(b) To receive applications of any physically handicapped persons for advice and assistance regarding their rehabilitation. The persons thus known to be physically handicapped may be visited, examined, and advised in the same manner and for the same purposes as specified in clause (a) of this section.

(c) To make a survey to ascertain the number and condition of physically handicapped persons within the Commonwealth. The persons thus known to be physically handicapped may be visited, examined, registered and advised in the same manner and for the same purpose as specified in clause (a) of this section.

(d) To arrange for such therapeutic treatment as may be necessary for the rehabilitation of any physically handicapped persons who have registered with the chief of the bureau.

(e) To procure and furnish at cost to physically handicapped persons who have registered with the chief of the bureau limbs and other orthopedic and prosthetic appliances, to be paid for in easy installments when such appliances can not be otherwise provided: Provided, however, That if it be shown that any physically handicapped person is unable to pay for such artificial limbs or other appliances, the chief of the bureau may direct, with the approval of the commissioner, that such limbs or appliances shall be supplied to such physically handicapped person and the cost thereof paid out of the funds appropriated for the rehabilitation activities of the bureau; such payments to be made by the State treasurer on the warrant of the auditor general or requisition of the commissioner of labor and industry.

(f) To arrange with the superintendent of public instruction for training courses in the public schools in the Commonwealth in selected occupations for physically handicapped persons registered with the chief of the bureau.

(g) To arrange with any educational institution for training courses in selected occupations for physically handicapped persons registered with the chief of the bureau.

(h) To arrange with any public or private organization or commercial, industrial, or agricultural establishment for training courses in selected occupations for physically handicapped persons registered with the chief of the bureau.

(i) To provide maintenance costs during the prescribed period of training for physically handicapped persons registered with the chief of the bureau: Providing, That when the payment of maintenance costs is authorized by the chief of the bureau, with the approval of the governor, it shall not exceed $15 per week, and the period during which it is paid shall not exceed 20 weeks unless an extension of time is granted by the commissioner; said payments to be made by the State treasurer on the warrant of the Auditor General on requisition of the Commissioner of Labor and Industry.

(j) To arrange for social service, for the visiting of physically handicapped persons registered with the chief of the bureau and of their families in their homes, during the period of treatment and training and after its completion, to give advice regarding any matter that may affect rehabilitation.

(k) To conduct investigations and surveys of the several industries located in the Commonwealth to ascertain the occupations within each industry in which physically handicapped persons can enter upon remunerative employment under favorable conditions, and work with normal effectiveness, and to determine what practicable changes and adjustments in industrial operations and practices may facilitate such employment.

(l) To make such studies and reports as may be helpful for the operation of this act.

(m) To cooperate with any department of the Federal Government or of the government of this Commonwealth or with any private agency in the operation of this act.

SEC. 6. The commissioner, with the approval of the governer, shall appoint such officers, physicians, clerks, stenographers, and other employees as shall be necessary to carry out the purposes of this act. He shall determine their duties and shall fix their salaries, which when so fixed shall be paid out of the sums hereinafter appropriated. The board of public grounds and buildings shall furnish suitable accommodations for the use of the bureau.

SEC. 7. The sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated to carry out the purposes of this act.

SEC. 8. A report on the activities of the bureau of rehabilitation authorized by this act shall be submitted biennially to the governor, together with a statement of the sum necessary to conduct said activities during the ensuing two years.

SEC. 9. All acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

SEC. 10. If any section or provision of this act be decided by the courts to be unconstitutional or invalid, the same shall not affect the validity of this act as a whole or any part thereof other than the part so decided to be unconstitutional or invalid.

Approved the 18th day of July, A. D. 1919.

WM. C. SPROUL.

The foregoing is a true and correct copy of the act of the general assembly No. 418.

CYRUS E. WOODS,
Secretary of the Commonwealth.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, if we were legislating during normal times much that has been said would pass with little notice, and perhaps the bill would pass without opposition. But these are not normal times; they are very abnormal times; and Congress will be legislating the next 20 years during abnormal times so far as the Treasury of the United States is concerned.

For 52 years, from 1866 to 1917, inclusive, the receipts of the Treasury of the United States exceeded the expenditures by $2,591,453,184. But very little of the receipts during those years came from direct taxes. Then the people did not feel the burden of taxation. When we were getting in money in that way there was but little attention given as to how the money was expended. Those days are past. Now our expenditures are so large that the revenue must come by direct taxation, and the people of the United States are scrutinizing the work of Congress as never before. They are, and should be, watching what we do. The issue in the United States in the political campaigns for the next decade or more will be waged not on what you voted against but rather on what you voted for when it took money out of the Treasury of the United States. The issue is going to be economy, and the man who is going to be singled out for slaughter is the Member who is willing at all times to vote for bills that might be very desirable if we could afford them, but that are not absolutely necessary, especially if they mean large appropriations.

Now, I have been amused at the learned gentlemen on the Committee on Education. I do not profess to know very much about this question, but I have supposed that the members of the committee that reported out this bill did know a great deal about it. The learned gentleman from Ohio, the chairman of the committee, Dr. FESS, said, on October 9:

A very careful investigation was made by the Federal Government, and a report was made to the effect that there are 22,500 total disabilities resulting from injury every year. If we take the total number who suffer both total and slight disability, it will approach very close to 300,000 per year.

My very dear colleague, Judge TOWNER, equally learned and well informed, on October 11, two days later, took the floor, and this is what he said, and mark his words:

Now, I want to call attention to one other great mistake: Gentlemen say we will have to take care of 300,000 cripples. There is no proposition of that kind before you. It is estimated that there are now in existence in the United States 300,000 men who have been injured in industry; but a very small proportion of them need assistance. Let me tell you how that works out: There are 74,000 men injured in industry in the United States every year, but 52,000 out of the 74,000 have lost only one finger, and 9,000 more have lost only two fingers. Now, these men do not have to be reeducated.

But it remains for the learned gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BURROUGHS] to give us the full picture of what we are about to do. I read from his remarks on page 6746 of the RECORD of the same day, October 11:

From testimony appearing in the printed joint hearings before the Senate and House committees it was shown that each year there are more than 2,000,000 industrial accidents in this country, resulting in loss of time, and more than 700,000 where inability to work extends to a period of at least four weeks.

Mr. BURROUGHS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. For a question.

Mr. BURROUGHS. Will the gentleman permit me to read three or four lines from the testimony?

Mr. GOOD. Following that?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOOD. I do not want to do the gentleman any injustice, and I will read a couple of more sentences if he desires—

The representatives of the National Association of Manufacturers of the country—

I do not see that what follows there has anything to do with or modifies what I have stated in the slightest degree. The proposition that I am trying to state is that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] says there are 300,000 every year who are disabled or partially disabled; that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] says there are only 300,000 of such injured persons in the United States in existence; and that there are 74,000 injured every year, while the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BURROUGHS] says there are 2,000,000 industrial accidents resulting in 700,000 personal injuries.

Mr. BURROUGHS rose.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I regret I can not yield further. Gentlemen state that there will be no growth in this appropriation. I call attention to the fact that in 1914 on May 8 we passed what was known as the Smith-Lever Act for agricultural extension and appropriated, as I recall, as a permanent appropriation $500,000 a year. Perhaps it was $600,000. The act provides that that amount should be augmented each year by $500,000 additional until the total permanent appropriation would be $4,500,000 per annum. Notwithstanding that, for this year we have supplemented that permanent appropriation in the Agricultural appropriation bill by $1,500,000 of additional appropriation.

Gentlemen well know what this bill does. It transfers to the Vocational Board, already overworked, the problem of making a survey or of administering this act, and when soldiers complain to you, if you pass this act, that they were not able to get rehabilitation because the Federal board was not functioning, point your finger to this act, and say ours was the responsibility. The American Legion of New Jersey has, I am informed, passed a resolution protesting against the passage of this act. You place these added responsibilities upon a board already overburdened with work, a board that is unable to function, a board which is under fire and about to be investigated by a committee of this House, and then expect it to function in giving vocational training to our returning soldiers.

Notwithstanding that fact, you would now place upon this board the responsibility of an examination into the claims of 700,000 men, women, and children in America every year who are either totally or partially disabled in industry, to see which of them are entitled to the benefits of this act.

Let us consider the expenses of that board. The recent hearings developed that the expenses of the board have wonderfully increased. In February they had 107 employees in Washington and in July they had 307. In July, when this statement was made, their annual compensation was $941,000, but on July 15 the vice president of the board wrote me as follows:

In response to your telephonic request, I take pleasure in advising you that the pay roll for personal services for persons employed in the administration of the vocational rehabilitation act during the month of June, 1919, amounted to $291,000. This multiplied by 12 equals $3,488,537.60.

Mr. Chairman, this legislation may be thought by some to be desirable, but I say to the membership of this House that this is no time for the consideration of legislation that will admittedly take the first year $1,000,000 out of the Treasury of the United States and an amount eventually which in the final analysis no man can tell. It will be followed logically by social insurance, sick insurance, old-age pensions, and other socialistic demands upon the Treasury that it can not stand. The people are not demanding it; the taxpayers do not want it, and we should not support it.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. GOOD], in quoting what was stated in reference to the number of disabilities, made an effort to show that there has been a discrepancy in statements of the various members of the committee. I stated that there were 22,500 total disabilities annually. That statement has been made by the other two gentlemen to whom he referred. The statement of John Mitchell, who as an authority would be equal to the gentleman who has just spoken, is that 2,000,000 men annually are crippled slightly and otherwise to the extent that there is some loss of time and that 700,000 are crippled to the extent where there is a loss of time up to four weeks. That was the statement of the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BURROUGHS]. That statement was made also by other men who came before our committee. The gentleman also states that this Federal board has increased the pay roll, quoting 1914. The Federal board was not created until 1917, on the 23d of February.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I do not yield.

Mr. GOOD. But the gentleman is stating what is not true, what I did not state.

Mr. FESS. On the 23d of February, 1917, the Federal board was created and it then had——

Mr. GOOD. I said nothing about 1914.

Mr. FESS. I do not yield. Later on we gave to the Federal board the work of the rehabilitation of the soldiers crippled, and does the gentleman object to the increase in the pay roll for the administration of that board? The gentleman came on this floor and used his power as the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to cut the appropriation of $6,000,000 to $4,000,000 for the administration of that act, and when we invoked the vote on the floor of the House and defeated his motion and passed the $6,000,000, it went over to the Senate and the $6,000,000 bill became a law. When the sundry civil bill was under consideration the gentleman tried to reduce it to $4,000,000 and the gentleman himself led the fight on this side of the House to make that bill $14,000,000 that he attempted to cut down to $4,000,000 when we had it before the House.

And the gentleman is making just such a specious argument as he did at that time and will be called upon, I fear, to eat his words as he did at that time. [Applause.] Gentlemen, this measure is to salvage the human wreckage, which is a cheaper and more economical plan than it will be to keep them in the poorhouse or in sanitariums. It is to take the hopeless, train them, put them in a position to be self-supporting, and instead of being a charge upon the Treasury of the Government they are to become an economical advantage to the Government and avoid waste. And therefore, Mr. Chairman, the argument is specious and has absolutely no force so far as the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations is concerned.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

The question was taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The ayes seem to have it, but the Chair s in doubt.

The committee again divided; and there were—ayes 78, noes 58.

Mr. FESS. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered.

The committee again divided; and the tellers (Mr. WALSH and Mr. FESS) reported that there were—ayes 69, noes 65.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the committee do now rise and report the action of the committee to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MADDEN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill H. R. 4438, had directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause of the bill be stricken out.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the recommendation of the committee be adopted, and on that I move the previous question.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman demand the yeas and nays——

Mr. FESS. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FESS. Did the gentleman include in his motion the previous question alone?

The SPEAKER. The first question is on the previous question.

Mr. FESS. I do not want the yeas and nays on that.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on concurring in the recommendation of the committee.

Mr. FESS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana makes the point of order there is no quorum present.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FESS. Does the Chair rule that if no quorum is found to be present at the time the demand was made the House was dividing?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the House was dividing.

Mr. FESS. The House was not dividing; the Chair was attempting to ascertain if a sufficient number had arisen in response to the demand for the yeas and nays. We had not voted on the question.

Mr. BLANTON. The House had divided and we were voting.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not certain, but that is the Chair's recollection, and the Clerk confirms the Chair's recollection that the House was dividing. The Chair will rule that the vote will come, if the Chair should find there is no quorum, on the question of concurring in the recommendation of the committee. The Chair will count. [After counting.] The Chair thinks no quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 118, nays 147, answered "present" 5, not voting 160, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. The House refuses to agree to the recommendation of the committee and automatically resolves itself again into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of H. R. 4438, with Mr. MADDEN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4438) to provide for the promotion of vocational rehabilitation of persons disabled in industry or otherwise and their return to civil employment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment on page 1 of the bill.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 70, noes 60.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be reported. There are many gentlemen who do not seem to understand it.

Mr. WALSH. I object, Mr. Chairman. We have already voted twice on it.

Tellers were ordered, and Mr. FESS and Mr. BLACK took their places as tellers.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I make the request that the amendment be reported. We do not understand what we are voting for. I see no reason why it should not be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

First committee amendment: Page 1, line 4, strike out the words "industry or otherwise" and insert "industrial pursuits, including agriculture, trade, commerce, manufacturing, mining, transportation, and all the mechanic arts."

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 74, noes 49.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote on the next amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 9, after the word "hereby," insert the words "authorized to be."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 4, strike out "1919" and insert "1920."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 24, strike out the word "provided" and insert the word "authorized."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 4, strike out the word "made" and insert the word "authorized."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 7, after the word "shall," insert the words "by a general plan of supervision."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I wish to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JOHNSON of Washington: Page 2, line 8, after the word "State," insert "and Territories"; and in line 10 strike out "Territories."

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee in charge of this bill what objection there is to giving the benefits of this measure to the citizens and residents of the Territories of Hawaii and Alaska?

Mr. FESS. The committee did not take jurisdiction over those Territories because we had no jurisdiction.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. How can that be? The committee did not have jurisdiction?

Mr. FESS. No; but Hawaii and Alaska are under the Committee on Territories, and we can not enter into the education of people in those Territories, coming from the Committee on Labor.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I would like to say to the gentleman that I am a member of the Committee on Territories, and I feel that if the benefits or blessings or charges, or whatever they are to be, coming from this measure are to be extended to the States they should also be extended to the Territories. Accordingly I offer this amendment, and if it prevails I shall ask permission to place the word "Territories" elsewhere in the bill wherever necessary.

The particular reason for this is that in addition to the desire to give the people resident in those parts of the United States the same rights, privileges, and benefits that we give to people elsewhere, is so that people living in Alaska who have lost an arm or a leg or a hand or an eye need not remove to the States in order to receive these benefits at the expense of the United States and the expense of the States to which they are sent.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. FESS. In all the preceding legislation on subjects of this order the Territories were omitted on the basis I have just mentioned. If the Committee on Territories want to include Territories, so far as I know there will be no objection on the part of the committee.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Of course, I can not speak for the whole Committee on Territories. This bill was not presented to the Committee on Territories, and no member of the Committee on Territories has been called before the Committee on Education, so far as I know. I can see clearly that Territories should be added.

Mr. KEARNS. This does not include the District of Columbia.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I have not included the District of Columbia in my amendment, because the District of Columbia does not have District funds in the same way that Territories have funds that could be used in putting up their end of it. The District government apparently is all Federal. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. JOHNSON of Washington) there were 38 ayes and 50 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 8, after the word "employment" insert a comma and the following: "and in the opinion of the board are unable to carry on a gainful occupation, to resume their former occupation, or to enter upon some other occupation, or having resumed or entered upon such occupation are unable to continue the same successfully."

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, the basis of the present legislation is contained in the act to provide for vocational rehabilitation and return to civil employment of disabled persons discharged from the military or naval forces of the United States. In other words, the basis of this, putting it even on the educational feature, is the practice and policy of rehabilitating the soldier of the late Great War. I hold in my hand the law which gives the discharged soldier the privilege of vocational education, and it contains the same restrictions which I have embodied in the amendment read from the Clerk's desk. If members of the committee will note this significant fact, the bill we have under consideration, on line 4, provides for the rehabilitation of persons disabled in industrial pursuits. The language does not say the degree of disability—even a slight disability may allow one to come within the purview of the law. Whereas the law which we passed providing for education in a vocational way for the discharged soldier provides that he must be unable to carry on a gainful occupation or to resume his former occupation or to enter upon some other occupation.

I am of those who believe we can not go too far in affording relief for those who bore the brunt of battle, and, therefore, I and everybody in the House, I presume, was glad to vote for a law to rehabilitate the wounded soldier.

But there should be no policy which would give the outsider a higher privilege of vocational education than the discharged and wounded soldier. If we insert these words, "carrying on a gainful occupation, resuming his former occupation," and like words, then we have provided a limitation, and it seems to me a rightful limitation against the entrance of a lot of people who may be solicited and brought in by those who may be employed in a great and growing phase of new Government work. By that I mean that he may be very slightly injured and may come within what they call rehabilitation by education.

I take it that everyone must agree that the rehabilitation which gives to a person in any pursuit is not, first, an educational rehabilitation but a physical rehabilitation, since the man must be made well physically before he can respond intellectually to the educational advantages. And I present this amendment seriously for the consideration of the House, because, as I say, I think it affords a proper limitation; and I would not wish to go on record, and I think the House would not, of affording a broader opportunity for a man outside who may be injured slightly getting this vocational education when you have denied it to the soldier unless he is able to carry on a gainful occupation.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. I will.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What board does the gentleman have in mind?

Mr. GARD. The same board that is mentioned in the bill, the Federal Vocational Board.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman seems to have lost sight of the fact that the actual administration of the retraining of these men will be by the State boards and not the vocational board in Washingon.

Mr. GARD. The national board is a supervisory board; they present the plan and it is under control of the national board, which provides the plan of vocational education.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, the reason the committee hesitate to accept the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio is that it takes from the Federal rehabilitation law a matter that is purely Federal. The gentleman's amendment would put the eligibility of the subject to be assisted under the control of the Federal Government instead of under the control of the State government. We have no intention of designating to the States who can be trained, leaving that to the States.

Mr. GARD. If the gentleman will agree to an amendment providing that it shall be done by some State board I will offer that—I do not care who does it, if there is some limitation on those who come in.

Mr. FESS. I would not object; but I do not see how we as a body can say to a State board whom it shall admit. We could not prescribe the rules for the State boards.

Mr. GARD. But you do make a qualification. You say "who are without sufficient means to provide for their own rehabilitation." That is the only limitation.

Mr. FESS. Leaving that to the judgment of the State board.

Mr. GARD. Then leave the rest to the judgment of the State board. I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment so that the word "State" may be inserted before the word "board."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified, if there is no objection.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modified amendment by Mr. GARD: Page 1, line 8, after the word "employment," insert a comma and the following language: "And in the opinion of the State board are unable to carry on a gainful occupation, to resume their former occupation, or to enter upon some other occupation, or, having resumed or entered upon such occupation, are unable to continue the same successfully."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FESS) there were—ayes 55, noes 60.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. GARD and Mr. FESS.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 63, noes 49.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to proceed out of order for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in this brief moment that I have under the rules I will not attempt to discuss the bill under consideration, but I want to call your attention to a condition that prevails with reference to the removal and reburial of our dead heroes in France. Recently the subcommittee on foreign affairs of the Select Committee on Expenditures in the War Department made investigation and collected data concerning the whole situation in France. We found that the American dead there were buried in 829 cemeteries, and that there were 75,318 graves. These are all identified but probably about 1,500, and some of these are being identified slowly as new facts and evidence come in. In the month of August they identified 150 graves. The Graves Registration Service in France, which is an Army organization in France, believes that it is the best thing to do to concentrate all these graves into one or more magnificent cemeteries in France, and I think they are of the impression that such action will soon be taken in Congress so as to start them on their work of concentrating these graves. They stated to our committee that they were waiting now for a definite policy to be declared before beginning concentration. I think this is the proper thing for them to do in view of the fact that it would be a tremendous amount of trouble and expense to reinter these bodies in France and later take them up and move them to America. A bill has passed the other branch of this Congress and is now pending before this body authorizing the expenditure of $500,000 for concentrating the graves in France, and I am of the impression that this is the bill upon which the Graves Registration Bureau is waiting upon for a declaration of policy, and if this bill passes the bodies of our soldiers will be gathered from the 829 cemeteries and taken to one concentrated cemetery.

That means that they will be there forever. Now, my colleagues, I have no doubt but what these bodies will be carefully moved to a beautiful spot, which would be made much more beautiful as the years go on, as a last resting place for the heroes of this Great War; but it is my unalterable opinion, after considerable thought and investigation and after hearing from many of my constituents, that the question of whether the bodies should be brought back to America should not be determined by the War Department, nor by any hasty, ill-considered action on the part of Congress, but it should be determined upon the wishes of the parents and relatives of those who gave their lives to the cause. We promised the parents that we would bring the bodies of their loved ones home. We certainly can not fail in this solemn duty, and I warn you now that unless we do something soon a permanent policy will be fastened upon us with reference to the last resting places of these heroes, which will be difficult and expensive to change.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I will yield to the gentleman in a moment. These more than 75,000 graves are scattered all over France. France has taken the position that we should not bring them home within three years, and I know it is their belief that we ought not to bring them home at all. The American Expeditionary Forces for the most part—although there is a divergence of opinion—have taken the position that they ought to remain where they fell. The representative of Graves Registration, who testified before us, expressed this opinion and contended that it is almost impossible to bring them home, and that almost insurmountable difficulties, if not insurmountable difficulties, presented themselves against moving these bodies to America. The chief objection raised was the question of transportation in France; also the attitude of the French Government. Now, I introduced a bill to-day, and I want to insert a copy of the same in the RECORD, which provides that a commission be appointed to ascertain the wishes of the relatives and to proceed at once to get the data and information and adopt rules and regulations and determine upon a plan for bringing these bodies home, and to proceed to do so within the next two and a half years.

I do not mean that these bodies should be brought home now. I have studied this question considerably and I have arrived at the conclusion that it is not possible, nor advisable, for many reasons, to undertake to bring these bodies home immediately; but we ought to be making arrangements now to bring them home at the earliest possible date. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state to the gentleman that I hold in my hand the copy of the statement of the Secretary of War, in which he says this, if the gentleman will permit me to read it:

In view of the very large number of dead interred in France, and the fact that they are in well-kept and well-cared-for cemeteries, and that those cemeteries will constitute a great field of honor in France, the War Department hopes that a large number of parents will sympathize with the feeling of the department that it is the wiser and better course to leave those bodies in France; but the War Department has promised to return the bodies of those whose families insist upon it as soon as arrangements can be effected.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, there has been but one body returned from France—that is, the body of a man who died in the line of duty—and that was the son of Gen. Harries, who died in an automobile accident at Brest, France. As far as I know, the War Department has made no arrangements for bringing these bodies home nor are they contemplating being required to perform this task. I am not sure that they have the authority to do so, and I certainly am not blaming them for not doing so until some definite policy is determined upon by Congress, and I think that Congress should be guided, not by what the War Department or the individual Members of Congress might in their cold calculation think best but that we should be guided by the prayers and wishes of the parents and relatives—the mothers and fathers are the ones to determine the policy. Adjt. Gen. Harris informs me that they have tried to ascertain the wishes of the parents and relatives with reference to the return of the bodies of their relatives; that many of them have not answered his query, but that of those who did answer there are at least 75 per cent or more in favor of having the bodies of their relatives brought home. Of course, it is the intention to remove all bodies forthwith out of Germany.

Mr. GARD. That is what the War Department says. If the parents want the bodies brought back, they will be brought back.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. The testimony before this committee is to the effect that the organization of the War Department is waiting for authority and an appropriation to enable them to concentrate the graves in France. I think they have plenty of information from the parents to the effect that a great majority of the parents want their sons' remains returned.

Mr. GARD. This is the authorized statement of the Secretary of War.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. The bill I refer to was introduced in the other body by the Senator from Missouri, and I have no doubt but what it expresses the wishes and intentions of the War Department. There are some parents who want the remains of their sons to continue to rest in French soil. If that is their wish, it should be supreme as to their sons, but this should not interfere with bringing home the loved one of the other parent who would be inconsolable if their loved one was not brought back to American soil. Most of those who want the remains of the one they gave to this service to remain in France are people who are financially able to make the pilgrimage to France to visit the grave, as has been the case with Mrs. Theodore Roosevelt. There are many parents of soldiers who are not physically or financially able to make this trip, and I am especially concerned and interested in obtaining their viewpoint. I have heard from many of them, and I know that many of you gentlemen have also been informed of their wishes.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. I understand the War Department has issued an order to return all of the bodies of American soldiers from England, Belgium, Luxemburg, Russia, and Italy, and that the French Government has for the time being made application, or rather requested this Government, on account of the morale of the French nation, not to return the bodies from France because of the large number that might be returned. I further understand that it is the intention of the War Department to return these bodies as soon after the first of the year as it possibly can.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. It can not be done at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. In a moment. I will say to the gentleman that I do not know of any provision of law whereby the War Department is enabled to bring back, or is bringing back, any of these bodies at an early date, and, to be frank with you, I doubt the feasibility of bringing the bodies home from those countries immediately. I do know that in France to-day there is a bill pending before the Chamber of Deputies preventing the removal of bodies in France, which includes American bodies, for a period of three years, and that the President of France has issued a decree putting that law into force. This action is actuated by two motives. There are the graves of 4,500,000 people who fell in this war now sleeping in French soil. More than half of these are French. They fear an attempt on the part of America to remove these bodies at this time would bring forth agitation to remove French bodies, which would result in enormous economic loss to France. Besides, the future pilgrimages of American parents and relatives to the graves of their fallen heroes in France is not entirely objectionable to the Frenchman. France is naturally a haven for tourists, and the French reap a great harvest from the tourists. There is not the same necessity for the removal of French bodies as there is for the removal of American bodies. The French soldier is sleeping on his own soil. The Republic is small and the parent can quickly go to the grave of the son. It is otherwise with American parents. We must not overlook the fact also, gentlemen, that we may not always be at peace with France, and I am sure that those interested in having their loved ones brought home will always feel more secure if they rest in American soil. One of the reasons given by the graves registration service why we should not remove these bodies was that the Americans and Chinese are the only people in the world who remove their dead. As far as I am concerned, I am willing to take my position along by the side of the Chinaman if the American fathers and mothers of these soldiers who fell in this great conflict want the bodies of their heroes removed. We moved them from the Philippines and brought them across the great expanse of water that they might rest in the soil that they were fighting for, and I am not going to permit the insinuation that the boys who fell in France were not fighting for the interest and the preservation of the land of their birth and devotion, although there has been much said about crusading and unselfish sacrifice, and so forth. It is true that all of the bodies shipped back from the Philippines were not claimed by relatives, and in my bill I intend to provide against this by arranging it so that only those whose relatives want them shall be brought back.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. If the gentleman will permit, I desire to call his attention to the fact that his colleague [Mr. WOOD of Indiana] introduced a similar measure some weeks ago, and it is before the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, and in our hearings there it developed that an agreement had been made whereby we undertook not to remove the bodies until the last of our soldiers had been brought back from France. There the matter is being taken up. Now, in reference to the measure pending in the French Assembly, at the request——

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I only yielded for a question.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I wanted to give the gentleman that information.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I have that information.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The action was withheld at the request of our Government and that measure is not in force——

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. There is no one there to remove any bodies before the first of the year. I have the resolution referred to here before me, and it merely provides that we request the Government of the Republic of France to modify its law with reference to the bringing home of our dead. Whatever action we take toward determining our future policy should be taken before the first of the year. Anyone who has studied this question and is looking into the future, I believe, will arrive at the conclusion that this Government should not now determine upon a policy, and especially an expensive one, which would in the future prevent or tend to prevent the movement of these bodies back to America.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HASTINGS. Why should we not bring them back now? I ask that the time of the gentleman be extended for two minutes.

Mr. CANDLER. Make it five minutes.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I would be very glad indeed to answer in three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN: Is there objection to the time of the gentleman being extended for three minutes? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. The gentleman asked why it is not possible to bring them back now.

Mr. HASTINGS. I am in favor of bringing them back now.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I am not, and I will tell the gentleman why.

Mr. HASTINGS. The sooner the better; and I think that every American boy ought to be brought over here and buried in American soil.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. That is right, as soon as it is practicable to do so.

Mr. HASTINGS. And I have always entertained that view.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I only differ with you as to when they should be brought home.

Mr. HASTINGS. Why?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I visited the great cemetery at St. Romagne, where 23,000 boys were interred. Most of these fell in the Argonne-Meuse offensive. I visited a number of cemeteries. I saw them bring in the bodies from the battle areas and bring in new bodies that had been discovered. You could hardly go near the men or conveyances. It is too grewsome a thing to talk about, and probably we ought not to discuss it. The parents will never be able to recognize the form of their loved one. They are sensible and know this. It is a terrible task to perform, and for sanitary reasons alone it should be postponed for a little while; in fact, the opposition of the French Government against the wholesale removal of American bodies at this hour is, in a sense, justified on account of sanitary reasons alone. This reason will not prevail in a little bit. It is thought that by the time the extensive arrangements required are made we can move them without the objection that now prevails. In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, the contention of the graves registration service that the problem of transportation is insurmountable is not well founded. To my mind it is absurd to contend that the American Government, which does big things in a big way, can not remove a portion of 75,000 bodies back to this country. It is contended that labor in France is scarce. I happen to know that the French airplane factories, making planes for America, continued to run after the war to give Frenchmen employment. We can find the labor, we can find the transportation—both railroad and water transportation. Water transportation will be the least of our troubles. The expense will probably be considerable, but, as was said by Maj. Shipman, who testified for the registration service, "If it were practicable and possible, the expense is a matter of the least importance."

Mr. CANDLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I will.

Mr. CANDLER. The Secretary of War has issued the order referred to by the gentleman from Missouri with reference to bringing these bodies home. I think, like the gentleman from Oklahoma, that the sooner we bring them home the better, and

I would like to ask the gentleman if there is not some law upon the statute books now authorizing the return of these bodies.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I know of none; yet I may be in error. But if you inquire at the War Department you will find that its hope is for concentrated cemeteries in France, and, in my judgment, the War Department is now waiting the outcome of the bill, which recently passed the Senate and which I am to-day warning you against.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANDLER. Is there not a provision in the Army appropriation bill now providing for bringing them back?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I do not know.

The bill, H. R. 9927, is as follows:

A bill authorizing the appointment of a commission to remove the bodies of deceased soldiers, sailors, and marines from foreign countries to the United States, and defining its duties and powers.

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to appoint a commission to be known as the reinterment commission, consisting of five persons, one of whom shall represent the Army, one of whom shall represent the Navy, one of whom shall represent the Marine Corps, and two to be appointed from and represent the civilian population of the United States; that said commission shall forthwith examine into the subject of the reinterment of all soldiers, sailors, marines, and other persons connected with the American Expeditionary Forces whose remains are now beyond the territorial limits of the United States, and, at the earliest practicable date and before the 1st day of January, 1920, file with the President, to be by him transmitted to Congress, a detailed statement of its conclusions and recommendations and as to what further legislation or action, if any, is deemed necessary for the proper carrying out of the purposes of this act.

SEC. 2. That said commission is further authorized and directed to ascertain the wishes of the relative or relatives of said deceased soldiers, sailors, marines, and other persons as to whether it is the desire of such relative or relatives to have such bodies reinterred in the United States. When such information is obtained said commission shall, on or before the 1st day of January, 1922, cause all of such bodies and remains of such soldiers, sailors, marines, and other persons whose reinterment shall be desired by said relative or relatives, to be reinterred in the United States in the cemetery or burial place designated by such relative or relatives; and said commission is hereby empowered to make rules and regulations governing its conduct in the ascertainment of facts and to subpœna and administer oaths to witnesses, if necessary.

SEC. 3. That said commission is hereby authorized to employ a secretary and such clerks and laborers as may be necessary, to purchase all necessary office and other equipment, and to enter into contracts and agreements for the proper carrying out of the purposes of this act: Provided, That no employee shall receive compensation hereunder exceeding a rate of $5,000 per annum.

SEC. 4. That the compensation of each member of the commission created by this act shall be at the rate of $5,000 per annum.

SEC. 5. That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purposes of this act the sum of $50,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, which amount shall be disbursed by said commission through an officer appointed by it, who shall be required to give bond in such sum as the commission may fix for the faithful performance of duty.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

Mr. BLACK. Reserving the right to object, on what subject?

Mr. LEHLBACH. On the subject on which for the last two days I have been trying to get a few minutes in which to reply to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON]. Will the gentleman reserve his objection for a moment?

Mr. BLACK. I will.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I hope there will be no objection made to the gentleman's request.

Mr. FESS. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. MOON. The gentleman certainly ought to be heard on the question if he wants to be heard. I only ask it to save time. If I see anything that I want to reply to, I should at least have half the time.

Mr. FESS. Reserving the right to object, I do not want to object if I know we are going to stop this pretty soon. If this is the last request, I shall not object.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOON. It is understood, Mr. Chairman, that I ask for one-half of the amount of time that the gentleman occupies.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes in reply. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, on Saturday last the gentleman from Tennessee, of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, insinuated on the floor of this House that I had preferred false charges against the Postmaster General's Department, and in support of that charge he inserted correspondence between him and the Postmaster General in the RECORD. The gentleman spoke as follows:

Mr. Speaker, on the 11th of September a debate occurred in the House in reference to the Newark, N. J., post office and the action of the Postmaster General in attempting to control, as was alleged, the Civil Service Commission in the appointment of an official—a postmaster. This debate is fully set out in the RECORD; and in it the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] charged not only that the post-office inspectors were falsifying records but he charged the Postmaster General with stating that which was not true in reference to the matter.

Then he stands sponsor for a denial of the charge I am alleged to have made on September 11 and inserts, in support of the fact that my charge was false, this correspondence to which I have alluded. Now, it seems to me that when a Member of this House stands sponsor for a charge of falsehood against a colleague, and states that it occurred in the course of a certain debate, he ought at least to take the trouble to read that debate; and if he had he would have found that subject was not mentioned at all on September 11. As a matter of fact, I said nothing concerning the falsifying of any statement by post-office inspectors on September 11, and did not in the remotest allude to the incident in which that falsification did occur. What I stated on September 11 was this, that there existed throughout the United States a large number of vacancies in post offices of the presidential class, and that these vacancies remained unfilled because of the unwillingness of the Postmaster General to follow the plain dictates of the President's order of March 31, 1917.

And in order to ascertain how long these vacancies did exist and where they existed, when a request for examination had been made to the Civil Service Commission, when they had certified a list of eligibles to the Postmaster General to submit under the general order, a resolution was passed. And as an example of what existed in the country, I pointed to the situation in the post office in the city of Newark, N. J., where, since the 1st day of May, 1918, we have been without a permanent postmaster, and where the highest on the eligible list, a former incumbent of that office, was refused the appointment because he did not suit the Postmaster General; that the Postmaster General had asked the Civil Service Commission for a rerating; that after examining into the question they had refused the rerating, but stood by their original act; that notwithstanding that fact, the Postmaster General refuses to carry out the order of the President and submit the name of that first eligible for appointment. I merely spoke of the Newark office as an example of what is going on all over the country. The vacancies of this character, the Postmaster General has since informed us, are to the number of 766 throughout the country.

Now, this is what the Postmaster General—and when I use the term "Postmaster General" it may be the First Assistant Postmaster General or anybody for whom he is responsible—says, in speaking of this Newark post-office situation, the highest eligible being Mr. Bock:

It is also contended by the First Assistant Postmaster General that the ratings given Mr. Bock and Mr. Entemann do not accord with the papers on file in this case. Mr. Bock has a business rating of 75, which seems to have been given him on the ground that he was formerly postmaster, and without any attempt to establish whether he personally discharged the duties of his position at that time or whether the condition of the Newark post office was due to any work on his part.

They say the rating is wrong because they have nothing to show here in the civil-service records or in the post-office records whether Mr. Bock while postmaster of Newark is entitled to credit for conditions in his office. And yet there is on file in the Post Office Department, by its own inspectors, this concerning Mr. Bock:

Interviews with employees and patrons of the office disclosed that the postmaster has devoted, since he assumed charge of the office, about six hours daily to his official duties. While he has no fixed office hours, as a rule he reports at the office about 9 a. m. and remains thereat until noon, returns to the office about 2 p. m. and remains until 5 p. m., and frequently visits the office in the evenings after business hours.

The official duties performed by him consist of general supervision of all divisions of the office; personal attention to complaints by the public and to all correspondence of importance; reviewing reports and financial statements of the office; selecting employees and assigning their duties; the discipline of employees and presiding at semimonthly conferences of the various supervisory officers for considering ways and means of improving the local service; and making daily tours of the workroom and the various divisions of the office. It might also be stated that he has, since January 1, 1913, given much personal attention to the inauguration and handling of the parcel-post system.

From careful inquiry and observation we are satisfied that, as a result of the intelligent personal attention the postmaster has devoted to the office, there has been much improvement in the service, and this is a subject of frequent favorable comment on the part of the employees and the public.

And yet they say there is nothing to show that he is entitled to any credit under the rating of "business experience" on account of his previous conduct of that office. This is taken from the files of the Post Office Department in 1913, when Frank J. Bock was postmaster.

The Postmaster General brought up the subject at a subsequent date and claimed that Frank J. Bock had at one time been charged with political activity as treasurer of the Republican county committee. That charge had been investigated by the Civil Service Commission after the post-office inspectors, and he had been cleared of it, and the Postmaster General acquiesced in the vindication of Mr. Bock and permitted him to serve three years longer after the charges had been dismissed by the Civil Service Commission. When the Postmaster General brought in this question that had been settled and decided by the judgment of the Civil Service Commission over six years ago I then replied that the report of the post-office inspectors in that case was based in part upon statements of witnesses in Newark, which were subsequently falsified, and that the department had based its action on falsified statements. I am not going to take up much of the time of the House, but I am going to read the affidavit of a man who has been well and favorably known all his life in Newark and who was assistant postmaster of Newark under four different postmasters, some being Republicans and some being Democrats, and as good a citizen as resides in Newark. I read:

STATE OF NEW JERSEY,
County of Essex, ss:

William F. Cyphers, of full age, being duly sworn according to law, upon his oath says that he entered the Postal Service in the city of Newark in the year 1898; that he continued therein until April 1, 1918, serving under the following-named postmasters: David D. Bragaw, James L. Hays, Frank J. Bock, and John F. Sinnott. Throughout this period of 20 years he acted as assistant postmaster. In the spring of 1913, during the postmastership of Frank J. Bock, he was examined by two men who represented themselves to be post-office inspectors, whose names he does not know; that these men questioned him at length and purported to take down in writing what he said; that these statements he so made were never submitted to him by these post-office inspectors nor was he asked to sign them; that to the best of his knowledge the questions he was asked on this occasion dealt principally with the question whether Postmaster Frank J. Bock held political conferences in his office in the post office and whether he habitually received visitors there for the discussion of political business; that he stated in answer to such questions that his room as assistant postmaster adjoined the room occupied by Postmaster Frank J. Bock; that there was a connecting door and that at no time was this door closed, and that consequently he had a general knowledge of the business being conducted by Mr. Bock in his office during office hours; that to the best of his knowledge no political conferences took place and that Mr. Bock did not devote his time in the post office in attending to or discussing political matters nor was he in the habit of receiving during such business hours visitors on such political business.

Deponent further stated to post-office inspectors, in answer to their inquiries, that he handled all official mail addressed to the postmaster, and that it was his habit to lay aside such mail as was addressed to Mr. Frank J. Bock by name; that practically all of such mail so laid aside was by Mr. Bock referred to him for his attention, and that Mr. Bock received practically no mail in his office as postmaster which was not on postal business and which as such passed through deponent's hands.

Deponent further says that some time subsequent to the taking of his statement by postal inspectors as aforesaid, a Mr. Doyle, who introduced himself as secretary of United States Civil Service Commission, came to the Newark post office and spent a number of days there in making an investigation; that deponent placed at his disposal desk room in his own office; that Mr. Doyle showed to him a writing which he informed deponent purported to be a copy of the statement which deponent had made to the postal inspectors in the manner above related; that deponent read such statement and immediately called to the attention of Mr. Doyle certain and sundry alleged statements ascribed to him in said writing which he in fact had not made to the postal inspectors and which in fact were not true. Mr. Doyle thereupon reduced to writing the information thus given him by deponent in the form of an affidavit in which affidavit was incorporated the truth regarding Mr. Bock's alleged activities, and also the fact that the paper shown him by Mr. Doyle purporting to contain deponent's statement to the postal inspectors included falsifications of his statement to the postal inspectors.

WILLIAM F. CYPHERS.

Subscribed and sworn to this 6th day of October, 1919.

DAVID LESNICK,
Master in Chancery of New Jersey.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I really do not know that there is anything that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] has said that calls for any special reply from me except the reference to the debate of September 11. A reference to that debate will show that the gentleman not only charged the post-office inspectors with changing and falsifying records, but charged the Postmaster General with lying about his relations with the Civil Service Commission in these matters.

Now, as a matter of fact in these first, second, and third class post offices there is no law that gives the Civil Service Commission any control over the matter. It is only under the President's order that they act as a matter of courtesy to give the information as to the fitness of the applicants for postmaster.

Now, I said the other day, and I repeat it, if a gentleman has made a statement upon this floor which under the facts which develop afterwards he finds to be incorrect, as a gentleman he must retract them. It is a very serious thing to say that a Cabinet officer has lied about the discharge of his duties. The gentleman from New Jersey does not retract what he has said, but he practically repeats what he has said. I assume therefore that the gentleman believes that he is correct in what he said or else, as a gentleman, he would apologize for having made a misstatement. I assume that the gentleman thinks he is correct. Then is it not true that in the estimation of every honorable man, when he has made a charge of that sort, he must make it good by the proof? What proof has he offered here to sustain his charge in face of the denials in the traverse and the record of the evidence offered by the Postmaster General that I put in this record, that shows that the gentleman was mistaken about the whole matter? I said further that if a man would not apologize for an error, but believed it to be true, he must offer proof to sustain it, and if he did not do it—would do neither—he must be relegated to a position of degradation as having breached the rules of the House of Representatives without having the manhood to stand by the position that he has taken, by the proof, or offering an apology.

Now, what has the gentleman done along that line? I am not here to say that the gentleman has degraded himself. I am not here to say that he has spoken falsely. I said in my discussion of the matter before that I did not know whether he was correct or not, that I had no reflection to make upon him. I laid down a general rule, that is recognized as binding, to control the conduct of gentlemen. He can bring himself under those rules if he wants to. If he does not, if he does not see fit to do that, and if he does not apologize or make good his charges, in view of the traverse and the evidence showing that the gentleman was incorrect, then let him take that position in the judgment of the honest men of this House—and I include him among the number—to say what the opinion of the House ought to be concerning that sort of conduct.

I will ask the gentleman, Does he feel in connection with this matter that in view of the very unkind things he has said about the Postmaster General, in view of the fact that there is nothing to sustain those charges, that he stands to-day as a Representative on the pedestal of honor, or is he in darkness at the foot of the throne of degradation?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. I was about through, but I will yield.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I merely want to say the gentleman reiterates that in the debate on September 11 I made the charge of falsification against post-office inspectors.

Mr. MOON. I say that in the debate on that day you charged the Postmaster General with having not told the truth in reference to the matter.

Mr. LEHLBACH. The question was not brought up until the 24th of September.

Mr. MOON. It may be the gentleman is correct as to the date. You do not deny that you said that, do you?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I neglected to ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

Mr. MOON. I object to the extension of remarks of that kind.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee objects.

Mr. CARSS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CARSS: Page 1, lines 7 and 8, strike out the words "and who are without sufficient means to provide for their own rehabilitation."

Mr. CARSS. Mr. Chairman, I have offered this amendment to bring the attention of the committee to the fact that if a workingman engaged in industry is injured and he happens to be possessed of a little money, or if he belongs to an organization that pays him a benefit, he is barred under the law from receiving rehabilitation. It seems to me that that places a handicap on him that should not be placed on him.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARSS. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I will state to the gentleman from Minnesota that that was not in the bill as originally introduced, but was placed in it by an amendment voted in by the Senate after considerable discussion; and as far as I am personally concerned, and the members of the committee, we do not seriously resist the amendment.

Mr. CARSS. I am very glad to hear the gentleman say so, and the fact that he admits that they do not resist this amendment is pretty good evidence to me, and should be to the rest of us, I think, that the amendment should be agreed to.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

I shall vote for this bill and I am not entirely in sympathy with opposition to it. The first opposition seems to be old State rights. I had supposed that the question of State rights was settled a great many years ago. But when the question came up here to prevent children from working in facorties old State rights came up. When other questions come up here old State rights is often pushed in here as a reason why this or that particular bill or amendment should not pass. I am not in sympathy with it.

Another objection that is presented to this bill is the question of economy. It seems that the question of economy is very seldom raised here, as the ex-Speaker [Mr. CLARK of Missouri] has said, but it seems to some gentlemen to be a very opportune time to bring in economy when the matter of education is under consideration.

I believe in education. I do not think we spend money enough on education. I think it is the duty of this Congress and the duty of this country, if this Republic is to live, to spend every dollar that it can on education. Gentlemen talk about the cure of Bolshevism, and I. W. W.ism, and socialism, and anarchy, and things of that kind. The best remedy I know of to cure them is education. It should not be left entirely to the States. A Republic can exist only when a great majority of the people in it are intelligent enough to cast their ballots properly, and to understand the questions that come before them on each election day. We should encourage education of all kinds. The Government should encourage it. I sometimes think it would be a good idea if the Government itself took control of the question of education. If we had had a good, strong, healthy American sentiment in this country before April, 1917, we would never have had to go to war with Germany. The German Government believed that we would not go to war with them under any circumstances. The reason they believed that was because they felt that there was a sort of un-American sentiment in this country against war and against going to war with them. They thought an organized minority in this country could perhaps prevent the Congress of the United States from declaring war against the Imperial German Government. What we need in this country is a strong, vigorous, healthy American sentiment, and the only way that can be produced is through the schools and colleges of this country. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the judges of the common pleas court of Cuyahoga County, Ohio, in which county the city of Cleveland is located, have appointed a conservancy commission, the objects and purposes of which are to make the Cuyahoga River more navigable and to control the waters of that river so that the supply may be more evenly divided during the season of navigation.

This is a legally constituted body and has the right to levy a tax for that purpose. At the request of parties interested I have made an investigation during the past two weeks as a member of the Rivers and Harbors Committee of this House. While this conservancy commission is authorized by law to control the water supply, over half of the benefits of their work will help navigation.

Congress has pledged its support to this project some years ago, and I will ask this Congress at its next sesion to assist financially in bringing about the successful conclusion of this work.

There are many industries located along the banks of this river, and if the Government will cooperate with this new conservancy board the Cuyahoga River may be made navigable for many miles.

Millions of dollars worth of commerce pass up this river every year and millions of dollars are invested in industries along its banks.

The city of Cleveland has done more than its share to assist in widening and straightening this river, and I feel that the Government should work in conjunction with this conservancy board and help these men who have invested millions in the industrial life of the city of Cleveland.

Thousands of tons of iron ore are landed in Cleveland from up the Lakes every year. Thousands of tons of coal are shipped to Cleveland every year and thousands of tons of steel are manufactured there every year.

I wish to urge the Members of this House to study this situation and I assure you that I am ready and willing to give them any information that they may desire.

Cleveland has waited long for this assistance and the citizens of that city have done more than their part.

There is no harbor in the United States where the expenditure of a few thousand dollars would help build up the commerce of this country more than in the city of Cleveland.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. It is certainly wise for us to legislate with our eyes open. I fear sometimes members of the committee accept all too lightly things that come from the governing committee having the matter in charge. Just what are we doing? This is intended to be a bill to provide vocational rehabilitation for those who are unable to help themselves. A few moments ago we adopted an amendment putting further restrictions on the bill.

Now, an amendment is offered to strike out "without sufficient means to provide for rehabilitation and their return to civil employment." This means that the field is wide open. No matter if a man is worth $100,000, if he falls off a mule in his own barnyard and sprains his ankle you can go so far as to put him in one of these institutions where he can be rehabilitated at the public expense. That is precisely the situation made by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota, when he wants to strike out those words. The real object of the bill in the minds of the proponents must have been to afford relief to the man who could not help himself. We are traveling far, far afield on the original proposition, gentlemen of the committee, but when we go so far as to say no matter what a man's financial responsibility may be, if he be worth $50,000, $100,000, $500,000, if he be injured in trade or commerce, if he be a wholesale grocer and a barrel rolls on his toe, you can send him, at the public expense, to one of these institutions where the United States of America provides dollar for dollar, surely that is not intended in this bill.

I will go as far as anyone in my desire to aid the afflicted in this country, but I do not believe that you should draft a bill to afford relief to those who are abundantly able to help themselves.

Mr. CARSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. CARSS. This is to be a public institution.

Mr. GARD. What is?

Mr. CARSS. The rehabilitation schools.

Mr. GARD. Not necessarily, you may take it up in a private institution.

Mr. CARSS. No; they are administered under the State government. Would the gentleman bar a man from sending his children to a public school because he happens to be worth $100,000?

Mr. GARD. Certainly not.

Mr. CARSS. Then how can you bar a man because he is worth $100,000 from taking advantage of an institution the support of which he helps to pay for?

Mr. GARD. Because these men can take care of themselves; take the case that I cited of the wholesale grocer, if a barrel rolls on his foot.

Mr. BANKHEAD. He would not be covered by this bill.

Mr. GARD. Certainly he would, and he could go to a rest cure at public expense and he has plenty of money to pay for it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. CARSS]. I do not think you will accomplish the purpose of this bill unless you adopt this amendment. The restrictions put on the bill a short time ago provide that a man shall be rehabilitated in certain pursuits and industries. I think it is far-fetched for the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] to bring in the case of a man worth $100,000 who might be engaged in work in his own place and a barrel of sugar rolling over his foot and think for one moment that that man is going to secure the benefits of rehabilitation, putting in his time and becoming rehabilitated and reeducated when he does not need it.

This is along the line of the workmen's compensation act in the State of Ohio, and there is not a State in the Union that has a better workmen's compensation act than has the gentleman's own State.

Let me call attention to the fact that there is no restriction in the State of Ohio as to how the workmen's compensation law shall be applied. It makes no difference whether a man has got a little home and enough money coming in from the outside sources to sustain him during the period of his illness when he is incapacitated, but he gets a certain stipulated sum.

He gets certain hospital treatment, he gets certain surgical appliances, he is entitled to certain considerations under that law. They do not raise the distinction that would be raised in this bill, unless the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. CARSS] is adopted. If this thing is to be practical, it ought to be applied generally; it seems to be that that restriction in there should be stricken out, and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio will accomplish the result.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes.

Mr. GARD. I am very glad that the gentleman said what he did about the Ohio law, but he realizes that the compensation law in the State of Ohio is worked out in that State alone and is worked out by assessment on the manufacturing concerns which are protected and that every man in industry there is protected. It does not extend to commerce and trade as this bill does.

Mr. NOLAN. That is the theory of the proponents of this bill, that society will bear the expense of the rehabilitation of these cripples.

Mr. GARD. But the industry in which a man works pays for the disability, not the Government; that is the distinction.

Mr. NOLAN. Industry and society ought to take care of the industrial cripples and ought to take care of the man who happens to be sick and disabled in industry. That is what the workmen's compensation law does, but this goes further. It seeks to make a man a useful member of society instead of an object of charity, putting him on the street corner selling lead pencils or putting him in the mendicant class. He is to be rehabilitated so that he may be a producer. That is the fundamental principle underlying this sort of legislation. I hope the amendment will be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. NOLAN) there were—ayes 33, noes 19.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CONNALLY) there were—ayes 22, noes 50.

So the committee refused to rise.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I desire to offer.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MADDEN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 4438 and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, will this bill have the right of way on Thursday?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would think so.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, October 15, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting proposed draft of a bill to authorize the reenlistment or reinstatement of enlisted men, deserters from the naval service, if pardoned by the President, and for other purposes (H. Doc. No. 266); to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, transmitting a copy of the report of the commission in valuation docket No. 4, the Kansas City Southern Railway Co. et al. (S. Doc. No. 130); to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. ALEXANDER, from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 3621) to establish load lines for certain vessels, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 377), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 9183) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to adjust the terms of the contract for the sale of the old post-office property in New Haven, Conn., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 378), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 9697) to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across Pearl River, between Pearl River County, Miss., and Washington Parish, La., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 380), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 3096) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Red River at or near Moncla, La., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 361), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. McKENZIE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 9412) to authorize and direct the Secretary of War to transfer free of charge certain surplus motor-propelled vehicles and motor equipment to the Department of Agriculture, Post Office Department, and the Treasury Department for the use of Public Health Service, and certain other surplus property to the Department of Agriculture, and for other purposes, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 383), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. ROGERS, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 9782) to regulate further the entry of aliens into the United States, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 382), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. ZIHLMAN, from the Committee on War Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 3791) to pay the heirs of Lewis J. Blair, late lieutenant colonel of the Eighty-eighth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, amount due him in the Court of Claims, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 379), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9867) granting an increase of pension to Emma R. Walters, and the same was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. KNUTSON: A bill (H. R. 9924) to aid in winding up the affairs of the Chippewa Indians of Minnesota; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. HAMILL: A bill (H. R. 9925) to provide an extension to the post office at Jersey City, N. J.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. KAHN: A bill (H. R. 9926) to provide for appropriate military records for persons who, pursuant to orders, reported for military duty, but whose induction or commission into the service was not, through no fault of their own, formally completed on or prior to November 11, 1918, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. BLAND of Indiana: A bill (H. R. 9927) authorizing the appointment of a commission to remove the bodies of deceased soldiers, sailors, and marines from foreign countries to the United States, and defining its duties and powers; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. HASTINGS: A bill (H. R. 9928) to define the status of and to remove the restrictions from certain members of the Five Civilized Tribes, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. JONES of Texas: A bill (H. R. 9929) for the erection of a public building in the city of Quanah, county seat of Hardeman County, State of Texas, and appropriating money therefor; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. ROGERS: A bill (H. R. 9930) to facilitate the naturalization of aliens who waived exemption under the selective-service act or who were actually inducted into the military or naval service of the United States; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. CRISP: A bill (H. R. 9931) to increase the appropriation for the purchase of a site and erection of a building for a post office at Dawson, Ga.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. NOLAN: A bill (H. R. 9932) authorizing the Federal Trade Commission to accept and administer for the benefit of the public and the encouragement of industry, inventions, patents, and patent rights, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. ZIHLMAN: Resolution (H. Res. 334) providing for the appointment of a committee to investigate the hacking laws of the District of Columbia; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. MADDEN: Resolution (H. Res. 335) requesting the Interstate Commerce Commission to investigate the operations of the Adams Express Co. and report its findings to the House of Representatives; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BACHARACH: A bill (H. R. 9933) for the relief of Wilhelm Alexanderson and the members of his crew, the said Wilhelm Alexanderson being the owner of the motor boat Spray; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. ELLIOTT: A bill (H. R. 9934) granting a pension to Phoebe Morgan; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FRENCH: A bill (H. R. 9935) granting an increase of pension to Frank E. Drew; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HADLEY: A bill (H. R. 9936) for the relief of J. M. Farrell; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. HAMILTON: A bill (H. R. 9937) granting a pension to Emma L. Pugh; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HULINGS: A bill (H. R. 9938) granting a pension to Robert Criswell Pollock; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. JEFFERIS: A bill (H. R. 9939) authorizing the Treasurer of the United States to pay to Henry J. Meyers the sum of $785.10 as full compensation for services rendered as a member of local draft board No. 1, city of Omaha, State of Nebraska; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9940) granting an increase of pension to Alzina S. Swobe; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. KEARNS: A bill (H. R. 9941) granting an increase of pension to William N. King; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. NOLAN: A bill (H. R. 9942) granting a pension to Rosa McPhetridge; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WHITE of Maine: A bill (H. R. 9943) granting an increase of pension to Frank H. Read; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By the SPEAKER (by request): Petition of sundry citizens of New York, favoring the impeachment of President Woodrow Wilson on the ground that without the consent of Congress he has unlawfully commanded our troops to wage war in Russia and Siberia; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also (by request), petition of B. J. Sutherland and others of Missouri, favoring the impeachment of Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States, on the ground that without the consent of Congress he has unlawfully commanded our troops to wage war in Russia and Siberia; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BACHARACH: Resolutions adopted by the Lithuanians of the State of New Jersey in re recognition of Lithuania as a free and independent State; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. OSBORNE: Memorial of Association of Business Organizations of Los Angeles, Calif., representing 22 principal commercial organizations of that vicinity, requesting that because of the entirely different operating and other conditions electric railways be eliminated from legislation affecting steam railroads; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, October 15, 1919.

(Legislative day of Tuesday, October 14, 1919.)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The VICE PRESIDENT resumed the chair.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Calder	Dial	Frelinghuysen
Ball	Capper	Dillingham	Gay
Bankhead	Chamberlain	Fall	Gerry
Beckham	Colt	Fletcher	Gronna
Brandegee	Culberson	France	Harding
Harris	La Follette	Page	Sterling
Harrison	Lenroot	Penrose	Sutherland
Henderson	Lodge	Poindexter	Swanson
Hitchcock	McCumber	Pomerene	Thomas
Johnson, Calif.	McKellar	Ransdell	Trammell
Jones, Wash.	McNary	Reed	Underwood
Kellogg	Nelson	Robinson	Wadsworth
Kendrick	New	Sheppard	Walsh, Mass.
Kenyon	Newberry	Simmons	Walsh, Mont.
Keyes	Norris	Smith, Ariz.	Watson
King	Nugent	Smoot	Williams
Kirby	Overman	Spencer	Wolcott
Knox	Owen	Stanley

Mr. DIAL. I wish to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], is absent on account of illness in his family. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. NEWBERRY. I wish to state that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS] are absent on business of the Senate.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I desire to announce that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], and the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] are absent in committee.

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] is detained from the Senate by illness in his family. The Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES], and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] are absent on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-one Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

PROMOTION OF FOREIGN COMMERCE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. As in legislative session, the Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the War Finance Corporation in response to a resolution of the 1st instant, which will be inserted in the RECORD.

The communication is as follows:

WAR FINANCE CORPORATION,
Washington, October 11, 1919.

The SECRETARY OF THE UNITED STATES SENATE,
The Capitol.

SIR: In response to Senate resolution No. 203, the War Finance Corporation respectfully submits the following:

1. The activities of the War Finance Corporation in respect to the promotion and development of the foreign commerce of the United States are confined exclusively to making advances in order to promote commerce with foreign nations through the extension of credits:

(a) To any person, firm, corporation, or association engaged in the business in the United States of exporting therefrom domestic products to foreign countries, if such person, firm, corporation, or association is, in the opinion of the board of directors of the corporation, unable to obtain funds upon reasonable terms through banking channels.

(b) To any bank, banker, or trust company of the United States which after the passage of the amendment to the act shall make an advance to any such person, firm, corporation, or association for the purpose of assisting in the exportation of such products.

2. The act of March 3, 1919 (Public, No. 328, 65th Cong.), conferring these powers on the corporation expressly provides that advances may be made until the expiration of one year after the termination of the war, as fixed by the proclamation of the President. It will be seen, therefore, that the powers conferred upon the War Finance Corporation in respect to promoting foreign commerce are of an emergency character only.

3. It is manifestly impracticable to estimate the cost of such work, as the work in connection with the foreign trade authorized to be carried on by the War Finance Corporation is done by the regular employees of the corporation in connection with their general duties.

The amount of time devoted by such employees to the promotion of foreign trade is negligible as compared with the general duties performed by them.

The total number of employees engaged in the general business of the corporation, including secretary-treasurer, counsel, expert examiners, bookkeepers, statisticians, clerks, stenographers, messengers, and charwomen, is at the present time 28, but this number is being gradually reduced.

The total amount of compensation paid such employees amounts, in the aggregate, to the sum of $6,229.83 per month.

It is suggested that the expense of carrying on the work of the War Finance Corporation relating to foreign commerce can not be said to be a "cost to the Government," for the reason that all of the expenses of the corporation are paid out of its earnings, and the earnings are greatly in excess of expenses, so that in the liquidation of the assets of the corporation it is believed that a substantial amount will be returned to the Treasury over and above operating expenses.

4. It is respectfully suggested that the activities of the War Finance Corporation in respect to foreign trade are special in their character and in no sense a duplication of the work performed by other agencies or bureaus of the Government.

5. Inasmuch as the work of the War Finance Corporation in respect to foreign commerce is essentially of an emergency character and of an entirely different nature from that carried on by the other departments set out in the Senate resolution, the corporation is unable to submit any suggestions and recommendations looking to the closer cooperation and coordination of the various agencies of the Government for the effective promotion of the foreign commerce of the United States.

Respectfully submitted, by order of the board of directors of the War Finance Corporation, this the 11th day of October, 1919.

ANGUS W. MCLEAN,
Acting Managing Director.

HYGIENIC LABORATORY, WASHINGTON, D. C. (S. DOC. NO. 134).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service submitting a deficiency estimate of appropriations in the sum of $30,000 for the purchase and installation of additional furniture and equipment for the new additions to the Hygienic Laboratory, Washington, D. C., which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

H. R. 6810. An act to prohibit intoxicating beverages and to regulate the manufacture, production, use, and sale of high-proof spirits for other than beverage purposes, and to insure an ample supply of alcohol and promote its use in scientific research and in the development of fuel, dye, and other lawful industries;

H. R. 7972. An act to improve the administration of the Postal Service in the Territory of Hawaii, in Porto Rico, and the Virgin Islands; and

H. R. 8986. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Paris-Hugo Bridge Co. to construct a bridge and approaches thereto across Red River near Arthur City, Lamar County, Tex.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. McLEAN presented a memorial of the Friends of Irish Freedom, of New Haven, Conn., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed league of nations covenant and praying for its separation from the treaty of peace with Germany, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of the Local Grange of West Hartford, of the Young People's Society of the Christian Endeavor of the First Congregational Church of Somers, and of the Archdeaconry of the Episcopal Church of Bristol, all in the State of Connecticut, praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition signed by the governor of Connecticut and sundry citizens of Hartford, Conn., praying for an investigation in the recent race riots and lynching, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of the congregations of the Church of Christ of Orange, Conn., and of the First Congregational Church of Bloomfield, Conn., praying that immediate steps be taken by the United States Government to prevent the extermination of the Armenian people by the Turks, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of sundry Lithuanian citizens of New Haven, Conn., praying that the United States Government take steps to aid the Lithuanian Government in defending itself from Polish, Russian, and German imperialism, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MOSES presented a petition from the United Baptist Convention of New Hampshire assembled at Manchester, N. H., praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which was ordered to lie on the table.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CALDER:

A bill (S. 3231) to make unlawful the unauthorized manufacture and wearing of insignia of the United States, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SHERMAN:

A bill (S. 3232) granting an increase of pension to Anna Higgins; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. McKELLAR:

A bill (S. 3233) regulating the education and naturalization of aliens and the children of aliens, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. SUTHERLAND:

A bill (S. 3234) granting an increase of pension to Enoch F. Blackwell; to the Committee on Pensions.

THE SHANTUNG QUESTION.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, on August 30, 1919, there appeared in the Living Church an editorial which deals very forcefully with the Shantung question. I ask to have it printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Living Church, Aug. 30, 1919.]

"THE HONOR OF THE AMERICAN PEOPLE IS AT STAKE.

"The American people ought seriously to realize that if the United States Senate should carry the recommendation of its Foreign Affairs Committee into effect, amending the pending treaty of peace by providing for the transfer of Shantung to China instead of to Japan, it would involve three things—a national dishonor to ourselves, an act of perfidy toward three of our allies—Great Britain, France, and Japan—and an irritant to at least the latter that might be deemed a casus belli and would certainly be viewed (quite rightly) as a very unfriendly act. On the other hand, since we would be powerless, on our own motion, to effect the transfer to China unless we chose to make the attempt by declaring war against the three nations mentioned and should win the war, the proposed change in the language of the treaty would be of not the slightest value to China; while, by repudiating the treaty, as we should thus do, we should relieve Germany of all the obligations relating to ourselves which she has been forced to assume, and should dissociate ourselves from the forces of civilization that are now compelling Germany to make some form of restitution for her misdeeds in the past.

"For it must be remembered that the chief issue involved in this Shantung matter, so far as the powers are concerned, is the sanctity of treaties. And the Senate committee is deliberately demanding that Great Britain and France make of their treaty with Japan a 'scrap of paper,' with the penalty that the United States will withdraw from the association with these powers in making peace with Germany if they refuse to do so.

"As representing the conscience of some considerable part of the American people, we unhesitatingly declare that position to involve national dishonor for the American Nation.

"Whatever wrong was done to China—and it was a genuine wrong—was done by Germany when, in 1898, she forced the treaty which gave her the 'lease' of the Kiaochow Bay section of the Province of Shantung; and it was a wrong in which Russia, England, and France immediately afterwards participated by seizing other desirable portions of the China coast and forcing similar 'leases' in their respective interests. If the United States had protested against this wrong at the time it was committed she would have some color—though not much—for the present demand of the Senate committee that Japan, as successor to the 'rights' of Germany, should be deprived of those 'rights,' while no such demand is made upon England or France. The United States made no such protest. The world has acquiesced in the wrong then committed. No nation, unless it be China herself, can intervene now, 20 years too late, and say that the lease to Germany can not be taken over by Japan, who ousted the Germans from their possessions in China precisely as Great Britain and her dominions ousted them from other German colonies, as incidents in the World War.

"That long before we entered the war Great Britain and France made a secret treaty with Japan guaranteeing to the latter her succession to the German lease on condition that she oust the Germans from it is regrettable to us, who do not believe in secret treaties, though entirely in accordance with the general practice of other nations than our own. But as we were holding ourselves carefully aloof from the nations that were straining their resources to repel the German invasion, we have very little right to criticize these for making the engagement. The fact that the treaty was a secret one does not relieve the signatory powers from their obligations under it. Moreover, even if these powers were bound by Mr. Wilson's denunciation of secret treaties made three years later, which, of course, is a preposterous position, it still remains that Mr. Wilson, in his 14 'points,' never demanded that secret treaties already made should be repudiated but only that in future there should be no more of them.

"Mr. Wilson's attitude at Versailles with respect to Shantung, if we understand it aright, was an earnest plea to Japan voluntarily to recede from the rights she had won in China, in order to cooperate in the beginning of a new world era in which weak nations should no longer be despoiled by stronger nations. It would have been a magnificent thing for Japan if she had voluntarily accepted that principle. It would have given her the confidence of the world. It would have guaranteed to her such a moral influence in Chinese affairs as would have been of lasting value to her. It would have cemented her friendship with America. It would have made her the world's leader in dealing with the problems of territorial reconstruction.

"But Japan did not. She insisted upon her rights under the treaty. She had every legal right thus to insist upon them. Great Britain and France fulfilled their obligation to guarantee those rights to her. These nations would have shared in the perfidy of Germany if they had violated their obligation. And if Mr. Wilson had insisted that they do so on pain of refusing American assent to the treaty of peace, he would have committed the American Nation to a demand that Great Britain and France, having profited by their treaty with Japan, now repudiate their obligations under that treaty.

"That is precisely what the United States Senate will have done if it amends the treaty in accordance with the recommendation of Mr. LODGE's committee. But the Senate, in that event, will also adopt a peculiarly discourteous method in doing that which is in itself dishonorable. Instead of negotiating with Japan, England, and France in diplomatic manner in an attempt to undo their own treaty on the ground that we (whom it does not concern) disapprove of it, the Senate is asked by its committee to use its own constitutional power of force—for we will not call it a right—to refuse assent to the treaty of peace except on the condition that these nations comply with our demand.

"The United States, as the disinterested friend of Japan and China, was entirely within her rights in urging the former of these to recede from her rights under that treaty; but she has not the faintest color of right to demand that Japan do so. To formulate such a demand, even in a diplomatic manner, would be a national impertinence which would be, and ought to be, indignantly resented by Japan. And now, from being, two years ago, an appreciated friend of the nations that were in distress, we shall become, if this committee recommendation shall be made the action of the Senate, an international bully, selecting the most offensive way in which to accomplish that which is in itself dishonorable. And the absolute futility of the action is as conspicuous as its impropriety.

"Do the American people realize that this position has been deliberately avowed by a Senate committee, and that there is grave danger that it will be accepted by the Senate itself?

"This is not a political issue; it is an issue in which the honor of the American people is involved, and it is the paramount duty of religious leaders of the Nation to demand that the Senate act both honorably and courteously toward those nations that have solemnly entered into treaty obligations with each other, which obligations now they must fulfill.

"And it should be made perfectly clear to those who are promoting this act of national perfidy in the Senate that the religious sense of the Nation will hold them personally responsible and any political party which may uphold them politically responsible, for what will have become the blackest chapter in American history.

"All that our boys have won in France for American prestige and American honor is now being seriously imperiled by the men who bear the responsibility of the American people in the Senate.

"We shall hope that this may be thoroughly understood throughout the country, and that the conscience of the American people will assert itself in demands upon their Senators that they emphatically reject the amendment which has been proposed by their Committee on Foreign Affairs."

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President, before voting upon the Shantung amendment and the Johnson amendment I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the vital distinction between a textual amendment to a treaty and a reservation.

A textual amendment changes the treaty as to all the parties.

A reservation changes the treaty only as to the reserving party.

A textual amendment in fact makes a new treaty, which must be submitted to all the signatories for their approval.

A reservation does not make a new treaty, because it leaves the treaty intact as to all the other signatories and merely changes it as to the reserving party.

Hence it has become a settled rule of international law that in a treaty between more than two parties a party may make certain changes in the treaty which are expressed in the form of reservations, and may ratify the treaty with these reservations as a part of the instrument of ratification. In such a case there is no resubmission to the other parties, as in the case of a textual amendment. Upon the ratification of the treaty with these reservations, if the other parties to the treaty remain silent they are presumed to have acquiesced in these reservations.

Oppenheim states the rule as follows:

If, however, a party to a treaty concluded between more than two parties signs it with a reservation as regards certain articles, such party is not bound by these articles, although it ratifies the treaty.

Oppenheim also cites the case of the antislavery conference, of July 2, 1890, in which France excepted certain articles from her ratification, and, the other powers having "acquiesced," France was not bound by these articles.

We are all familiar with the fact that it is common for the United States to make reservations in ratifying treaties, as, for example, the treaty of Algeciras and The Hague peace conferences; and in these instances the reservations were acquiesced in by the other parties. It is well to remember in this connection that it is usage or custom which makes international law.

Let us now apply this distinction between a textual amendment and a reservation to the pending Shantung and Johnson amendments. The Shantung amendment changes the text of the treaty by substituting China for Japan in certain articles. With this textual change we have made a new treaty which must be submitted to all the signatories for their approval. This requires new negotiations with every signatory and opens a wide door for controversy. Would England or France, not to mention Japan, accept this new treaty? Looking at the existing international conditions, is it not apparent that this treaty would fail if this amendment were adopted?

But suppose now we express our dissent to the Shantung articles in the form of a reservation; suppose we adopt a reservation in effect that the United States withholds its assent as to these articles and reserves full liberty of action with respect to any controversy which may arise under these articles between China and Japan. The effect of this reservation is simply to change the treaty so far as the United States is concerned and to leave it in full force as to the other powers. In this way we will have accomplished the same end as by an amendment, and in a manner which will not defeat the treaty.

Now, all we have said in regard to the Shantung amendment applies with equal force to the Johnson amendment. The Johnson amendment provides that the United States shall have votes in the assembly or council of the league numerically equal to the aggregate vote of a member of the league and its self-governing colonies and dominions. In its practical application this means that the United States shall have a vote equal to the aggregate vote of Great Britain, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, and India. Under this arrangement Great Britain and her self-governing colonies and dominions would have six votes; the United States, without any self-governing colonies and dominions, six votes; and the other members of the league only one vote each. If there is an inequality in giving the British Empire six votes, do we remedy this evil by giving the United States six votes and leaving France and Italy and some twenty-odd other members of the league with only a single vote?

While there are equitable grounds for giving votes to the British self-governing colonies and dominions by reason of the part they took in the war, we must not overlook the fact that this is an association of sovereign nations and that these colonies and dominions are far from being sovereign States. The Imperial Parliament of Great Britain is the real sovereign over the whole British Empire. As Dicey says, in The Law of the Constitution:

No lawyer questions that Parliament could legally abolish any colonial constitution, or that Parliament can at any moment legislate for the colonies and repeal or override any colonial law whatever.

I can not conceive that the other members of the league would be willing to adopt a new treaty containing the Johnson amendment, and to my mind this amendment would certainly defeat the treaty.

Conceding that there is an inequality in giving the British Empire six votes, the way to cure that inequality is not by extending it to the United States, but by reducing the British Empire's voting strength to one vote, which can be done by reservations. In doing this we are only carrying out the great principle which underlies all international organizations, that each sovereign State, great or small, has an equal standing and is entitled to a single vote. It is not difficult to frame a reservation that the United States assumes no obligations to be bound by any election, decision, or finding of the council or assembly in which any member and its self-governing colonies or dominions have had in the aggregate more than one vote; and also a reservation that in the case of a dispute from which the parties are excluded from voting the word "party" includes the dominant member and all its self-governing colonies and dominions. I am not undertaking to give the exact form of these reservations. I am saying, however, that it is a comparatively easy matter to frame reservations which will give Great Britain and her self-governing colonies and dominions only one vote in all matters in which the United States is interested, and that this is the only just solution of the inequality problem.

The three most popular objections which are urged against the ratification of this treaty are the transfer of Shantung to Japan, the six votes of the British Empire, and the charge that the United States under the covenant is called upon to intervene in every European war. I have outlined how in my opinion the first two objections can be overcome by reservations, and I would like to state how, in my opinion, the last objection should be met.

Article 10 of the league is the only article in which the United States obligates itself to declare war or to intervene by force of arms in European quarrels. Under article 10 this country agrees to preserve the territorial integrity and existing political independence of the members of the league against external aggression. We have here a solemn contract which the United States must fulfill. We obligate ourselves to preserve against external aggression the territorial boundaries of the members of the league, and this means war or armed intervention. There is no element of judgment or discretion in the matter—we must do the thing we covenant to do. The fact that Congress alone under our Constitution has power to declare war in no way relieves us of this obligation. This contract being within the treaty-making power, Congress is under an obligation to carry it out whether it approves of the war or not. Some confusion of thought has arisen from the assertion that the obligation under article 10 is a moral obligation, and hence that the United States or Congress could exercise its judgment in any given case. This position will not bear examination. There is no difference in the binding force between a moral and a legal obligation. The only difference lies in the sanction or the means by which the obligation is enforced. A legal obligation is enforced by the sanction of compulsion or by the courts; a moral obligation is enforced by the sanction of the conscience or public opinion; but the binding force of the obligation to do the thing you agreed to do is the same in either case. All international laws rest upon moral obligations, because there is no compulsory sanction to enforce them. If you admit the principle that the obligations arising under international law are matters of judgment or discretion, you undermine the whole structure and admit the justification of Germany in invading Belgium.

Taking this view of the sacredness and binding force of our obligation under article 10, I believe that the United States should be relieved of this obligation and the whole question of armed intervention under the covenant should be left for Congress to decide in each case as it arises; and this can all be accomplished by a reservation.

Mr. President, I have always been in favor of the ratification of this treaty with reservations safeguarding American interests. I am in favor of a reservation exempting the United States from the Shantung articles. I am in favor of a reservation equalizing the voting strength of the United States and the British Empire by giving the British Empire only one vote in all matters in which the United States is directly or indirectly interested. I am in favor of a reservation relieving the United States from its obligations under article 10 and leaving it to the judgment of Congress whether in any given case the United States will intervene to preserve the territorial boundaries or the political independence of members of the league. I am in favor of a reservation which makes it clear that the United States can withdraw from the league upon giving two years' notice under article 1. Under that article I think each sovereign State is the judge as to whether it has fulfilled its international obligations and its obligations under the covenant, because no power to pass upon this question by either the council or the assembly is found in the covenant. At the same time, as this article is open to another construction, I would correct this ambiguity by an interpretative reservation.

I am in favor of a reservation clarifying the article dealing with the Monroe doctrine and making it certain in case of any dispute that the United States is to be the judge as to whether it is within that doctrine. It must be made clear and certain that the Monroe doctrine is outside the jurisdiction of the league.

I am in favor of taking away from the council the power to decide whether a dispute relates to domestic questions and expressly reserving that right to the United States; and also of amplifying the fact that all internal and domestic questions are outside the jurisdiction of the league.

Mr. President, I deem all these reservations essential for the protection of America and that they should be incorporated in the instrument of ratification as the conditions upon which we ratify the treaty. The United States occupies a peculiar and unique position in the family of nations, and we should protect in all essential respects our domestic and foreign policies.

Mr. President, these reservations leave unimpaired the great principles underlying the league of nations. We still have an association of free nations cooperating to secure the present and future peace of the world. We still have obligatory conferences, the provisions relating to compulsory arbitration and inquiry, the reduction of armament, and other kindred provisions—all aimed at the great object of lessening war and preventing a repetition of the frightful scenes through which the world has just passed.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, it is my purpose to offer an interpretative resolution to the treaty with Germany, to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate, as follows:

Interpretative resolution.

Resolved: 1. The United States, in ratifying the covenant of the league of nations and the treaty with Germany, does not intend to be understood as modifying in any degree the obligations entered into by the United States and the Entente Allies in the agreement set forth by the Secretary of State on November 5, 1918, in his communication to the minister of Switzerland in charge of German interests in the United States, upon which as a basis the German Empire agreed to the armistice of November 11, 1918, and laid down its arms. The United States regards that contract to carry out the principles set forth by the President of the United States on January 8, 1918, and in subsequent addresses, as a world agreement binding on the great nations which entered into it, and that the principles there set forth will be carried out in due time through the mechanism provided in the covenant, and that the covenant provisions, including article 23, paragraph (b), pledging the members of the league to undertake to secure just treatment of the native inhabitants under their control, involves a pledge to carry out these principles.

2. Article 147, under which Germany recognizes the protectorate proclaimed over Egypt by Great Britain, is understood to be merely a means through which the nominal suzerainty of Turkey over Egypt shall be transferred to the Egyptian people, and shall not be construed as a recognition by the United States in Great Britain of any sovereign rights over the Egyptian people or as depriving the people of Egypt of any of their rights of self-government.

Mr. President, on page 183 of the treaty of peace with Germany, article 147, it is provided:

Germany declares that she recognizes the protectorate proclaimed over Egypt by Great Britain on December 18, 1914.

And when this treaty is agreed to by all the nations parties thereto it might appear to be a commitment in favor of the protectorate proclaimed as a war measure in 1914 by Great Britain over the Egyptian people.

In considering the rights of subject peoples throughout the world—the people in Shantung, where the sovereignty properly belongs to the Chinese people; in Egypt, where the sovereignty properly belongs to the Egyptian people; in Ireland, where the sovereignty and the right of self-government belong to the Irish people; in Poland, where the sovereignty belongs to the Polish people; in the Philippines, where the sovereignty belongs to the Philippine people of right—I want to call the attention of the Senate to what the agreement was on the part of the Entente Allies, entered into by the Lansing statement of November 5, 1918. I regard it as the most important agreement ever entered into by modern nations. It is binding on all the belligerents as a solemn covenant of august dignity with which they bought the peace of the world on the battle field.

It is a solemn pledge to recognize the rights of all nations and peoples, subject or not subject, to self-government, and that no government may be exercised over one people by another without the consent of the governed. It is a pledge to give the people of Ireland and of Porto Rico, of Egypt and of the Philippines, and of the world self-government whenever they are competent to exercise it, and in any contingency to govern the weak peoples as a sacred trust for the benefit of the governed in fullest good faith.

On November 6, 1918, the Secretary of State, Mr. Lansing, published the following to the world:

From the Secretary of State to the Minister of Switzerland, in charge of German interests in the United States.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
November 5, 1918.

SIR: I have the honor to request you to transmit the following communication to the German Government:

In my note of October 23, 1918, I advised you that the President had transmitted his correspondence with the German authorities to the Governments with which the Government of the United States is associated as a belligerent, with the suggestion that if those Governments were disposed to effect peace upon the terms and principles indicated their military advisers and the military advisers of the United States be asked to submit to the Governments associated against Germany the necessary terms of such armistice as would fully protect the interests of the peoples involved and insure to the associated Governments the unrestricted power to safeguard and enforce the details of the peace to which the German Government had agreed, provided they deemed such an armistice possible from the military point of view.

The President is now in receipt of a memorandum of observations by the allied Governments on this correspondence, which is as follows:

"The allied Governments have given careful consideration to the correspondence which has passed between the President of the United States and the German Government. Subject to the qualifications which follow, they declare their willingness to make peace with the Government of Germany on the terms of peace laid down in the President's address to Congress of January, 1918, and the principles of settlement enunciated in his subsequent addresses. They must point out, however, that clause 2, relating to what is usually described as the freedom of the seas, is open to various interpretations, some of which they could not accept. They must, therefore, reserve to themselves complete freedom on this subject when they enter the peace conference.

"Further, in the conditions of peace laid down in his address to Congress of January 8, 1918, the President declared that invaded territories must be restored as well as evacuated and freed, and the allied Governments feel that no doubt ought to be allowed to exist as to what this provision implies. By it they understand that compensation will be made by Germany for all damage done to the civilian population of the Allies and their property by the aggression of Germany by land, by sea, and from the air."

I am instructed by the President to say that he is in agreement with the interpretation set forth in the last paragraph of the memorandum above quoted. I am further instructed by the President to request you to notify the German Government that Marshal Foch has been authorized by the Government of the United States and the allied Governments to receive properly accredited representatives of the German Government, and to communicate to them the terms of the armistice.

Accept, sir, with renewed assurances of my highest consideration.

(Signed) ROBERT LANSING.

Mr. HANS SULZER,
Minister of Switzerland.
In charge of German interests in the United States.

This agreement refers to the statement of the President and the so-called 14 points, which all relate to the establishment in some respect of liberty and the maintenance of freedom and self-government of the various peoples of the world.

Mr. President, upon the basis of that instrument, committing the allied Governments to the principles laid down by the President of the United States in his address of January 8, 1918, and subsequent addresses, including those of February 11, 1918, July 4, 1918, and September 27, 1918, the German Government and armies agreed to the armistice. They laid down their arms. They practically put themselves where they were compelled to submit to a dictated peace. It was a contract; it was a world contract; and therefore these addresses of the President of the United States of January 8, of February 11, of July 4, and of September 24, 1918, became supremely important as a part of the contract. The principles which are laid down in those addresses of the President of the United States, accepted by the entente belligerents, became the basis of the treaty with Germany, and the treaty with Germany must be construed in the light of the contract set forth November 5, 1918, on the battle field by which this war was ended. There is no contract which can surpass it in dignity or in force. Therefore, in considering Shantung and the sovereignty to be exercised by the Chinese people over themselves and their own right of self-government, in considering the question of Egypt to the right of self-government and the question of Ireland and the right of the Irish people to self-government, in considering the question of any of these subject peoples and their right of self-government, I feel justified in calling the attention of the Senate and calling the attention of the world to what that agreement was, that it may not be overlooked when we deal with the democratization of the world, for that is what this war was intended to accomplish, and that is what this war has accomplished.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. OWEN. I will.

Mr. KING. I am not quite sure that I understand the position the Senator takes, and for that reason I am making this inquiry. Does the Senator contend that under the addresses to which he refers, delivered by the President upon those various dates, and under the communication which was made by the Secretary of State to Mr. Sulzer, representing the German interests in the United States, we agreed that when we entered the peace conference every belligerent would submit to the peace conference the question of the political rights and boundaries of all of the dominions and provinces and territorial possessions of the belligerents? Does the Senator think that the contract, as he has denominated it, meant that at the peace conference the right of self-determination of the Hawaiian people, of the Porto Ricans, of the Cubans, of the Filipinos, of the Egyptians, of the Indians—I am referring to those who reside in British India—would be the subject of consideration and determination by the peace representatives? Or does not the Senator think that the clear implication of what he denominates the contract was that the peace conference should determine the disposition which should be made of the colonial and other possessions of the Central Powers, whether or not Poland should be set up as an independent nation, whether or not Alsace-Lorraine should be ceded back to France, whether a Czecho-Slovak republic and a Jugo-Slav government should be set up, carved out of the Governments of the Central Powers?

It seems to me that if the Senator places the former construction upon what he calls the contract he might challenge objection to that construction.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I think the Senator in the terms he uses goes further than the language which I used would imply. At the peace conference only the principals could speak while they drew the terms of the German treaty and drafted the covenant, but the covenant provides a mechanism which will afford the means of carrying out the principles referred to, and I am interpreting the meaning of the covenant in the light of the agreements referred to of November 5, 1918. The language of the allied Governments' agreement was that they declare their willingness to make peace with the Government of Germany on the terms of peace laid down in the President's address to Congress of January, 1918, and the principles of government enunciated in his subsequent addresses. These principles most emphatically were not to be applied to the Teutonic powers and their colonies, but to all the nations of the world, as, I think, is clearly demonstrable. Now, I am going to point out what the principles of these addresses were, so that the language shall speak for itself.

In his address of January 8, 1918, he said:

We entered this war because violations of right had occurred which touched us to the quick and made the life of our own people impossible unless they were corrected and the world secured once for all against their recurrence. What we demand in this war, therefore, is nothing peculiar to ourselves. It is that the world be made fit and safe to live in; and particularly that it be made safe for every peace-loving nation which, like our own, wishes to live its own life, determine its own institutions, be assured of justice and fair dealing by the other peoples of the world as against force and selfish aggression. All the peoples of the world are in effect partners in this interest, and for our own part we see very clearly that unless justice be done to others it will not be done to us. The program of the world's peace, therefore, is our program; and that program, the only possible program, as we see it, is this:

I. Open covenants of peace, openly arrived at, after which there shall be no private international understandings of any kind but diplomacy shall proceed always frankly and in the public view.

II. Absolute freedom of navigation upon the seas, outside territorial waters, alike in peace and in war, except as the seas may be closed in whole or in part by international action for the enforcement of international covenants.

III. The removal, so far as possible, of all economic barriers and the establishment of an equality of trade conditions among all the nations consenting to the peace and associating themselves for its maintenance.

IV. Adequate guaranties given and taken that national armaments will be reduced to the lowest point consistent with domestic safety.

V. A free, open-minded, and absolutely impartial adjustment of all colonial claims, based upon a strict observance of the principle that in determining all such questions of sovereignty the interests of the populations concerned must have equal weight with the equitable claims of the government whose title is to be determined.

VI. The evacuation of all Russian territory and such a settlement of all questions affecting Russia as will secure the best and freest cooperation of the other nations of the world in obtaining for her an unhampered and unembarrassed opportunity for the independent determination of her own political development and national policy and assure her of a sincere welcome into the society of free nations under institutions of her own choosing; and, more than a welcome, assistance also of every kind that she may need and may herself desire. The treatment accorded Russia by her sister nations in the months to come will be the acid test of their good will, of their comprehension of her needs as distinguished from their own interests, and of their intelligent and unselfish sympathy.

VII. Belgium, the whole world will agree, must be evacuated and restored, without any attempt to limit the sovereignty which she enjoys in common with all other free nations. No other single act will serve as this will serve to restore confidence among the nations in the laws which they have themselves set and determined for the government of their relations with one another. Without this healing act the whole structure and validity of international law is forever impaired.

VIII. All French territory should be freed and the invaded portions restored, and the wrong done to France by Prussia in 1871 in the matter of Alsace-Lorraine, which has unsettled the peace of the world for nearly 50 years, should be righted, in order that peace may once more be made secure in the interest of all.

IX. A readjustment of the frontiers of Italy should be effected along clearly recognizable lines of nationality.

X. The peoples of Austria-Hungary, whose place among the nations we wish to see safeguarded and assured, should be accorded the freest opportunity of autonomous development.

XI. Roumania, Serbia, and Montenegro should be evacuated; occupied territories restored; Serbia accorded free and secure access to the sea; and the relations of the several Balkan States to one another determined by friendly counsel along historically established lines of allegiance and nationality; and international guaranties of the political and economic independence and territorial integrity of the several Balkan States should be entered into.

XII. The Turkish portions of the present Ottoman Empire should be assured a secure sovereignty, but the other nationalities which are now under Turkish rule should be assured an undoubted security of life and an absolutely unmolested opportunity of autonomous development, and the Dardanelles should be permanently opened as a free passage to the ships and commerce of all nations under international guaranties.

XIII. An independent Polish State should be erected which should include the territories inhabited by indisputably Polish populations, which should be assured a free and secure access to the sea, and whose political and economic independence and territorial integrity should be guaranteed by international covenant.

XIV. A general association of nations must be formed under specific covenants for the purpose of affording mutual guaranties of political independence and territorial integrity to great and small states alike.

We have spoken now, surely, in terms too concrete to admit of any further doubt or question. An evident principle runs through the whole program I have outlined. It is the principle of justice to all peoples and nationalities, and their right to live on equal terms of liberty and safety with one another, whether they be strong or weak. Unless this principle be made its foundation no part of the structure of international justice can stand. The people of the United States could act upon no other principle; and to the vindication of this principle they are ready to devote their lives, their honor, and everything that they possess. The moral climax of this, the culminating and final war for human liberty, has come, and they are ready to put their own strength, their own highest purpose, their own integrity and devotion to the test.

On February 11, 1918, the President of the United States, in addressing a joint session of Congress, in answer to Germany and Austria, said:

It is gratifying to have our desire so promptly realized that all exchanges of views on this great matter should be made in the hearing of all the world.

And he said:

We are indomitable in our power of independent action and can in no circumstances consent to live in a world governed by intrigue and force. We believe that our own desire for a new international order under which reason and justice and the common interests of mankind shall prevail is the desire of enlightened men everywhere. Without that new order the world will be without peace, and human life will lack tolerable conditions of existence and development. Having set our hand to the task of achieving it, we shall not turn back.

* * * I have spoken thus only that the whole world may know the true spirit of America—that men everywhere may know that our passion for justice and for self-government is no mere passion of words, but a passion which once set in action, must be satisfied. The power of the United States is a menace to no nation or people. It will never be used in aggression or for the aggrandizement of any selfish interest of our own. It springs out of freedom and is for the service of freedom.

At Mount Vernon, on July 4, 1918, the President said:

This, then, is our conception of the great struggle in which we are engaged. The plot is written plain upon every scene and every act of the supreme tragedy:

On the one hand stand the peoples of the world—not only the peoples actually engaged, but many others also who suffer under mastery, but can not act; peoples of many races and in every part of the world—the people of stricken Russia still, among the rest, though they are for the moment unorganized and helpless.

Opposed to them, masters of many armies, stand an isolated, friendless group of Governments, who speak no common purpose, but only selfish ambitions of their own, by which none can profit but themselves, and whose peoples are fuel in their hands; Governments which fear their people and yet are for the time their sovereign lords, making their choice for them and disposing of their lives and fortunes as they will, as well as of the lives and of every people who fall under their power—Governments clothed with the strange trappings and the primitive authority of an age altogether alien and hostile to our own. The past and the present are in deadly grapple, and the peoples of the world are being done to death between them.

There can be but one issue. The settlement must be final. There can be no compromise. No halfway decision would be tolerable. No halfway decision is conceivable. These are the ends for which the associated peoples of the world are fighting and which must be conceded them before there can be peace.

I invite the attention of Senators to this language, because these are the addresses which were before the associated and allied Governments when they entered into this agreement which closed the war with Germany, upon which the terms of surrender by Germany were provided.

The President said:

1. The destruction of every arbitrary power anywhere that can separately, secretly, and of its single choice disturb the peace of the world; or if it can not be presently destroyed, at least its reduction to virtual impotence.

2 The settlement of every question, whether of territory, of sovereignty, of economic arrangement, or of political relationship, upon the basis of the free acceptance of that settlement by the people immediately concerned and not upon the basis of the material interest or advantage of any other nation or people, which may desire a different settlement for the sake of its own ulterior influence or mastery.

Mr. REED. What is the Senator reading from?

Mr. OWEN. I am reading from the address of the President of the United States on the Fourth of July, 1918, at Mount Vernon, which was made a basis upon which Germany surrendered, and upon which the German people have a right to stand; upon which the allied peoples have a right to stand; upon which the people of the whole world have a right to stand; upon which the people of Egypt, who went into this war and shed their blood on the side of liberty, have a right to stand; upon which the people of India, who sent 2,000,000 troops to this war, have a right to stand. They shed their blood and treasure on the battle fields on the side of the Entente Allies, and this contract of November 5, 1918, must not be overlooked or forgotten or neglected in the future arrangements of governments on earth. The President said further:

III. The consent of all nations to be governed in their conduct toward each other by the same principles of honor and of respect for the common law of civilized society that govern individual citizens of all modern States in their relations to one another; to the end that all promises and covenants may be sacredly observed, no private plots or conspiracies hatched, no selfish injuries wrought with impunity, and a mutual trust be established upon the handsome foundation of a mutual respect for right.

IV. The establishment of an organization of peace which shall make certain that the combined power of free nations will check every invasion of right and serve to make peace and justice the more secure by affording a definite tribunal of opinion to which all must submit and by which every international readjustment that can not be amicably agreed upon by the peoples directly concerned shall be sanctioned.

"These great objects," continued President Wilson, "can be put into a single sentence: What we seek is the reign of law, based upon the consent of the governed, and sustained by the organized opinion of mankind."

Mr. President, on September 27, 1918, further setting forth the principles which were accepted by the Entente Allies on November 5, 1918, as set forth by the Secretary of State, the President used these words, of profound significance, not to be underestimated, not to be passed by:

We accept the issues of the war as facts, not as any group of men here or elsewhere has defined them, and we can accept no outcome which does not squarely meet and settle them. Those issues are these:

Shall the military power of any nation or group of nations be suffered to determine the fortunes of peoples over whom they have no right to rule except the right of force?

Shall strong nations be free to wrong weak nations and make them subject to their purpose and interest?

Shall peoples be ruled and dominated, even in their own internal affairs, by arbitrary and irresponsible force or by their own will and choice?

Shall there be a common standard of right and privilege for all peoples and nations, or shall the strong do as they will and the weak suffer without redress?

Shall the assertion of right be haphazard and by casual alliance, or shall there be a common concert to oblige the observance of common rights?

No man, no group of men, chose these to be the issues of the struggle. They are the issues of it; and they must be settled—by no arrangement or compromise or adjustment of interests, but definitely and once for all and with a full and unequivocal acceptance of the principle that the interest of the weak is as sacred as the interest of the strongest.

Mr. President, the Entente Allies, desiring to find their peace on the battle field, agreed to these principles.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to ask the Senator a question so that I may get definitely his view, and it would help me to understand his argument. I will simply preface it by saying that I am very much in agreement with the Senator upon the rights of the nations that are capable, at least, of self-government to govern themselves.

Mr. OWEN. I will say to the Senator that I draw a line between those who are incompetent and those who are competent; but even the rights of the incompetent are a sacred trust to be exercised in the interest of the people themselves as the covenant declares in arranging for mandatories.

Mr. McCUMBER. What I want to put to the Senator is this: Does the Senator contend that the American people, for instance, understood, from the acceptance of the 14 points which the Senator has enumerated, that when we came to the peace table the question of the right of the Philippines to self-government might come before that conference, or that in the case of Great Britain the right of India or of Egypt to put in their claim for self-government was understood by Great Britain to be one of the things that might be discussed?

Mr. OWEN. No; the principals alone met at the peace table, but they were under the binding force of the agreement to respect the rights of all subject peoples.

Mr. McCUMBER. Or that France understood, when they accepted these 14 points as the basis of a peace settlement, that Morocco or any of her South African possessions might put in their claim for self-government and have those things decided by the peace conference?

Mr. OWEN. No. When we came to the peace conference it was necessary, first, to set up a mechanism by which to carry out the principles that were agreed upon. It was impossible at that time to deal with questions such as I am now discussing. When the peace conference was brought together, it was for the purpose of settling the terms of peace definitely with Germany, with Austria, with Bulgaria, and with Turkey. These adjustments were so complicated that it was entirely inexpedient to go into these other questions. I am merely pointing out that the nations agreed to certain principles as the basis of the treaty with Germany, and have now provided a mechanism in the covenant of the league by which those principles can be carried out, and that the covenant itself ought to be interpreted in the light of the agreement of November 5, 1918—that is all.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think I understand the Senator's position. His position clearly is that those matters should not be settled at the peace conference——

Mr. OWEN. No; they could not be settled at the peace conference. It was not anticipated that they should be settled by the peace conference. It was impossible to settle them at the peace conference. The peace conference at that time was face to face with difficulties that were almost beyond the power of flesh and blood to settle, and it took them a long time, and a great many expert men, to try to work out the complicated settlement now before us in the German treaty. The amazing thing is that they worked it out as well as they did. I do not altogether approve of the treaty with Germany, but, taking it as a whole, it is the best that could be done, and I am content to take the work which was done by the representatives of the Entente Allies and of the belligerent powers at Paris, and make the most of it. If it be found defective hereafter, I should expect the powers of the world to make the necessary corrections.

Now, Mr. President, of course I am in entire accord with what the Senator from North Dakota said with regard to the different classes of people. Take the people of the Congo, who are absolutely unenlightened, who are uneducated. They are not qualified to safeguard their own lives and their own self-government, but nevertheless the time will come that, even in the Congo, those people can be educated and brought to a point where they may exercise the right of self-government, and the right of self-government inheres in all people whenever they are in a position by education to exercise it. The reason why there are mandatories is because of the backward character of so many people, their lack of education, their lack of understanding of the art of government—and government is an art. It is more than an art. There is such a thing as the science of government, and it was the defects of the structure of government, of the science of government in Europe, that brought on this war, through the rule of the few and the denial of the right of the many to self-government.

The abuses of the poor people of the Congo under Leopold, where great cruelty was practiced on them for commercial advantages, caused an international investigation and correction of the abuses. The Congo is a precedent justifying the right of the people of the world to demand justice for weak and oppressed people anywhere.

Abolition of slavery in the United States is another wonderful precedent.

The President further said, in speaking of this matter:

And with a full and unequivocal acceptance of the principle that the interest of the weak is as sacred as the interest of the strongest.

This is what we mean when we speak of a permanent peace, if we speak sincerely, intelligently, and with a real knowledge and comprehension of the matter we deal with.

* * * * * * *

If it be in deed and in truth the common objects of the Governments associated against Germany and of the nations whom they govern, as I believe it to be, to achieve by the coming settlements a secure and lasting peace, it will be necessary that all who sit down at the peace table shall come ready and willing to pay the price, the only price, that will procure it; and ready and willing also to create in some virile fashion the only instrumentality by which it can be made certain that the agreements of the peace will be honored and fulfilled.

Mr. President, in my opinion the covenant of the league provides the mechanism by which this can be accomplished.

The President said—

That price is impartial justice in every item of the settlement—

And that applies to the people of Germany, Austria, Bulgaria, and Turkey as well as to others. They have a right, too, to ask that the price that they pay—and they were required to pay a price and they ought to be required to pay a price; they ought to be punished for what they did—should be limited by justice. There is a limit to which the people may be punished in justice for the faults of their leadership or even for their own faults.

The President said:

That price is impartial justice in every item of the settlement, no matter whose interest is crossed; and not only impartial justice but also the satisfaction of the several peoples whose fortunes are dealt with. That indispensable instrumentality is a league of nations formed under covenants that will be efficacious. * * *

But these general terms do not disclose the whole matter. Some details are needed to make them sound less like a thesis and more like a practical program. These, then, are some of the particulars, and I state them with the greater confidence because I can state them authoritatively as representing this Government's interpretation of its own duty with regard to peace:

First. The impartial justice meted out must involve no discrimination between those to whom we wish to be just and those to whom we do not wish to be just. It must be a justice which plays no favorites and knows no standard but the equal rights of the several peoples concerned.

Second. No special or separate interest of any single nation or group of nations can be made the basis of any part of the settlement which is not consistent with the common interest of all.

Third. There can be no league or alliances or special covenants and understandings within the general and common family of the league of nations.

Fourth, and more specifically, there can be no special, selfish economic combinations within the league and no employment of any form of economic boycott or exclusion except as the power of economic penalty by exclusion from the markets of the world may be vested in the league of nations itself as a means of discipline and control.

Fifth. All international agreements and treaties of every kind must be made known in their entirety to the rest of the world.

* * * * * * *

* * * It is now plain that they are issues which no man can prevent unless it be willfully. I am bound to fight for them and happy to fight for them, as time and circumstances have revealed them to me and to all the world. Our enthusiasm for them grows more and more irresistible as they stand out in more and more vivid and unmistakable outline.

And the forces that fight for them draw into closer and closer array, organizing their millions into more and more unconquerable might as they become more and more distinct to the thought and purpose of the peoples engaged. It is the peculiarity of this Great War that while statesmen have seemed to cast about for definitions of their purpose and have sometimes seemed to shift their ground and their point of view, the thought of the mass of men, whom statesmen are supposed to instruct and lead, has grown more and more unclouded, more and more certain of what it is that they are fighting for. National purposes have fallen more and more into the background and the common purpose of enlightened mankind has taken their place. The counsels of plain men have become on all hands more simple and straightforward and more unified than the counsels of sophisticated men of affairs, who still retain the impression that they are playing a game of power and high stakes. That is why I have said that this is a people's war, not a statesmen's. Statesmen must follow the clarified common thought or be broken.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McCUMBER in the chair). Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. OWEN. I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. I am very much interested in the Senator's analysis of the treaty and the covenant. He has read from several speeches of the President, among them the one made on January 8, 1918, including the 14 points. As I understand the Senator, it is his opinion that the so-called 14 points are not included in the covenant or in the treaty?

Mr. OWEN. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. GRONNA. Then I misunderstood the Senator. My colleague [Mr. McCUMBER] asked a question, to which the Senator from Oklahoma made a reply, of which I can not give the exact language, but in substance it was that it was not practical for the peace conference——

Mr. OWEN. That was one feature of it only. That was the question of adjusting the rights of all subject peoples by the conference at Paris.

It was impossible to do that. They did deal with the subject peoples of the Teutonic Governments, but not with their own subject people. It was impossible to do that at Paris because the principals were then engaged in settling the war itself with Germany and, as principals, laying down the terms with the German Government. They recognized the principles I am describing in dealing with the subject peoples of Germany of necessity. The question of adjusting their relations as principals with their own subject peoples afterwards, in the light of what they agreed to during the war, is another question. The covenant of the league provides the mechanism.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator, then, as I understand him, believes that these 14 points——

Mr. OWEN. I am only emphasizing one point, and that point is the right of liberty to men everywhere on earth.

Mr. GRONNA. That includes a great many.

Mr. OWEN. Yes; it does.

Mr. GRONNA. That would include all the 14 principles enunciated by the President.

Mr. OWEN. They have some bearing on it.

Mr. GRONNA. Is it the Senator's opinion that these addresses of the President and the 14 points ipso facto become a part of the treaty, and that the league of nations and the council must deal with it in accordance with the principles as they were laid down by the President?

Mr. OWEN. My opinion is that it constitutes an agreement on the part of the Governments of the Entente Allies to carry out the doctrine of liberty and self-government throughout the world. That is the point I am making, and that is the only point I am making, and I want to confine myself to that point.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator has read considerably from the addresses made by the President.

Mr. OWEN. It all goes to the one point.

Mr. GRONNA. I was very anxious to know if we are to understand that these principles are to be recognized by the assembly or by the council in dealing with the peoples of the different nations of the earth, if the treaty becomes effective.

Mr. OWEN. I think the principle of freedom has been clearly set up as the issue of this war—freedom for all people to govern themselves where they have sufficient education and knowledge of government to be able to accomplish it and that the Entente Allies are fully committed to the principle.

Mr. GRONNA. I believe, as one Member of this body, I can name at least one principle which has not been made clear in the treaty, according to the 14 points, and that is the principle of the freedom of the seas. We must deal with these questions in a practical way.

Mr. OWEN. I am dealing with one question at a time, if the Senator will permit me, and I should like to confine myself to that question.

Mr. GRONNA. Of course, I shall not press the inquiry.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator be willing to read again the words of the President which he read but a moment ago and which, as I recollect it, declared that national purposes were being submerged or were on the decline, or something to that effect? He had just finished reading it when he was interrupted by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA].

Mr. OWEN. The President was criticizing the attitude of individuals in charge of governments who, under the idea that they were serving national interests, were ignoring the principles of liberty. This is what he said:

It is the peculiarity of this Great War that while statesmen have seemed to cast about for definitions of their purpose and have sometimes seemed to shift their ground and their point of view, the thought of the mass of men, whom statesmen are supposed to instruct and lead, has grown more and more unclouded, more and more certain of what it is that they are fighting for. National purposes have fallen more and more into the background, and the common purpose of enlightened mankind has taken their place.

Mr. WADSWORTH rose.

Mr. OWEN. If the Senator will just wait a moment, I desire to state that what the President is pointing out is that the mass of men in this war were fighting for liberty and for the overthrow of arbitrary force. The Senator from New York does not intend to take issue with that, I am sure.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; the Senator from New York does not intend to take issue with that in particular, but he does ask the permission of the Senator from Oklahoma to suggest that the events since November 11, 1918, do not bear out the assertion of the President that national purposes are going further and further into the background. I venture to state that there has never been a period in the history of the whole world when nationalism was more vigorous than it is at this time.

Mr. OWEN. I think that is true with regard to every nation in the world; that is the very thing that the President was pointing out—the right of individual nations and individual communities to govern themselves, government by "the consent of the governed"—and when you have government by the consent of the governed, of course you have what would be called in that sense nationalism, for it is the right of self-control, of self-direction, and self-government of each nation.

Mr. POINDEXTER and Mr. THOMAS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I desire to make an inquiry as to whether or not the principle to which the Senator from Oklahoma is confining his remarks has been applied in a practical way in the peace treaty, not only in the German peace treaty but as reflected by the attitude of the American delegation in regard to the Austrian treaty? I should like to ask the Senator whether he thinks it is carrying out this principle to give practical control—economic and industrial control, at least—of Shantung to Japan, or to place the Italian population of the Adriatic and Dalmatian coast under the control——

Mr. OWEN. I will say to the Senator that I do not want him to make a speech in the form of a question. I will answer the purport of the question he is asking.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Will the Senator allow me to complete the question?

Mr. OWEN. Certainly.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Is it in conformity with the principle referred to to give the Slavic nation control of the Italian population of Fiume, or to give Bulgaria, the traditional enemy of the Greek people, control of the Greeks of Thrace? There are other similar instances that might be mentioned.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator from Washington is making statements of fact in which I do not concur, and he is making a statement of principle in which I do concur; that is to say, I am not in favor of giving control of any people to any other people or handing them around as chattels any more than is the Senator. We are in perfect accord about that. It is a question of whether or not the facts are as they are supposed to be.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him another question?

Mr. OWEN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator does not deny, as a fact, that the peace treaty gives control of Shantung to Japan, does he?

Mr. OWEN. I do, most emphatically.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Does the Senator deny the fact——

Mr. OWEN. Just a moment, if the Senator please, because I am not going to be diverted from my argument by these side issues any further than to answer a question, and I will dispose of that, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to complete the question, and then I will cease, and the Senator can answer it altogether.

Mr. OWEN. I will yield further to the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will ask the Senator if he denies the fact that the President or the peace delegation, if we choose to so designate it, representing the United States, used the influence of that delegation to take away from the control of the Italians the city of Fiume and turn it over to some other control? Furthermore, if the peace delegation——

Mr. OWEN. Just one question at a time, if the Senator please. He comes to his "furthermores," but I want him to stop and ask one question at a time, so that I may answer it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. But this is part of the same point.

Mr. OWEN. I will yield further to the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Whether it is not a fact that the American peace delegation, which was responsible for the principle of which the Senator is speaking, did not advocate turning over Thrace and its Greek population to Bulgaria?

Mr. OWEN. The Senator from Washington has asked me five questions in rapid succession—one with regard to the Austrian treaty, another regarding Shantung, the Dalmatian coast, Bulgaria, and Thrace; and one with regard to Fiume, which he asserts was under the control of the Italian people. My answer to that is that Fiume was not under the control of the Italian Government, although there was a large Italian population there; and that Fiume, being a seaport from which the hinterland occupied by the Jugo-Slavs must find access to the sea, it was thought desirable to preserve that port for that purpose, since it would make but little difference one way or the other what the local management of the city was, for, after all, the city's own inhabitants would control the city.

The Dalmation coast does not belong to Italy. Shantung will be soon under the sovereignty of the Chinese.

Mr. President, I am not now going to discuss the question of Thrace, except that I favor the right of the Greek people to govern themselves. With the permission of my colleague, I will resume my argument. I have called attention to these addresses by the President because they relate directly to the agreement entered into by the Entente Allies referred to in the Lansing communication to the German Government. Now, I again call the attention of the Senate to what the Entente Allied Governments agreed to do. The Entente Allied Governments agreed to this—these are the words used by the Secretary of State in addressing Hans Sulzer, the minister of Switzerland, in charge of German interests, for the information of the German Government:

"The allied Governments have given careful consideration to the correspondence which has passed between the President of the United States and the German Government. Subject to the qualifications which follow, they declare their willingness to make peace with the Government of Germany on the terms of peace laid down in the President's address to Congress of January, 1918, and the principles of settlement enunciated in his subsequent addresses."

Mr. President, this is no new doctrine on the part of the Entente Allies; it is not something new. Both Lloyd-George and Clemenceau had expressed the same principles long before. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to what Lloyd-George said on June 29, 1917, and on July 20, 1917. On June 29, 1917, Premier Lloyd-George, after extensive consultation, journeyed to Glasgow to make a speech setting forth the Government's position, and he said:

In my judgment, this war will come to an end when the Allied Powers have reached the aims which they set out to attain when they accepted the challenge thrown down by Germany to civilization.

These terms were set out recently by President Wilson with his unrivaled gift of succinct and trenchant speech. As soon as these objectives are reached, and guaranteed, this war will come to an end. But if it comes to an end a single hour before, it will be the greatest disaster that has ever befallen mankind. * * *

Europe is again drenched with the blood of its bravest and best, but do not forget these are the great succession of hallowed causes. They are the stations of the cross on the road to the emancipation of mankind. Let us endure as our fathers did. Every birth is an agony, and the new world is born out of the agony of the old world. My appeal to the people of this country, and, if my appeal can reach beyond it, is this—that we should continue to fight for the great goal of international right and international justice, so that never again shall brute force sit on the throne of justice, nor barbaric strength wield the scepter of right.

On July 20, 1917, the premier, Lloyd-George, in the course of a lengthy speech in Parliament, said:

Germany is not going to drive Great Britain out of the fight until liberty has been established throughout the world.

Mr. President, the French Government was equally idealistic. On June 4, 1917, the Chamber of Deputies, by a vote of 453 to 55, declared:

Repudiating all idea of conquest of foreign populations, it (the Government) expects that the efforts of the armies of the Republic and of the Allies shall make it possible to obtain lasting guaranties of peace and independence for all peoples, great and small, in an organization of the Society of Nations (Confederation of the World) to be formed at once.

So that the principles laid down by the President of the United States were not new, and they were not at variance with the opinions which had been previously set forth by the authorities of France and of Great Britain. They are the matured opinions of the great American people.

I wish to call attention to what Lord Asquith, the British Liberal leader, said on December 20, 1917, in the House of Commons:

We ought to make it increasingly clear by every possible means that the only ends we are fighting for are liberty and justice, for the whole world, through a confederation of great and small States, all to possess equal rights. A league of nations is the ideal for which we are fighting, and we shall continue fighting for it with a clear conscience, clean hands, and an unwavering heart.

The British Labor Party on January 16, 1918, expressly voiced a demand for free peoples everywhere and the formation of a league of nations, specifying, too, the needed territorial readjustments in Europe.

In France the federation of labor at its national conference adopted by an almost unanimous vote the war aims set forth by President Wilson, and stated that the purpose of the Russian revolutionaries at that time was virtually the same. The executive officers of the French Federation of Labor were instructed to do their utmost to induce the French Government to clearly enunciate these aims.

Mr. President, long before these events the Democratic Party had held a convention in 1916, and they declared practically for a league of nations, and laid down the very principles which free men everywhere on earth now believe in and insist on, as follows:

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS.

The Democratic administration has throughout the present war scrupulously and successfully held to the old paths of neutrality and to the peaceful pursuits of the legitimate objects of our national life which statesmen of all parties and creeds have prescribed for themselves in America since the beginning of our history. But the circumstances of the last two years have revealed necessities of international action which no former generation can have foreseen. We hold that it is the duty of the United States to use its power, not only to make itself safe at home but also to make secure its just interests throughout the world, and, both for this end and in the interest of humanity, to assist the world in securing settled peace and justice. We believe that every people has the right to choose the sovereignty under which it shall live; that the small States of the world have a right to enjoy from other nations the same respect for their sovereignty and for their territorial integrity that great and powerful nations expect and insist upon; and that the world has a right to be free from every disturbance of its peace that has its origin in aggression or disregard of the rights of peoples and nations; and we believe that the time has come when it is the duty of the United States to join with the other nations of the world in any feasible association that will effectively serve those principles, to maintain inviolate the complete security of the highway of the seas for the common and unhindered use of all nations.

The present administration has consistently sought to act upon and realize in its conduct of the foreign affairs of the Nation the principle that should be the object of any association of the nations formed to secure the peace of the world and the maintenance of national and individual rights. It has followed the highest American traditions. It has preferred respect for the fundamental rights of smaller States even to property interests, and has secured the friendship of the people of such States for the United States by refusing to make a mere material interest an excuse for the assertion of our superior power against the dignity of their sovereign independence. * * *

PAN AMERICAN CONCORD.

We recognize now, as we have always recognized, a definite and common interest between the United States and the other peoples and Republics of the Western Hemisphere in all matters of national independence and free political development. We favor the establishment and maintenance of the closest relations of amity and mutual helpfulness between the United States and the other Republics of the American continents for the support of peace and the promotion of a common prosperity. To that end we favor all measures which may be necessary to facilitate intimate intercourse and promote commerce between the United States and our neighbors to the south, and such international understandings as may be practicable and suitable to accomplish these ends.

The naval appropriation act of August 29, 1916, before President Wilson made his statement, expressly declared that the naval program would be set aside in the event of universal disarmament. Without taking the time to read it, I will, with the permission of the Senate, insert the extract from that act in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission is granted.

The extract referred to is as follows:

If at any time before the construction authorized by this act shall have been contracted for there shall have been established, with the cooperation of the United States of America, an international tribunal or tribunals competent to secure peaceful determinations of all international disputes, and which shall render unnecessary the maintenance of competitive armaments, then and in that case such naval expenditures as may be inconsistent with the engagements made in the establishment of such tribunal or tribunals may be suspended, when so ordered by the President of the United States.

Mr. OWEN. There the United States Congress provided that if arrangements were made for disarmament, in that contingency, the program of naval expansion might be set aside, showing the humane and enlightened view of the people of the United States. In an address to Congress on January 22, 1917, 12 days after the sending to us of the joint note by the allied coalition Governments, President Wilson said:

No peace can last, or ought to last, which does not recognize and accept the principle that Governments derive all their just powers from the consent of the governed. * * * These are American principles, American policies. We could stand for no others. And they are also the principles and policies of forward looking men and women everywhere, of every modern nation, of every enlightened community. They are the principles of mankind and must prevail.

Then when the United States announced that we recognized the existence of the state of war which the Imperial German Government was waging against us, the President announced:

The world must be made safe for democracy. Its peace must be planted upon the tested foundation of liberty.

And he added:

But the right is more precious than peace, and we shall fight for the things which we have always carried nearest our hearts—for democracy, for the right of those who submit to authority to have a voice in their own governments, for the rights and liberties of small nations, for a universal dominion of right by such a concert of free peoples as shall bring peace and safety to all nations and make the world itself at last free.

When the armistice was declared, President Wilson, on the morning of November 11, 1918, in a message to the American people, said:

My fellow countrymen: The armistice was signed this morning. Everything for which America fought has been accomplished. It will now be our fortunate duty to assist by example, by sober, friendly counsel, and by material aid in the establishment of democracy throughout the world.

And the premier of the British Empire, Lloyd-George, cabled his congratulations to President Wilson, as follows:

My heartiest thanks for your kindly message. I am certain that the ideals of our two countries regarding international reconstruction are fundamentally the same. I feel sure that at the peace conference we shall be able to cooperate fruitfully to promote the reign of peace with liberty and true democracy throughout the world.

President Wilson, at the session of the plenary council of the peace conference of January 25, 1919, at which it was voted that a league of nations should be established and that it should be provided for in the treaty with Germany, said:

We have assembled for two purposes, to make the present settlements which have been rendered necessary by this war, and also to secure the peace of the world. * * * The league of nations seems to be necessary for both of these purposes. * * * We would not dare abate a single item of the program which constitutes instructions; we would not dare to compromise upon any matter as the champions of this thing—this peace of the world, this attitude of justice, this principle that we are masters of no peoples but are here to see that every people in the world shall choose its own masters and govern its own destinies not as we wish, but as they wish.

We are to see, in short, that the very foundations of this war are swept away. Those foundations were the private choice of a small coterie of civil rulers and military staffs. Those foundations were the aggressions of great powers upon small. Those foundations were the holding together of empires of unwilling subjects by the duress of arms. Those foundations were the powers of small bodies of men to wield their will and use mankind as pawns in a game.

And nothing less than the emancipation of the world from these things will accomplish peace.

You can see that the representatives of the United States are, therefore, never put to the embarrassment of choosing a way of expediency, because they have had laid down for them the unalterable lines of principles.

And, thank God, these lines have been accepted as the lines of settlement by all of the high-minded men who have had to do with the beginnings of this business. * * *

We stand in a peculiar case. As I go about the streets here I see everywhere the American uniform. Those men came into the war after we had uttered our purpose; they came as crusaders not merely to win a war, but to win a cause; and I am responsible to them, for it fell to me to formulate the purpose for which I asked them to fight; and I, like them, must be a crusader for these things, whatever it costs and whatever it may be necessary to do in honor to accomplish the objects for which they have fought.

The next speaker in the plenary council was Premier Lloyd-George, who said:

I should not have intervened at all, but it was necessary for me to state how emphatically the people of the British Empire are behind this proposal; and if the leaders of the British Empire have not been able to devote so much time during the past five years as they would have liked to this question the reason is that they were occupied with other questions that were more urgent for the moment.

Now, Mr. President, I want particularly to call the attention of the Senate to article 147 of the German peace treaty, with regard to Egypt, as follows:

Germany declares that she recognizes the protectorate proclaimed over Egypt by Great Britain on December 18, 1914.

And other nations joining in this treaty might appear to be doing the same thing without explanation. I do not feel willing to have Egypt handed over to the British Empire as a chattel or to be in any way responsible for such a wrong. We were not fighting the war for any such purpose; but Great Britain, in all fairness, I think, was justified in taking drastic steps with regard to the government of Egypt at the beginning of this war, because the then Khedive of Egypt was showing an evidence of his attachment to the cause of Turkey and of Germany as against the Entente Allies, so that it became expedient, from the standpoint of the Government of Great Britain, to set aside the Khedive and appoint his successor by force.

It might be proper to say that in 1882 revolutionary proceedings broke out in Egypt for the purpose of expelling European influences from Egypt. The British fleet, in the protection of its interests and under the claim of protecting law and order, bombarded Alexandria and practically sent armed troops into the Egyptian country, and from that time forward exercised a certain degree of control there, but with the understanding always that the powers which were being exercised were with a view to maintaining the "independence of the Egyptians." Many of the British statesmen have expressed themselves with regard to the purpose of that occupation, none of them more forcibly than Mr. Gladstone in the House of Commons on August 9, 1883, when he said:

> The uncertainty there may be in some portion of the public mind has reference to those desires which tend toward the permanent occupation of Egypt and its incorporation in this Empire. This is a consummation to which we are resolutely opposed, and which we will have nothing to do with bringing about. We are against this doctrine of annexation; we are against everything that resembles or approaches it; and we are against all language that tends to bring about its expectation. We are against it on the ground of the interests of England; we are against it on the ground of our duty to Egypt; we are against it on the ground of the specific and solemn manner and under the most critical circumstances, pledges which have earned for us the confidence of Europe at large during the course of difficult and delicate operations, and which, if one pledge can be more solemn and sacred than another, special sacredness in this case binds us to observe. We are also sensible that occupation prolonged beyond a certain point may tend to annexation, and consequently it is our object to take the greatest care that the occupation does not gradually take a permanent character. * * * We can not name a day, and do not undertake to name a day, for our final withdrawal, but no effort shall be wanting on our part to bring about that withdrawal as early as possible. The conditions which will enable us to withdraw are those described by Lord Granville—restored order in the state of the country and the organization of the proper means for the maintenance of the Khedive's authority. * * * The right honorable gentleman, Sir S. Northcote, has treated us as if we intended to stay in Egypt until we had brought about institutions which would do credit to Utopia. We have no such views. * * * In popular language we mean to give Egypt a fair start, and if we secure it order, supply a civil and military force adequate to the maintenance of order, and with a man on the throne in whose benevolence and justice we have confidence, with institutions for the administration of justice under enlightened supervision and in fairly competent hands—if we have made a reasonable beginning toward legislative institutions into which is incorporated some seed of freedom our duty may be supposed to be complete.

The Anglo-French agreement of April 8, 1904, provides:

> The Government of His Majesty declares that it has no intention of altering the political status of Egypt.

Lord Cromer's report, March 3, 1907, stated:

> There are insuperable objections to the assumption of a British protectorate over Egypt. It would involve a change in the political status of the country. Now, in article 1 of the Anglo-French agreement of the 8th of April, 1904, the British Government have explicitly declared that they have no intention of altering the political status of Egypt.

In the protocol signed by Lord Dufferin, together with the authorized representatives of the five other great powers, on the 25th of June, 1882, it was agreed:

> The Government represented by the undersigned engage themselves in any arrangement which may be made in consequence of their concerted action for the regulation of the affairs of Egypt, not to seek any territorial advantage nor any concession of any exclusive privilege, nor any commercial advantage for their subjects other than those which any other nation can equally obtain.

The authorities up to the war 1914 were unbroken in maintaining this position. Great Britain is in no position with honor to annex Egyptian territory or powers of government.

Mr. President, it is now 37 years that the British Empire has remained in possession of the Government of Egypt. I am told that the amount paid to the Khedive for his valuable services as overlord there is $900,000 a year, which would seem to be a tax on the Egyptian people for the purpose of maintaining a royal state, and of which I do not approve if the Egyptian people are discontented with it. They have long suffered a blackmail tax to Turkey of an annual payment of $3,500,000. I think the power rests in the Egyptian people to run their own affairs and to manage their own business without being taxed by the Turks or the Khedive appointed by Great Britain.

I want to call the attention of the Senate to article 148, which says that—

> In no case can Germany avail herself of these instruments—

Referring to the contracts with Germany—> and she undertakes not to intervene in any way in negotiations relating to Egypt which may take place between Great Britain and the other powers.

It is obvious that Great Britain anticipates and the treaty contemplates negotiations between the Government of Great Britain and the other powers with regard to Egypt. The liberty of the Egyptians under the agreement which I have referred to and under the principles which have been laid down is a matter of immediate and urgent importance to the Egyptians and the peace of the world and should be taken up for negotiations without the embarrassment of any self-serving protectorate set up by the British Government.

Many British statesmen have from time to time since 1882 set forth their views with regard to the purposes of the British Government with relation to Egypt, which have been presented to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Now, Mr. President, I want to print in the RECORD the action of the English Government in making a proclamation appointing a Khedive for Egypt. I do not wish to take the time of the Senate to read it. It is a proclamation putting into force the appointment of a new Khedive for Egypt on December 18, 1914.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The proclamation referred to is as follows:

> In view of the action of His Highness Abbas Hihni Pasha, lately Khedive of Egypt, who has adhered to the King's enemies, His Majesty's Government have seen fit to depose him from the khediviate, and that high dignity has been offered, with the title of Sultan of Egypt, to His Highness Prince Hussein Kamel Pasha, eldest living prince of the family of Mehemet Ali, and has been accepted by him.
>
> The King has been pleased to approve the appointment of Prince Hussein to be an honorary knight grand cross of the Order of the Bath on the occasion of his accession to the sultanate.
>
> The King has been pleased to give directions for the following appointment to the Order of St. Michael and St. George.
>
> His Excellency Hussein Rushdi Pasha, president of the council of ministers of His Highness the Sultan of Egypt, to be an honorary knight grand cross of the order.
> The following notice is issued by the foreign office:
> "His Majesty's Government having been informed that the Government of the French Republic have recognized the British protectorate over Egypt, His Britannic Majesty's principal secretary of state for foreign affairs hereby gives notice that His Majesty's Government adhere to the Franco-Moorish treaty of March 30, 1912.
>
> "The foreign office communicates the following letter addressed to Prince Hussein by the acting high commissioner in Egypt:
> "CAIRO, December 19, 1914.
> "YOUR HIGHNESS: I am instructed by His Britannic Majesty's principal secretary of state for foreign affairs to bring to the notice of Your Highness the circumstances preceding the outbreak of war between His Britannic Majesty and the Sultan of Turkey and the changes which that war entails in the status of Egypt.
>
> "In the Ottoman cabinet there were two parties: On one side was a moderate party, mindful of the sympathy extended by Great Britain to every effort toward reform in Turkey, who recognized that in the war in which His Majesty was already engaged no Turkish interests were concerned, and welcomed the assurances of His Majesty and his allies that neither in Egypt nor elsewhere would the war be used as a pretext for any action injurious to Ottoman interests. On the other side, a band of unscrupulous military adventurers looked to find in a war of aggression waged in concert with His Majesty's enemies means of retrieving the disasters—military, financial, and economic—into which they had already plunged their country. Hoping to the last that wiser counsels must prevail, His Majesty and his allies, in spite of repeated violations of their rights, abstained from retaliatory action until compelled thereto by the crossing of the Egyptian frontier by armed bands and by the unprovoked attacks on Russian open ports by Turkish naval forces under German officers.
> "His Majesty's Government are in possession of ample evidence that ever since the outbreak of war with Germany His Highness Abbas Hihni Pasha, late Khedive of Egypt, has definitely thrown his lot with His Majesty's enemies.
>
> "From the facts above set out it results that the rights over the Egyptian executive of the Sultan or of the late Khedive are forfeited to His Majesty.
>
> "His Majesty's Government have already, through the general officer commanding His Majesty's forces in Egypt, accepted exclusive responsibility for the defense of Egypt during the present war. It remains to lay down the form of the future government of the country freed, as I have stated, from all rights of suzerainty or other rights heretofore claimed by the Ottoman Government.
> "Of the rights thus accruing to His Majesty, no less than of those exercised in Egypt during the last 30 years of reform, His Majesty's Government regard themselves as trustees for the inhabitants of Egypt. And His Majesty's Government have decided that Great Britain can best fulfill the responsibilities she has incurred toward Egypt by the formal declaration of a British protectorate and by the government of the country under such protectorate by a prince of the khedival family.
> "In these circumstances I am instructed by His Majesty's Government to inform Your Highness that, by reason of your age and experience, you have been chosen as the prince of the family of Mehemet Ali most worthy to occupy the khedival position, with the title and style of the Sultan of Egypt; and in inviting Your Highness to accept the responsibilities of your high office I am to give you the formal assurance that Great Britain accepts the fullest responsibility for the defense of the territories under Your Highness against all aggression whencesoever coming. And His Majesty's Government authorizes me to declare that, after the establishment of the British protectorate now announced, all Egyptian subjects, wherever they may be, will be entitled to receive the protection of His Majesty's Government.
> "With Ottoman suzerainty there will disappear the restrictions heretofore placed by Ottoman firmans upon the numbers and organization of Your Highness's army and upon the grant of Your Highness of honorific distinctions.
> "As regards foreign relations, His Majesty's Government deem it most consistent with the new responsibilities assumed by Great Britain that the relations between Your Highness' Government and the representatives of foreign powers should be henceforth conducted through His Majesty's representative in Cairo.
> "His Majesty's Government have repeatedly placed on record that the system of treaties known as the capitulations, by which Your Highness' Government is bound, are no longer in harmony with the development of the country; but I am expressly authorized to state that in the opinion of His Majesty's Government the revision of these treaties may most conveniently be postponed until the end of the present war.

"In the field of internal administration I am to remind Your Highness that, in consonance with the traditions of British policy, it has been the aim of His Majesty's Government, while working through and in the closest association with the constituted Egyptian authorities, to secure individual liberty, to promote the spread of education, to further the development of the natural resources of the country, and in such measure as the degree of enlightenment of public opinion may permit to associate the governed in the task of government. Not only is it the intention of His Majesty's Government to remain faithful to such policy, but they are convinced that the clearer definition of Great Britain's position in the country will accelerate progress toward self-government.

"The religious convictions of Egyptian subjects will be scrupulously respected, as are those of His Majesty's own subjects, whatever their creed; nor need I affirm to Your Highness that in declaring Egypt free from any duty of obedience to those who have usurped political power at Constantinople His Majesty's Government are animated by no hostility toward the khalifate. The past history of Egypt shows, indeed, that the loyalty of Egyptian Mahomedans toward the khalifate is independent of any political bonds between Egypt and Constantinople.

"The strengthening and progress of Mahomedan institutions in Egypt is naturally a matter in which His Majesty's Government takes the deepest interest and in which Your Highness will be specially concerned, and, in carrying out such reforms as may be considered necessary Your Highness may count upon the sympathetic support of His Majesty's Government.

"I am to add that His Majesty's Government rely with confidence upon the loyalty, good sense, and self-restraint of Egyptian subjects to facilitate the task of the general officer commanding His Majesty's forces, who is intrusted with the maintenance of internal order and with the prevention of the rendering of aid to the enemy.

"I have, etc.,

"(Sd.) MILNE CHEETHAM."

Mr. OWEN. It is for the reason that I do not wish, without some interpretative resolution, to agree to this establishment of a protectorate by Great Britain over Egypt that I propose, at the proper time, to offer an interpretative resolution that will cover it. Because I wish to see the right of self-government provided for the Egyptians, the Irish, the Philippine people, and all people capable of self-government, I have called up these records.

Mr. President, the principles which should govern the world in regard to the exercise of sovereignty must, of course, keep in mind the weakness of certain backward people. In the Kongo, perhaps, will be found an extreme example of uncultured, uncivilized people, with no knowledge of government, no knowledge of how to establish an orderly and peaceful government. The same thing might be said in some parts of the Philippines. Yet there are gradually increasing throughout the world educated men belonging to all nations, and the number of educated people is being expanded everywhere. It will be remembered that the policy which I have been advocating to-day of the right of self-government was recognized by the United States after the Spanish War, when we gladly recognized in Cuba the right of self-government, and Cuba has been governing its own affairs for many years now, peacefully, satisfactorily, and without complaint on the part of the United States or any other nation. With regard to the Philippines, we had the avowed purpose of giving them self-government as rapidly as it could be brought about with safety. One of the things which has interfered with complete self-government for the Philippines has been the question as to whether or not the Philippines would be able to maintain their independence if they were turned free without any protecting power to safeguard them; but with the establishment of a league of nations that fear will disappear and the complete independence of the Philippines can be brought about without any great delay.

The same thing is true with regard to Porto Rico. The United States has shown its good disposition there by giving to the people of Porto Rico citizenship in the United States; but Porto Rico ought to have the right of self-government, and Porto Rico ought not to be subjected to the exploitation of those who desire to use the powers of the United States Government in Porto Rico to their own private advantage in any way.

The same principle applies to Shantung. The Chinese occupy Shantung. They are entitled to self-government. It may not be as good a government as they might have established for them by some other power but it would be self-government. Japan has no purpose of maintaining any sovereignty over Shantung and has no right to do so. The very treaty which is before us itself provides that—

> Germany shall hand over to Japan within three months from the coming into force of the present treaty the archives, registers, plans, title deeds, and documents of every kind, wherever they may be, relating to the administration, whether civil, military, financial, judicial, or other, of the territory of Kiaochow.

And Japan has agreed definitely to turn these over to the Government of China, and not to interfere any longer with the sovereignty of China in the government of Shantung.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I do not intend to discuss the commercial rights which Japan desires to retain in the Province of Shantung further than to say that if China, in the exercise of sovereignty, becomes discontented with the management of the railroads in Shantung by Japan, China, being the sovereign power, can take up the question of taking over the commercial property upon making a satisfactory liquidation with Japan.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. The Senator made the statement that Japan had definitely agreed to turn back Shantung to China.

Mr. OWEN. I have made that statement.

Mr. REED. Where is that to be found?

Mr. OWEN. It will be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in a speech which I made some time ago; and the Senator will excuse me if I do not go into an elaborate discussion of it, because I do not want to be diverted.

Mr. REED. I do not want to divert the Senator. I simply wanted to know whether it was in any official document that is on file.

Mr. OWEN. I answered the Senator.

Mr. REED. If the Senator wants to refer me to his other speech, I will, of course, turn to that.

Mr. OWEN. I do refer the Senator there.

Now, Mr. President, the covenant of the league provides a world forum in article 11, which says:

> Any war or threat of war, whether immediately affecting any of the members of the league or not, is hereby declared a matter of concern to the whole league, and the league shall take any action that may be deemed wise and effectual to safeguard the peace of nations. In case any such emergency should arise the secretary general shall, on the request of any member of the league, forthwith summon a meeting of the council.
> It is also declared to be the friendly right of each member of the league to bring to the attention of the assembly or of the council any circumstance whatever affecting international relations which threatens to disturb international peace or the good understanding between nations upon which peace depends.

Under this article a forum is provided where any nation deprived of its right of self-government would have a right to be heard. I take it that the Irish people would have a right to come before the council and before the assembly and to urge their case and to show the reasons justifying their right of self-government.

If they are subjected to commercial exploitation, as I understand has been charged, they have a right to bring that question up, so that the peace of the nations should not be disturbed by any excitement over Ireland or by the constant appeals of the Irish to public opinion throughout the world to sustain Ireland against the British Government.

More than that, I think the matter could be brought up as a dispute in the assembly, as a matter affecting the peace of the world, under the agreement entered into by the Entente Allies, as set forth in the declaration of Secretary Lansing on November 5, 1918. If men are denied their liberty and their right of self-government contrary to the purposes for which this war was fought, contrary to the declaration of principles made on the 5th of November, they have a right to bring that question to the assembly, representing the powers of the world, where it may be heard. That is one of the great purposes of establishing the covenant. It is not to give the covenant the power of overlordship. Overlordship or tyranny is impossible under the league.

I remind Senators that any representative sent to the assembly is subject to immediate recall. He has no tenure of office. He is not appointed for 5 years, or 10 years, or 20 years, or 1 year. He goes as the representative of some power, and that power has the right to fix his tenure. He has no salary fixed. He has no continuity of office. He has no basis upon which to carry on personal intrigue, and neither the council nor the assembly has legislative power. Neither has an army or a navy or a treasury, except such as may be afforded it by contributions of the several nations, as long as they approve, and the nations can withdraw when they wish on reasonable notice.

Many have thought that this covenant established a world association too weak in its power to make effective its purposes. But I hold that the purposes will be made effective by world opinion, by the moral force of mankind, when you take the world forum established in conjunction with the various methods by which those things which would tend to war are prevented from reaching war. One door after another is closed against war, by conciliation, by arbitration, by the negotiations of the council, by the advice and opinion and report of the assembly, and by delays. It is true that the report of the assembly can not be enforced. It is true that the report of the assembly is only persuasive at last. If it is carried out by a nation, however, that nation can not be subjected to war; and if a nation refuses to carry it out, the nation refusing to carry it out can not be invaded under article 10. Such a nation may be subjected to war after three months' notice (art. 12) but not to invasion (art. 10). But at present nations can go to war with each other without having any adequate method of international arbitration, international conciliation, or international settlement of disputes by world opinion. They can go to war now without notice.

The disarmament provided by the covenant of the league, the universal boycott against an outlaw nation (art. 16), and, above all, the pledges of article 10, where every one of the 50 nations of the world agree to respect the territorial integrity of every other nation, where every one agrees to take part in preserving the territorial integrity and existing political independence of other nations, is sufficient to make war practically impossible, because it is incredible that any nation would have the temerity to face the world in arms. Any nation that would do a thing of that sort would become immediately an outlaw nation, subject to world boycott and subject to the armed forces of mankind. The quick fall from power of such a government would be absolutely certain.

Senators say they do not want to bind the United States or join in preserving the territorial integrity of other nations. I say, on the other hand, that I think the wisest and best policy for the United States is to cooperate with other nations in pledging its power to preserve the territorial integrity of other nations, and when it does give that pledge it will suffice to prevent war, not make war. There is no nation in the world that would have the impudence or folly to face the whole world in arms.

The most powerful of all the nations—Germany, Austria, Bulgaria, and Turkey, with their combined power—would not have dared invade Serbia if this rule had been in force. Every prudent, thoughtful man knows that that is the truth. Germany anxiously sought to ascertain from Lord Grey whether or not England would go into the war if Germany should become embroiled in the war with Austria and Serbia. I have always thought it was a fatal error not to have conveyed to the German authorities, in some way that was convincing, the idea that Great Britain would not stand for the invasion of Belgium and France.

We stood for such invasion as neutrals; we talked peace after it happened. We justified ourselves and thought we were doing a fine thing for quite a while, until at last we discovered that our fortunes and our welfare were inexplicably bound with the peace of the world and that we could not at last escape the cataclysm brought about by arbitrary force in invading the peaceful nations of the world.

We have learned the lesson. The world has learned it. The covenant is before us to prevent another World War.

I am in favor of declaring a war of external aggression an international crime of the first magnitude. I am in favor of pledging the power of the United States to forbid it, and to be ready, if necessary, to reduce to subjection any outlaw nation that dares in the future to invade the world.

We have declared that principle in effect by the Monroe doctrine on the Western Hemisphere, and our statement that the United States would regard it as an unfriendly act for any power anywhere in the world to interfere with the rights of the Republics on the Western Hemisphere has been sufficient for a hundred years to protect the Western Hemisphere, except on one occasion—Mexico—when the United States was having a bloody fratricidal strife of 1861 to 1865, the European military powers attempted to set up an empire in Mexico under an Austrian prince. But immediately the war was over the United States served notice on these foreign powers and they withdrew. Maximilian was put before a firing squad, and that ended that controversy.

The United States has never fought a war except for liberty.

In 1776 for the liberty of the Colonies.

In 1812 for liberty on the high seas.

In 1846 for the liberty of Texas.

In 1866 for the liberty of the African slaves in America.

In 1898 for the liberty of Cuba.

In 1917 for the liberty of the world. America demands the fruits of this last Great War.

Mr. President, in every government there are those who divide according to the point of view—the Tories, reactionaries, and conservatives, who favor concentrating power in the hands of the few, and the liberals and progressives, who believe in placing the governing power in the hands of the people. These divisions often defy party lines.

One class of men, the reactionaries or stand-pat element, think favorably of special privilege and in terms of acquisition, while the liberals or progressives think first in terms of human life and think second in terms of property as merely contributory to life.

In all of the Governments of Europe the contest everlastingly goes on, as well as with us.

As a rule, the progressives have faith in the common sense and common honesty of mankind, while the conservatives have little or no faith in either.

But all of the world is now under a profound movement as powerful as the tides toward liberty and justice, and the progress of mankind can not be stopped by any man, any party, or any nation. So far the United States has led the way.

I have faith to believe that the people of the United States will not relinquish the moral leadership which they have gloriously assumed, but that her ideals of justice, liberty, peace, and human happiness may soon, very soon, be established among the sons of men.

THE COVENANT POINTS THE WAY.

I favor the covenant without amendments or destructive reservations, but with interpretations that shall safeguard our rights and prevent the possibility of our views being misinterpreted.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, the amendment to the proposed treaty with Germany, commonly called the Shantung amendment, now under consideration by the Senate, has not challenged my attention or interested me as have other amendments and the several reservations reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations. This, perhaps, grows out of my opinion that its importance to the American people, compared to those, is inconsiderable.

I am not oblivious to the argument that it involves national honor, which the American people should always cherish and never suffer to be tarnished, nor do I overlook the fact that the practical annexation of the Shantung territory and its 40,000,000 of people will add greatly to the strength of the Empire of Japan, the most autocratic and aggressive Asiatic nation, with the ambitions of which many well-informed Americans believe at some time this country will have to reckon. The disposition of the Shantung territory is a controversy in which America is not directly interested, and a contention solely between two Asiatic governments, with both of whom we are at peace, and who were our allies in the recent war with Germany.

In my opinion, relatively speaking, the Senate has devoted too much time to this controversy, and I sincerely hope that the debate is now drawing to a conclusion, and that the proposed amendment may speedily come to a vote.

The Senate should, I think, give its attention to those provisions of the treaty believed by the majority of the Senators, and as I believe, to vitally affect the sovereignty and independence of the United States, the honor of our Nation, the liberties of the American people and their right to govern themselves in their domestic and internal affairs free from the interference and control of any other nation or all the nations of the world.

What I have to say about this amendment will be brief and confined to what I think affects the interests of the American people and the established policies of our Government.

The provision of the treaty proposed to be amended is found in part 4, article 156, and is as follows:

> Germany renounces, in favor of Japan, all her rights, title, and privileges—particularly those concerning the territory of Kiaochow, railways, mines, and submarine cables—which she acquired in virtue of the treaty concluded by her with China on March 5, 1898, and of all other arrangements relative to the Province of Shantung.
>
> All German rights in the Tsingtau-Tsinanfu Railway, including its branch line, together with its subsidiary property of all kinds, stations, shops, fixed and rolling stock, mines, plant, and material for the exploitation of the mines, are and remain acquired by Japan, together with all rights and privileges attaching thereto.
>
> The German State submarine cables from Tsingtau to Shanghai and from Tsingtau to Chefoo, with all the rights, privileges, and properties attaching thereto, are similarly acquired by Japan, free and clear of all charges and encumbrances.

The amendment proposed is to strike out the word "Japan" and insert "China."

The United States is not mentioned, directly or indirectly, in this article, and it purports to be entirely a contract or stipulation between Germany and Japan, and the amendment proposes to make it one between Germany and China.

The position of those who favor the amendment is that the United States is a party because of the fact that it is a signatory to the treaty as a whole.

The proposed treaty is between the allied and associated powers, aggregating 32 different nations, and Germany, and contains many matters in which only one or more of those several powers and Germany are solely interested.

Such is the character of the provision now under discussion. The United States is not interested in it and is only a party by construction, if at all.

These being the facts, Mr. President, I shall vote against the amendment regardless of the merits of the controversy between Japan and China.

The Shantung Peninsula was ceded by China to the Imperial Empire of Germany by treaty in 1898, and Germany remained in possession until by force and conquest it was wrenched from it and occupied by Japan.

Japan was in possession of the sovereignty and the property rights which Germany had there acquired when the armistice was declared and the treaty formulated.

Germany by the treaty renounces all the rights which it acquired under the treaty with China to Japan.

The United States is at peace with both Japan and China, and is under no treaty obligations to either of them concerning the territory now in question.

It has no obligations, legal or moral, concerning the respective rights of either of these powers in this territory.

The fact that the conquest and retention of this country and these people by the Empire of Japan may be conceded to violate the rules of self-determination and government by consent of peoples which our Chief Executive promulgated before we went into the war, when we had nothing to do with it, that should control the terms of peace among nations, does not, in my opinion, call upon the United States to take part in this controversy, or to uphold the sovereignty and property rights of Japan or those of China.

Wherever may be our sympathies in this controversy, we, as a nation, have no right to intermeddle in it.

The proposed amendment, in my opinion, conflicts directly with the long-established policy of the United States forbidding intervention in the intrigues, political affairs, and resultant wars of foreign countries, which is undertaken to be abandoned and destroyed by section 10 of the proposed league of nations contained in part 1 of the treaty, and which the majority of the Senate I hope and believe will obviate by the reservations reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations for that purpose, or one similar in effect, to which and other reservations in line with it I will give my hearty support.

I am unable to reconcile the support of the Shantung amendment, a matter solely between the Empire of Japan and the Republic of China, with the proposed reservation to section 10; and, in my belief, those who support the amendment and this reservation are occupying absolutely inconsistent positions.

I shall oppose all provisions of the proposed league of nations and the treaty which violate or tend to abandon the policy of the United States proclaimed by Washington and reiterated in messages and other public documents by Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, Jackson, Cleveland, and by President Wilson in public addresses as late as 1914, 1915, and 1916 that this country should not form any entangling alliances or involve itself in the jealousies, strifes, political intrigues, and resultant wars of foreign countries, and support such amendments and reservations as may be necessary to preserve unimpaired that policy.

This policy has redounded to the glory of the American Government and contributed to the happiness of the American people. Under it we have grown great, rich, and powerful. That it is founded upon the soundest principles of statesmanship and public safety is conclusively demonstrated by the history of our Nation and by the experience of a century.

It, like its corollary, the Monroe doctrine, was adopted for the safety and preservation of the American Government and American liberties, and they are so interwoven and interdependent that they must stand or fall together.

They are both so definite and clear in their terms and have been so long and so uniformly adhered to that they have become fixed rules for the government of our country in its foreign relations and practically a part of our fundamental law—yes, a very limitation upon the treaty-making power of the President and the Senate which they have no power to wantonly violate.

This rule and policy was followed in the only general peace treaties for the prevention of war this country has been a party to.

The procès-verbal of The Hague peace conference, 1897, had a reservation in these words:

> The delegation of the United States of America on signing the convention for the pacific settlement of international disputes, as proposed by the international peace conference, makes the following declaration:
> "Nothing contained in this convention shall be so construed as to require the United States of America to depart from its traditional policy of not intruding upon, interfering with, or entangling itself in the political questions or policy or internal administration of any foreign State; nor shall anything contained in the said convention be construed to imply a relinquishment by the United States of America of its traditional attitude toward purely American questions."

Again, at the conference in 1907 the American delegates made this reservation:

> Nothing contained in this convention shall be so construed as to require the United States of America to depart from its traditional policy of not intruding upon, interfering with, or entangling itself in the political questions of policy or internal administration of any foreign State; nor shall anything contained in the said convention be construed to imply a relinquishment by the United States of its traditional attitude toward purely American questions.

Again, in the only other conference for the prevention of war which I can now recall, by settling the controversy between Germany and France in regard to Morocco, the Senate, in giving its consent to that treaty and its reasons for being a party, inserted the following reservation:

> Resolved further, That the Senate, as a part of this act of ratification, understands that the participation of the United States in the Algeciras conference and in the formation and adoption of the general act and protocol which resulted therefrom, was with the sole purpose of preserving and increasing its commerce in Morocco, the protection as to life, liberty, and property of its citizens residing or traveling therein, and of aiding by its friendly offices and efforts, in removing friction and controversy which seemed to menace the peace between powers signatory with the United States to the treaty of 1880, all of which are on terms of amity with this Government; and without purpose to depart from the traditional American foreign policy which forbids participation by the United States in the settlement of political questions which are entirely European in their scope.

It will be noted that the reservations in The Hague conferences apply to the whole world, not to Europe alone.

Mr. President, there is one other declaration upon this subject that I desire to read at this juncture. While primarily the question of the Monroe doctrine was involved—that is, so interwoven and related to that of forbidding this country to involve itself in the troubles and controversies of foreign nations that it applies to the proposition I am now trying to enforce—I am going to read from the message of President Cleveland, a Democrat and an American, to the United States Senate in regard to the Venezuelan controversy with Great Britain. Mr. Cleveland said:

> Such reply is embodied in two communications addressed by the British Prime Minister to Sir Julian Pauncefote, the British Ambassador at this Capital. It will be seen that one of these communications is devoted exclusively to observations upon the Monroe doctrine, and claims that in the present instance a new and strange extension and development of this doctrine is insisted on by the United States, that the reasons justify an appeal to the doctrine enunciated by President Monroe are generally inapplicable "to the state of things in which we live at the present day," and especially inapplicable to a controversy involving the boundary line between Great Britain and Venezuela.
> Without attempting extended argument in reply to these positions, it may not be amiss to suggest that the doctrine upon which we stand is strong and sound because its enforcement is important to our peace and safety as a Nation, and is essential to the integrity of our free institutions and the tranquil maintenance of our distinctive form of government. It was intended to apply to every stage of our national life, and can not become obsolete while our Republic endures. If the balance of power is justly a cause for jealous anxiety among the governments of the Old World, and a subject for our absolute noninterference, none the less is an observance of the Monroe doctrine of vital concern to our people and their Government.
> Assuming, therefore, that we may properly insist upon this doctrine without regard to the "state of things in which we live," or any changed conditions here or elsewhere, it is not apparent why its application may not be invoked in the present controversy.

President Cleveland concludes that message in these patriotic words, which most forcibly showed the position of the American people in relation to the proposed treaty:

> In making these recommendations I am fully alive to the responsibility incurred, and keenly realize all the consequences that may follow.
> I am, nevertheless, firm in my conviction that while it is a grievous thing to contemplate the two great English-speaking peoples of the world as being otherwise than friendly competitors in the onward march of civilization, and strenuous and worthy rivals in all the arts of peace, there is no calamity which a great nation can invite which equals that which follows a supine submission to wrong and injustice and the consequent loss of national respect and honor beneath which are shielded and defended a people's safety and greatness.

The true course, in my opinion, to be pursued, if the United States can be construed to be a party to the provision of the treaty in question, is to adopt a reservation withholding our consent to this article and declining all participation in the controversy between these two foreign nations, with both of whom we are on terms of amity and peace, reserving the right to do what we think just in the future.

There can be no justification for us becoming involved in this controversy, and possibly in honor bound, to go to war to maintain the rights of one or the other of these countries.

We are not directly parties to this article of the treaty now; but if we adopt this amendment we will be parties to it and in honor bound to sustain all guaranties which we enter into in relation to it.

Mr. President, I again express the wish that this amendment can be disposed of without much further debate and that we can reach and dispose of the amendments and reservations which are vital to the American Government and the American people.

There are several of these amendments or reservations, as they are variously styled, which I propose to vote for and which I hope will be adopted without much delay. I will not now discuss them, but merely announce my position upon them.

I am unwilling to create a supergovernment to dictate or even advise the United States in its foreign or domestic affairs and policies.

I am unwilling to obligate the United States to guarantee the territorial integrity and existing political independence of some 45 nations, found in every part of the globe, populated by all the different races of peoples and nationalities, including the far-flung possessions of the powerful British Empire, as well as the smallest and weakest nations of the world, some unable yet to stand alone and others verging on collapse and dissolution, whereby our country would be constantly embroiled in expensive and sanguinary wars.

I am unwilling, Mr. President, to vote for a conscript law, to send young men of this country, like Hessian mercenaries, into foreign countries to take part in a war in which our country is not interested, and I shall never do so. An army can not be raised for that purpose in any other way than by such legislation; and I now predict if this treaty is ratified that Congress will fail to observe it, although it is in honor bound to carry out any treaty that the constitutional treaty-making power may enter into within the authority conferred upon it by the Constitution.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator yield for an interruption?

Mr. SHIELDS. I will.

Mr. REED. I merely wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the pending military bill makes conscription automatic the moment a war is declared, the President having the right to call out the troops by the draft process, just as he had during the last war, and that bill is now submitted to us as a part of the scheme of world peace.

Mr. SHIELDS. I have so understood the provisions of that bill, although I have not carefully read it. I announce now that if such provisions are in the bill when it comes before the Senate, it shall not have my support.

Mr. REED. They are in the bill.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I am unwilling to support a treaty which, by the remotest implication or possible construction, authorizes a supergovernment or a council of foreign nations to interfere with and control our internal affairs and domestic relations of any character, sacred rights cherished by all nations, and now secured to them by both national and international laws. I will favor reservations which will absolutely and unequivocally exclude such interference and control.

I am unwilling to commit this country by treaty obligations which do not clearly and beyond controversy preserve and perpetuate the Monroe doctrine.

The United States is a sovereign and independent Nation, the political equal of all other nations, and the sovereignty and equality which Washington compelled Great Britain to concede and recognize and which Jackson sustained at New Orleans can not be constitutionally surrendered or impaired in the slightest degree, regardless of whether it affects our material interest. There must be reservations which will protect our honor and sovereign equality.

I will not consent to the British Empire having 6 votes in the league of nations to 1 vote for the United States. I have too much pride in my country to approve any treaty that concedes precedence to the British Empire or reduces the United States to political equality at home or abroad with a colony or subordinate division of that Empire.

Our flag, with my consent, shall never float lower than that of Great Britain or any combination of nations.

Mr. President, we must not be guilty of such delay in the consideration of this treaty as the peace conference at Paris was in formulating it.

It is to the interest of the world, and particularly America, in which I am primarily interested, that final action be had in the matter as soon as possible.

The American people do not, in my opinion, care so much about the proposed league of nations as they do about the conclusion of the war and the restoration of normal conditions. I know that such is their interest.

I do not mean to charge that there has been any unwarranted delay by the Senate in its deliberations.

There are questions involved which concern the American people more deeply than any other treaty that was ever presented to this body, and they merit and require the fullest deliberation and maturest consideration.

The responsibility and duty of the Senate in advising and consenting to the treaty is imposed by the same high authority that authorizes the Chief Executive to negotiate treaties, is of equal dignity and force, and must be met by the Senate and discharged patriotically and wisely, free of all possible extraneous influences.

The Senate, as I remember, was the last legislative body of the great powers to which the treaty was submitted for approval, and it has not consumed more time than other parliamentary bodies in its consideration.

Great Britain, as I understand, is the only signatory power which has fully ratified it, and this was to be expected, for in it, as in every treaty made following great commotions and wars in Europe, the British Empire has secured the lion's share of territory and commercial advantages.

France and Italy have practically, but not entirely, completed the ratification of the treaty, and they are the nations benefited next to Great Britain.

The United States Senate is not to be censured for its deliberate consideration, when it is remembered that under the treaty we get nothing not common to the smallest nations, but the United States assumes great and practically permanent obligations to harass its people with further burdensome taxation and to send its young men to foreign countries to fight and perchance to die in foreign wars, the right or wrong of which they know not and in which their country has no material interest.

Mr. President, when the other amendments and reservations, to which I have alluded, come before the Senate, I hope to be able to express my views and my reasons for supporting them, or others substituted for them, more logically and with some elaboration. There are reasons which have prevented me from doing so before this time.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, before the Senator from Tennessee yields the floor, if he will allow me, I desire to call attention to one slight omission which I think he made. He referred to the reservations made by our delegation at The Hague in 1907; but I think the Senator did not mention that those reservations were made a part of the resolution of ratification by the Senate. The resolution was submitted by Mr. Carter, and was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of a convention signed by the delegates of the United States to the Second International Peace Conference, held at The Hague from June 16 to October 18, 1907, for the pacific settlement of international disputes subject to the declaration made by the delegates of the United States before signing said convention, namely:

"Nothing contained in this convention shall be so construed as to require the United States of America to depart from its traditional policy of not intruding upon, interfering with, or entangling itself in the political questions of policy or internal administration of any foreign State; nor shall anything contained in the said convention be construed to imply a relinquishment by the United States of its traditional attitude toward purely American questions."

Resolved further, as a part of this act of ratification, That the United States approves this convention with the understanding that recourse to the permanent court for the settlement of differences can be had only by agreement thereto through general or special treaties of arbitration heretofore or hereafter concluded between the parties in dispute; and the United States now exercises the option contained in article 53 of said convention, to exclude the formulation of the "compromis" by the permanent court, and hereby excludes from the competence of the permanent court the power to frame the "compromis" required by general or special treaties of arbitration concluded or hereafter to be concluded by the United States, and further expressly declares that the "compromis" required by any treaty of arbitration to which the United States may be a party shall be settled only by agreement between the contracting parties, unless such treaty shall expressly provide otherwise.

Then they reserved to the Senate of the United States the right of ratifying and passing upon the provisions made in each treaty of arbitration.

At that same conference at The Hague a convention concerning the rights and duties of neutral powers in naval war was negotiated, and on April 17, 1908, this occurred in the Senate:

April 17, 1908: On motion of Mr. Bacon, the Senate proceeded to consider the same as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment being proposed, it was reported to the Senate; and no amendment being proposed, Mr. Bacon submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and unanimously agreed to:

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the adherence of the United States to a convention adopted by the second international peace conference held at The Hague from June 15 to October 18, 1907, concerning the rights and duties of neutral powers in naval war, reserving and excluding, however, article 23 thereof, which is in the following words:

"A neutral power may allow prizes to enter its ports and roadsteads, whether under convoy or not, when they are brought there to be sequestrated pending the decision of a prize court. It may have the prize taken to another of its ports.

"If the prize is convoyed by a warship, the prize crew may go on board the convoying ship.

"If the prize is not under convoy, the prize crew are left at liberty."

Resolved further, That the United States adheres to this convention with the understanding that the last clause of article 3 implies the duty of a neutral power to make the demand therein mentioned for the return of a ship captured within the neutral jurisdiction and no longer within that jurisdiction.

It will be observed that that reservation excluded entirely one article of the convention.

I ask pardon of the Senator from Tennessee for interrupting him, but the matter was so pertinent that I thought he would not object.

Mr. SHIELDS. I inadvertently failed to mention that the Senate embraced that reservation in the resolution ratifying the convention, and I am very glad the Senator has supplied the information and read the resolution of ratification in full.

Mr. LODGE. I intend to have all reservations adopted by the Senate to any treaty printed. I have nearly completed the compilation, and I am going to have it printed in pamphlet form, and also in the RECORD.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I read a document by Maj. Louis Livingston Seaman, M. D., LL. D., F. R. G. S., president emeritus of the China Society of America, entitled "An Appeal to Members of the Senate of the United States—Shall the Treaty of Peace be one of Justice or one of Infamy?"

"SHALL THE TREATY OF PEACE BE ONE OF JUSTICE OR ONE OF INFAMY?

"That is the question the United States is now called upon to consider, and the destiny of nations hangs on the decision. America entered the Great War as the champion of smaller nations—to preserve the independence of imperiled countries, and to rescue civilization from barbarism. From its birth our Republic has stood for the rights of the oppressed. Our ideals have been for liberty and justice. Our great civil conflict removed the blot of slavery from our land—our Spanish campaign gave freedom and prosperity and happiness to an enslaved people in Cuba and in the Philippines, and our compensation for the sacrifice was the gratification of our ideals. We acknowledged no masters, and we do not propose to.

"The problem to-day is the ratification of the peace treaty with the Huns and the creation of a league of nations. Shall the Fourth of July, 1919, pass into history as the last anniversary of American independence? Shall we, by agreeing to article 10 of the covenant of the league of nations, surrender our sovereignty gained in 1776 to Great Britain, who by a vote of six to one can impose upon us the incalculable obligation of preserving the territorial integrity and political independence of herself or any member of the league of nations in any part of the globe? Are we prepared to submit our traditional attitude regarding purely American questions to a tribunal in which we are in such a hopeless minority or in which the vote of New Zealand could count as equal to our own? Shades of Washington and Jefferson! What would be their verdict if they could witness the depths to which our land has been dragged in order to gratify the personal ambition and egotism of the 'too proud to fight' pacifist who in the peace conference at Paris has been so hopelessly outwitted by trained European and oriental diplomacy that to-day he is the laughingstock of European statesmen, and whose refusal to prepare for the inevitable resulted in a prolongation of the war for more than a year, the loss of more than a million lives, the destruction of property inestimable, and suffering and misery that can not be described or measured. And poor China—whose Government, in the opinion of many competent authorities, has given more happiness and individual liberty to a greater mass of humanity than any other Government in the world; whose representatives were promised by our President that if their country entered the war in 1917 their territorial integrity would be preserved—where will China stand if this unholy alliance is consummated, and Shantung, the birthplace of Confucius, sacred to the Chinese, with its 40,000,000 inhabitants turned over to the tender mercy of the Japanese, whose policy of territorial aggrandizement rivals that of the European nations, as witnessed in Korea, Manchuria, and the Pacific Isles, and whose threats of aggression, made at the point of the bayonet, prevented China's entrance in the war in its earliest days?

"On August 20, 1914, I cabled Wu Ting Fang, secretary of state of China, from Ostend, Belgium, imploring China to sever diplomatic relations and declare war on Germany at once—to immediately seize all territory in China then occupied by Germany, to refuse further payment of indemnity for the Boxer uprising, and to demand repayment of all indemnities already paid, together with substantial damages for German occupation of Chinese territory. All this I then regarded, and still regard, as the moral right of China, for there would have been no Boxer uprising had it not been for Germany's policy of barbarism and aggression, when in carrying out the Kaiser's order 'to behave like Huns' they committed acts of 'kultur' and cruelty that challenged those since perpetrated in Belgium and Poland. Now is China's opportunity to regain her lost Provinces and obtain justice, and the people of the United States who are familiar with the conditions and know the truth demand that the United States Senate shall secure this result.

"It was hoped that the carnival of territorial lust, which for centuries caused untold bloodshed the world over, had culminated in the partitioning of Africa—the last of the continents to be parceled off by the world's looters, who, in the division of the spoils, followed, as the robber barons of feudal days—

> "The good old rule, the simple plan,
> That they should take who have the power,
> And they should keep who can.

"But look at China to-day—that grand old country, with its great wall which for over 20 centuries protected it from the hordes of Tartars and Mongols on the north, while its Tibetan ranges on the west and impenetrable forests on the south permitted it to live in peace and tranquillity thousands of years, with no fear of molestation by 'foreign devils' from land or sea. And in this time the beautiful but fallacious philosophy of Confucius, which taught the rule of moral suasion rather than that by might, grew until its essence was expressed in the proverb, 'Better have no child than one who is a soldier'—this, too, in a land where it is considered a disgrace to die childless.

"And what was the natural result of pacifism? A condition of insecurity, of defenselessness, of inability to enforce that first law of nature—self-protection—followed, which, when realized by the occidental nations, resulted in their seizing great sections of her domains upon trivial excuses, and wringing most valuable concessions from her rulers.

"As a direct result of this spoliation, the worm at last turned, and the Boxer uprising of 1900 followed, having for its declared purpose the forcible expulsion of all foreigners from the country, and the recovery by China of her despoiled possessions. I say, without fear of contradiction by those who are familiar with that issue (and I was there), that that uprising was one of the most splendid exhibitions of patriotism witnessed in modern times. The methods pursued by the Chinese, due to the ignorance of their misguided leaders, and the horrors that followed, have afforded the theme for many a tragic tale and numberless explanatory theories. But the plain fact can not be gainsaid, nor too strongly emphasized, that the essential motive of that propaganda was the freeing of the land from the hated foreigners, who, in current phrase, had 'robbed the people of their country.'

"It was then, that in reprisal and revenge, the so-called civilized world turned against them. The eight allied armies of the 'great powers' marched to their capital, slaughtered their people, raped their women, looted their temples, their treasure, and their habitations, committed brutalities that rivaled those of the Huns in the recent great tragedy, and created a sentiment in China which fairly crucified Christianity, and which should redound to the shame and humiliation of the Christian nations whose forces participated in the outrages; but which, instead, secured monstrous indemnities and subjected China to the most humiliating terms of peace that were ever inflicted upon a nation, and that have kept her poverty-stricken ever since. America, however, has some reason for pride in that she waived claims to over half the indemnity, whilst her great statesman, John Hay, succeeded temporarily in preserving the integrity of the country by his splendid policy of the 'open door.'

"Never shall I forget that winter at Ching Wan Tao, following the war, where detachments of the allied army were gathered awaiting the fate of China. They reminded me of a pack of hungry wolves around the carcass of a dead animal—each fearing to set his fangs in the carcass, lest while so engaged his neighbor might do the same with him. And so during the long negotiations that finally led to the declaration of peace the situation continued.

"Four years later I again visited that scene, and there, in smaller numbers, were found the troops of many nations, still waiting, ready to seize the first opportunity to partition the country and to secure their share of the spoil. But more pressing engagements were then imminent, involving the attention of some of the powers. The Russo-Japanese struggle was on and China was given a temporary respite. From that time until the outbreak of the revolution which led to the establishment of the Republic, China paid the indemnity claims with such regularity that no opportunity was found for interference.

"For more than three-quarters of a century, beginning with the unrighteous opium war, and even later, China has been subjected to a series of squeezes and despoilment of her territory to an extent unequaled in history. The iniquitous indemnities wrung from her as the result of the Boxer campaign would have been reversed, and the countries now receiving them would be paying for the outrages committed had right instead of might prevailed. The powerful governments and financial institutions doing business in the Orient have become obsessed with the idea that it is legitimate business to 'squeeze' the country, regardless of right or justice, and in transferring the so-called German rights in Shantung to Japan the Big

Three are to-day continuing that policy, and making our country, the United States, underwriters to the unholy deal.

"The effect upon China of the spoliation of her territory and finances created among the leading minds of her people an appreciation of her weakness and of the necessity for the adoption of occidental methods for self-protection. They saw the absolute imbecility of continuing the policy of the Manchu dynasty and the necessity for a change of government, and the Chinese Republic became a reality. The character of the revolution which made it possible was remarkable. It obtained the maximum of liberty with the minimum of bloodshed. It was an evolution rather than a revolution, the most potent factors of which were those of peace and not of war. They were the results of trade with foreign nations, the importation of modern inventions, railroads, telegraphs, newspapers; the work of Christian missionaries, schools and colleges established by them; but, most of all, the influence of Chinese students who had been educated in foreign universities, and who carried back to their native land the high ideals of occidental government. In comparison with the epoch-making wars for freedom in occidental lands—the French Revolution, England's fight for the Magna Charta, or our own great seven years' struggle for independence—the Chinese revolution was almost bloodless. It is stated that the total mortality of the war which secured the emancipation of 400,000,000 of people was less than the number lost in the Battle of the Wilderness or in single conflicts in the war just concluded.

"The moderation shown by the successful leaders to their late rulers was another striking characteristic. Instead of the guillotine or exile, they were retired with liberal pensions and allowed to retain their empty titles. The leaders enjoined upon their followers the protection of life and property, both commercial and missionary, and these orders were strictly obeyed.

"A people who carried to a successful termination such a revolution deserve the respect and recognition of the world in their present great crisis. The enemies and looters of China to-day forget the traditions of the race—that China was old when Chaldea and Babylon were young; that she saw the rise and fall of Grecian and Roman civilization; and that she has maintained the integrity and honor of her Government ever since; that her scholars discovered the compass and invented the intellectual game of chess when the Huns of Europe and the Japanese were groveling in the darkness of medievalism; that she produced her own science, literature, art, philosophy, and religion, whose founder, Confucius, 500 years before the birth of Christ, expounded the doctrine of Christianity in the saying, 'Do not do unto others what you would not have others do unto you." They forget that for nearly a thousand years China has been nearer a democracy in many features of its government than any other government then in existence. The fundamental unit of democracy, the foundation upon which our own Government rests, is embodied in the principle of the New England town meeting. All authorities on democracy—De Tocqueville, Bryce, and the Compte de Paris—agree in this, and in China all local government for centuries has been controlled by local authorities.

"The Chinese have never sought territorial aggrandizement but have loved the paths of peace, where the law of moral suasion, and not of might, ruled. They possess qualities of industry, economy, temperance, and tranquillity unsurpassed by any nation on earth. With these qualities they are in the great race of the survival of the fittest to stay. They are to be feared by foreign nations more for their virtues than for their vices, and in their present struggle for the maintenance of their territory they deserve our earnest sympathy and support. Will America, the champion of justice, now desert that grand old country and witness its vivisection when we have the power to prevent it?

"The Japanese claim their country is overcrowded and they require more room for their increasing population. Is this a legitimate reason that the 450,000,000 Chinese should be crowded out of the land in which they have lived for 6,000 years? Is China to become a second Honolulu, where 60 per cent of the population are Japanese?

"Japan has already been rewarded many times for her contribution to the victory of the Allies in being relieved of the threatening danger from Germany, which when in possession of Kiaochow strategetically commanded the Japanese Sea, and where a strong navy would be a perpetual menace, and also by the award of the rich islands north of the Equator, which seem to be forgotten when this subject is discussed.

"Dr. David Jayne Hill, our former ambassador to Germany, stated in the North American Review that the Senate 'can ratify the treaty of peace and at the same time can reject a compact for the league of nations.' We hope the Senate will exercise its constitutional right and defeat the creation of any league which is founded upon such monstrous injustice to a land which so richly deserves our protection, but which Mr. Wilson, who recognized it as a republic, has deserted.

"Defeated and made a laughingstock by the diplomacy of Lloyd-George and the Japanese, who, to use the language of the street, 'put it all over him' while I was in Paris in the last days of the peace congress through the bluff of recognizing no color distinctions in the league of nations—Wilson, after urging the participation of China in the war, deliberately reversed his position—granted rights that never existed to Japan and, to save his face, now seeks to have his action indorsed by the American people. Was such a travesty of injustice ever attempted before, and does he think he can 'fool all the American people all of the time,' including the United States Senate?

"The covenant of the league of nations is presumed to be based upon equity. When I studied law, the first axiom in that court was, 'He who comes into equity must come with clean hands.' Does Japan, after her treatment of Korea and her secret treaties won by bribes and threats, come into this court with clean hands? Germany had no more rights in Shantung than a robber who forcibly enters a house at night and whose expulsion could not be enforced by its owner. I was in Shantung at the time these so-called rights were claimed, and the whole world knows how baseless they are. It also knows how much value the hypocritical Hun places on a so-called 'missionary.' And now Japan, for the insignificant part she played in the war, where her entire mortality amounted to about 800, demands these so-called rights of Germany and many others as her share of the swag. And she further demands the stamp of approval of the peace commission and league of nations. And America's self-appointed representative, Mr. Wilson, and his rubber-stamp associates approve these demands. What would Lincoln and Burlingame and Hay, who won the respect and confidence of China through honest treatment and the establishment of the policy of the 'open door,' say if they were here? Would they not with one voice damn a document whose initial act was of such monstrous injustice, and will the United States Senate do less?

"China's contribution to the victory of the Allies was far greater than that of Japan. With 100,000 men in the trenches in Belgium and France—and I was there and saw many who will never return—and another 100,000 in the munition plants of England, China did her part in defeating the Hun. She did this at the instigation of the United States; and unless something is done to dissociate our name from the proposed Shantung settlement of the peace treaty the Chinese people for generations to come will regard America and Americans with suspicion and contempt.

"If the whole structure, erected for safeguarding the peace of the world and preventing a 'breaking of its heart,' depends on the rape of a nation of 400,000,000 innocent souls who trust to the honor of America for justice, then let the structure undergo reconstruction or let America refuse to be a party to such a crime. A structure founded upon treachery or injustice is not one to receive the indorsement of a nation whose inheritance of freedom was bequeathed as a rich legacy by a once hardy, brave, and patriotic, but now lamented and departed, race of ancestors, and whose duty it is to transmit it to coming generations 'unprofaned and undecayed by the lapse of time.'

"And just here it might be pertinent to ask who requested Japan's assistance or intervention in driving the Huns out of Kiaochow? Did China? Oh, no! Japan began hostilities when China was not at war with Germany. She landed her troops more than a hundred miles north of Tsingtau, and marched them through Chinese territory, subsisting them largely on the country through which they passed, thus committing what is usually called a trespass, and with the assistance of the British and Chinese the 4,000 Germans were defeated. But let it be distinctly understood that with the British fleet blockading the harbor of Kiaochow the Chinese could have accomplished the same result without assistance from Japan or any other power.

"In discussing the Shantung question Prof. Jeremiah W. Jenks, research professor of government and public administration and director of the Far Eastern Bureau, says:

"'In laying plans for the control of Shantung Japan has been playing for a big prize—for the control of Kiaochow and the railroads of Shantung practically means the control of the capital Province of China and of the chief normal shipping port for all of North China. The war gave her an excuse to seize Kiaochow, which she did on November 6, 1914. Her next step in China was to present, in January, 1915, a secret series of demands, which if granted would in the near future enable Japan to dominate the policy of China from the military, financial, and political viewpoints. The Japanese Government at first falsely denied that such demands had been made, and when it saw it could not conceal the fact it gave out a list of "requests," suppressing altogether those that most endangered China's sovereignty. Under threat of war, China acceded to all the demands but group 5, which would have made her a subject nation. Japan stated that group 5 would be reserved for further consideration. From the time that Japan seized Kiaochow she has treated Shantung as a conquered Province, occupying the German buildings for military and administrative purposes, placed guards along the railway line to the capital, has assumed military control of property, and has instituted civil government over the sections she occupies. Confirmation by the big three of Japan's claims in this territory, with the unwritten understanding that Japan shall eventually return it to China, has roused a storm of indignation among Chinese everywhere, and there are reports that the Chinese will resort to their most effective weapon—a boycott against all things Japanese'—which, if not successful, may be followed by war.

"Senator BORAH stated the case admirably when he said, 'The Shantung provision should come out of this treaty definitely and conclusively. It is no different in principle from the arrangement with reference to Alsace-Lorraine 50 years ago. It is, in fact, no different in principle from the dismemberment of Poland nearly 200 years ago. Both of these transactions planted the seeds of future wars and both went far to impeach and destroy the moral prestige of all nations responsible for these crimes. The mark of Cain has been upon them ever since.'

"As already stated, the question the Senate has to determine is whether it will indorse the decision of the peace conference in the Shantung controversy and thereby make America an underwriter of that outrage? If it decides that the fictitious claims of Japan to the so-called German rights in Shantung shall be transferred from China to Japan, it will compound a felony, it will commit an act of perfidy unsurpassed in American history, and it will be an act of injustice to China that is destined to bring about another war in the near future in which the brutality and mortality are likely to far exceed the record of the great tragedy just ended. Instead of proving an instrument for the preservation of peace its first result is likely to provoke a just and righteous war. In case China should decide to fight for the retention of her rights, on which side will America—ordered by Lloyd-George—array her armies? The Chinese have long memories. I well remember a conversation with His Excellency Li Hung Chang in his Yamen in Peking during the Boxer War, when we were discussing the danger from the prolonged presence of the allied armies in China. 'Oh,' he said, 'they will not stay long.' 'Well,' I replied, 'the Manchus remained some time—nearly 300 years.' 'What is 300 years in the life of China?' was his answer. And in that time the Manchus had been absorbed.

"In the comparatively recent Ty Ping rebellion the mortality amounted to over 15,000,000. If the military awakening of China occurs as a result of the wrongs to which it has been subjected by the peace commission the war that will follow and the mortality that will result will be without precedent.

"Query: As a starter for perpetual peace, is the United States prepared to assume this responsibility? And is a league of nations based on such a damnable, fraudulent, and iniquitous foundation likely to serve as an inspiration for humanity and to bring about 'Peace on earth and good will toward men'?

"The following resolution was passed at a recent meeting of the American Defense Society:

"Resolved, That the American Defense Society requests the Senate not to ratify those provisions in the peace treaty which convey to Japan the rights, interests, and privileges heretofore held in the Province of Shantung by the Empire of Germany, and that a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate of the United States."

Mr. President, the Committee on Foreign Relations took some testimony about this question, not as much as I wish they could have procured, but there were three witnesses, I think, whose competency will not be questioned by anyone. They are Mr. Thomas F. Millard, Dr. John C. Ferguson, and Prof. Edward Thomas Williams. I shall read a few extracts from the testimony of these witnesses. Mr. Millard, on page 431 of the hearings before the committee, under date of August 18, 1919, stated that he was a writer, a journalist, a publisher of newspapers, and an editor of newspapers. Then the following appears on page 432:

"Senator BRANDEGEE. Do you know what was the ground of that advice that they should not employ American counsel?

"Mr. MILLARD. The explanation given to me by the Chinese was that our Government felt that China's position over there was somewhat that of the ward of the United States. I am not saying that they used that term; I am using that term as descriptive of the situation. There had been preliminary consultations with the Chinese delegation at Peking before they left for Paris, in which they had submitted to our legation at Peking a list of the matters which they wished to bring up at Paris. On the suggestion of our Government, communicated through the minister at Peking, certain matters were eliminated. That is, China was advised that our Government considered that it would be inexpedient and would embarrass matters or complicate matters to raise those questions at Paris, and that led to the elimination of those questions. China did not raise those questions.

"Then the matter of employing some expert American advisers was brought up at that time, but, I think, was deferred for later consideration.

"After the peace conference had met at Paris, as I understand it, the matter was brought up again. I meanwhile, and others, had advised them in a perfectly informal way, myself acting merely as a sort of general friend of China and a man who was known to be a friend of China and familiar with the political questions out there, that they employ a couple of American advisers. I had suggested Mr. John Bassett Moore and Dr. W. W. Willoughbee, who at one time had been employed out there, but neither of those gentlemen went, and I did not know until after I arrived at Paris why they had not gone. Then I was told by the Chinese over there that it had been intimated to them that our Government would prefer that no Americans be officially connected with the Chinese delegation.

"Senator BRANDEGEE. Was it stated at any time that the embarrassments to which you refer if they did employ American advisors would be because the plans of our Government or the intention of our Government or of our peace commissioners to protect China would be interfered with if they had American counsel connected with them?

"Mr. MILLARD. I could not say that. I could only conjecture about it. That was the explanation given me when I got over there. I asked Mr. Wong and I asked Dr. Ku, because I had had some correspondence here in America with Dr. Willoughbee, in America, as to whether he was going over there or not. I said, 'Why didn't you get any of these gentlemen? Their counsel would have been valuable in these circumstances.' And then they told me they had not done so because it had been intimated to them that our Government would prefer that they did not. I do not know what the motives of our Government were.

"Senator BRANDEGEE. These Chinese gentlemen to whom you refer as having told you these things, were they officially connected with the Chinese delegation?

"Mr. MILLARD. They were official envoys of the Chinese Government at Paris.

"Senator BRANDEGEE. And your services, as I understand you, were without compensation. Simply your expenses were paid?

"Mr. MILLARD. My expenses were paid."

The testimony of Mr. Millard begins on page 430 and continues quite voluminously; the testimony of Dr. Ferguson begins on page 567, and is under date of Wednesday, August 20, and continues at length; and that of Prof. Williams, under date of August 22, begins on page 617; and it all shows what the effect upon China will be of the transfer of the rights in the Province of Shantung to a foreign empire. Nobody can read that testimony without seeing that it is a perfectly fatal thing to do, so far as the territorial integrity or the political independence of China is concerned, because the covenant of the league and this much-disputed article 10 of the covenant of the league are based upon the theory that the league is to preserve the territorial integrity and the political independence of all members of the league, and the first thing which the treaty does, which guarantees territorial integrity and political independence, is to dismember the weakest and most populous and most inoffensive nation of the whole world and turn its most important part over to a foreign empire, because he who controls the Province of Shantung, its seaports, its converging lines of railroad, upon which all exports and imports and, of course, also the domestic distribution depend, controls the life blood of the Chinese Republic and its 400,000,000 of inoffensive and innocent souls, who are to be exploited because we weakly ratify two secret treaties made by two foreign powers with Japan against one of their own allies, after Japan had tried to keep China from becoming an ally and China had become an ally in spite of the efforts of Japan to hold her off.

Dr. Ferguson, on page 567, among other things, in reply to an inquiry from me, stated as follows:

"Senator BRANDEGEE. Do you know anything, either from reading oriental literature or from advices or from personal information, as to what the feeling of the Chinese people generally is about the concession of Shantung to Japan?

"Mr. FERGUSON. I know from actual experience. I left China, I might state, at the end of April, and I know from personal experience up to that time what the feeling in China was, and since that time I have had official communications and also read constantly the daily press of China, and I know what the opinion there is. I think it is not too strong to say that the feeling is a feeling of outrage that China has not only in this instance been forced to a specific act by one foreign nation, but that by the treaty for the first time a union of nations comes in to give sanction to a thing which she feels is wrong and is an outrage on her sovereign rights. In every former instance where such concessions have been wrung from her the balance of power among nations has always made it possible that some powers would come to her and say, 'We are sorry for you and we will help you out as much as we can.' In this instance China feels that she has been robbed of her rights in Shantung by one nation, originally by Germany, and those rights transferred to Japan, and that all the other nations have come along and have joined in approval of what seems to her an infamous act; and among those powers that are approving it is the Nation which she has always counted as her most disinterested friend, the United States. Does that answer your question?

"Senator BRANDEGEE. Yes. I want now to follow that up by asking you, are you still acting in an advisory capacity to the President of China?

"Mr. FERGUSON. Yes; I am still acting as adviser to the President of China. I came here on official work for the Government of China, and I expect to return at the end of October."

They are giving him a banquet in Boston to-morrow night, at which the principal citizens of Boston will meet to do him honor.

"Senator BRANDEGEE. Are you able to state whether the opinion that you have described as being prevalent among Chinamen is the opinion of the President of China?

"Mr. FERGUSON. Unquestionably; and of the premier, and of practically every member of the cabinet, of all the governors of the Provinces whom I have met, of the chairmen of the Chinese Chamber of Commerce at Peking, at Tientsin, and Shanghai and Hongkong, all of whom I have met in the last six months.

"Senator BRANDEGEE. You speak of reading the native press. Do you speak Chinese as well as read it?

"Mr. FERGUSON. Yes, naturally. All my official dealings are in the native language. I never use interpreters.

"Senator BRANDEGEE. So that you are able to ascertain at first hand the opinions of prominent men in China?

"Mr. FERGUSON. Yes; when I meet the President of China no one else is present, and I talk directly with him as I would with the President of our own country, and without intermediaries."

Mr. President, there are 400,000,000 people waiting to see whether the United States Senate will set the seal of its approval upon this infamous dismemberment of that ancient Empire. For myself I shall not so vote as to have that blot rest upon my record. If, in this present war, Great Britain and France thought it necessary to betray and sell out their ally and transfer 40,000,000 of its citizens to the Empire of Japan, if they want to take the credit for that transaction, I prefer to leave it to them alone. I shall vote to support the amendment proposed by the committee, and instead of voting to transfer the Province of Shantung to an alien Empire, Japan, I shall vote to restore it to the Republic of China, which rightfully owns it and has, in my opinion, legally and morally come into possession of it.

The original agreement of China with Germany was obtained by force. The declaration of war by China against Germany, of course, destroyed any validity of the original German-Chinese agreement, even if it had not been obtained by force. And now, for the first time in history, as Prof. Ferguson so well says, the dominant powers of the world, coming together under a league of nations—32 nations of the world—are to guarantee that Japan shall have possession of these rights in Shantung upon the mere verbal promise of the Japanese that at some day they will surrender to China the sovereignty and will keep all the privileges which they now have. I, for one, will not be made a party to such an outrage.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I observe in the afternoon edition of the Washington Times of to-day a large headline:

OWEN quits President on free nations.

I want merely to make the correction by stating that not only do I not quit the President with regard to the covenant of the league but I support him very cordially and completely, and that I have not proposed to submit an amendment or a reservation, but an interpretative resolution carrying out the principles for which the President stands.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the so-called Shantung provision of the treaty has been to me a source of great perplexity not so much as to the facts involved but as to the attitude which should be assumed toward it when all of the details are considered. I have read most of the essays and communications that from time to time have been submitted through the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the comments of the press, magazine articles, and the speeches of Senators since the treaty has come before us for final consideration. I have read and pondered over the treaty provisions and have reached a conclusion which is not wholly satisfactory, for it is based quite as much upon expediency as upon logic.

It is one of the gravest features involved in the treaty, and consequently one demanding familiarity with its various details, together with some consideration of consequences, possibly resulting from our action, whatever it may be. I am not at all satisfied of the expediency of voting for the amendment or for an equivalent reservation, one or the other of which is unquestionably essential. If we might reject the three articles which relate to this subject, whereby the United States would neither affirm nor deny the right of China or of Japan to Shantung, and by so doing discharge our obligations to the country and to our associates, that course would appeal to me very strongly. But inasmuch as China and Japan are among the nations engaged in the making of the treaty, and inasmuch as their interests concern and should be disposed of in some fashion by the treaty, that can not be done.

I shall not detain the Senate by extended reference to the details of the Shantung controversy. That has perhaps been done too frequently. I think, however, it may be expedient to refer to some of them.

In 1914 when Germany precipitated the war, which this treaty seeks to terminate, she was in full possession of Kiaochow, of the town which she had built there, and of the concessions which the treaty of 1898 with China had given her. She had been in possession for something like 16 years, during which time no power, great or small, had questioned her right to it, whatever their opinions regarding the morality or the justice of her demand upon China. Our own Government had recognized her possession of this territory through the exchange of notes between the Secretary of State and the German chancellor, as I now recall, in the latter part of 1898 or early in the succeeding year. Certain it is that no protest, either verbal or otherwise, was made by the United States when Germany compelled China to yield this very valuable and important concession; and I think that what is true of the United States is equally true of the other great powers. Germany had then, from an international standpoint, a grant of territory and of rights in China of which she had been in peaceful possession for about 16 years when the war began.

Whatever the view of Japan concerning the proximity of Germany to herself may have been, she gave no sign of dissatisfaction until the war had actually begun. Then, Japan, adopting the language of Germany, France, and Russia toward herself in 1895, regarding her demand for Port Arthur, declared that the presence of Germany was inimical to the peace of the Orient and required her vacation of Kiaochow within an extremely brief period of time fixed in the notice. She also declared to the world her ultimate purpose of restoring this territory to China after the Germans had been ejected therefrom. This declaration committed the Japanese Government to a definite pledge to make this restoration, although the time for performance was not specified.

After its capture and in the succeeding year, Japan, taking advantage of world conditions and feeling secure from interference, presented her celebrated 21 demands to China, and insisted upon their immediate acceptance without modification. Those demands have been referred to very frequently here, and I shall do no more now than make passing reference to them. Suffice it to say that prior to their ultimate acceptance by China, the Government of the United States served notice upon both countries that she would be bound by no agreement which transgressed her own treaty rights in China; thus assuming an attitude of antagonism to the Japanese demands, which, doubtless, caused those modifications which Japan reluctantly made before imposing them upon China.

Beyond this notification no nation voiced protest against or objection to the Japanese policy; doubtless because their hands were then full and they could not, if they would, have done more than protest, something to which Japan, under the circumstances, would have given little heed. Moreover, Japan was then in alliance with those of the great powers which were arrayed against Germany and they could not afford to take any position that might result in Japan's estrangement.

I regard the conduct of Japan in 1915, to which I have just referred, as having contributed more to that feeling of resentment and distrust, in this country at least, than any other or perhaps all her policies before or since that time.

The injustice of these demands is apparent upon their face to any man who has read them. The fact that they would not have been pressed under other conditions, and the helplessness of China in resisting them, appealed to that spirit of fair play which is characteristic of the American people. From that time there is no doubt, in my judgment, that the public sentiment of the United States has very properly been aroused against the Japanese foreign policy, and particularly as regards the application of that policy to China. I have shared, Mr. President, in that feeling, and I have no doubt that, as the events of the world shall unroll themselves, Japan will realize that her treatment of China in 1915 will have done more than any other event in her history to promote the interests of other countries and to justify our distrust and suspicion—one of those "imponderables" of which Bismarck warned the German people—that she will ultimately regret it, I make no question. If immediately after the war or during the discussion of the treaty at Paris Japan had abandoned or even modified her attitude toward China, as outlined in the 21 articles, there would have been much greater disposition, certainly upon the part of our people, to accept her assurances of good faith, and to take for granted the soundness of her verbal obligations to China than can now be possible.

I have tried, Mr. President, in studying the problem presented by the Shantung provision of the treaty to dissociate my mind so far as possible from all considerations of Korea, because, whatever the treatment of Korea by Japan may have been, it should not, except in a most indirect way, affect our consideration of the character or the integrity of the articles of the peace treaty referring to Shantung. If the merit or demerit of these articles is to be decided or influenced by what Japan may have done toward other peoples, by the general course of her history or by other considerations, which, however interesting and important in themselves, have only remote bearing upon the proposition at issue, then, we must expect the interests of other countries to be equally influenced if not determined by such features of their general history, either past or contemporaneous, which may involve practices or conduct that do not square with the abstract principles of justice. But, nevertheless, Korea, her people, and her protests, from the inception of this discussion, have been identified with the Shantung question; and I have no doubt that the woes of Korea, the attitude of Japan toward that unhappy people, her disregard of treaty obligations concerning them, and the protests which they have made from time to time, coupled with their attempt to reassert their independence during the current year, have powerfully stimulated public sentiment in America, and have to some extent influenced the judgment of some Senators regarding the treaty.

Here again, Mr. President, Japan's occupation of Korea and her final absorption of that ancient Kingdom preceded Germany's declaration of war. It was complete at the time of Japan's notification to Germany to evacuate Kiaochow and Shantung. When in 1907 Japan declared a protectorate over Korea, against which her people vigorously protested, and when subsequently, in 1910, Japan absorbed the Kingdom of Chosen, although we were a party to a solemn treaty with her, we made no protest, nor did any of the other great nations concerned in the execution of this treaty. By our silence we both acquiesced in and approved of the conduct of Japan in her disregard of treaty obligations and her consequent absorption of Korea.

Under the treaty to which I have referred, and which was finally proclaimed on the 4th day of June, 1883, it was provided that "if other powers deal unjustly or oppressively with either Nation, the other will exert their good offices, on being informed of the case, to bring about an amicable arrangement," thus showing their kindly feelings. If any power dealt unjustly with Korea, it was a moral if not a legal obligation with us to exert our good offices in her behalf; and if any power dealt unjustly or oppressively with us, it was in turn the duty of the Korean Government to exert similar good offices in our behalf. Korea availed herself of that covenant and appealed to the United States to perform its duty under this provision, but in vain. If my memory serves me, the United States not only lifted no finger toward exerting its good offices with Japan, never protested her domination of Korea, but declined to officially receive the representatives of that unhappy country when seeking to secure some relief or recognition of our treaty covenant in that terrible crises of their nation's history.

Having failed to comply with our treaty obligations, and acquiesced in the treatment of Korea by Japan, we became accessories after the fact to her absorption of Korea; and however flagrant Japan's violation of her treaty obligations concerning Korea may have been—and I think there is no doubt of the fact—however unmindful of the rights of this subject people she may have been, we have confirmed her title to Korea as far as that can be done by noninterference and by acquiescence.

That being so, Mr. President, I am not at all impressed by these heartrending stories, however true they may be, of Japan's oppression and persecution of the Korean people; nor am I able to perceive how these facts—and they no doubt exist—can or should influence our dispassionate judgment in determining our duty under the Shantung provisions of this treaty. I sympathize with the people of Korea as deeply as any fair-minded man can. I would gladly see that unhappy people restored to their ancient prerogatives and independence.

I would be among the first to welcome her back into the family of nations, and I would gladly join in any proper movement designed to influence the Empire of Japan in that direction. But we are complaining now upon the principle that justified the farmer in locking his barn after his horse was stolen. I have no question but that if the United States in 1907 or 1910 had acted under the moral obligation imposed upon it by its covenant with Korea, Japan would have heeded us and her conduct toward that country would in all probability have been largely dominated by our friendly interference.

Men then now in public life, now prominent in the affairs of the Nation, are more familiar with these conditions than am I, yet now inclined to consider the Korean situation as in some way identified with or involved in this very serious problem. I think, Mr. President, we did wrong then. I believe that both morally and legally the United States should have given official expression, by way of friendly interference, of its disapproval of the destruction of Korea's political existence, basing its action upon the requirements of its treaty with Korea. But that was not done; so that when Japan entered this war, and afterwards when her delegates entered the treaty convention, the status of Asiatic affairs, as regards China and Korea, with the single exception of the change of German possession to that of the Japanese in Shantung, was substantially what it had been for some years previous; and having up to that time by our conduct acknowledged this situation we should now deal with the question entirely from the standpoint of subsequent events.

Mr. President, this brings me to the time when we became a belligerent, and when China, following our example, declared war against Germany.

I think there is no doubt but that the action of China was entirely due to that of the United States. If the United States had failed to enter the war, I do not believe China would have done so, first, because she would not have had the incentive furnished by our action, and, second, because the influence of Japan would have been sufficiently powerful to have deterred her from so doing. We are responsible, then, Mr. President, for the entrance of China into the Great War; and not having repudiated the assurance of our minister then given to her, I think we are responsible for his celebrated announcement to the Chinese President, made perhaps without authority, but confirmed by our approval. China, therefore, expected, relied upon, and was entitled to the support of the United States, wherever that support could be given consistently with our obligations to other nations, in her insistence upon the restoration of Shantung.

No man contends for a moment that China approved of the Japanese policy regarding Shantung, that she was pleased over Japan's assumption of the right to capture and restore it, or that she felt it essential to her welfare that Japan should assume that attitude. She had reasons, through former experiences with Japan in Mongolia and in Manchuria, that were sufficiently grave and important to warn her of what this intervention might ultimately mean. Therefore China's entry into the war was in all probability largely influenced by the attitude which she was assured the United States would occupy regarding her interests and her welfare during and at the conclusion of the war.

Among the 21 articles was the now celebrated agreement, also forced upon China by Japan, and dated in the spring of 1915, whereby Japan covenanted to make a qualified return of Kiaochow and of the German concessions to China.

It was the one small and unsatisfactory concession which China was able to secure from Japan as a consideration for her enforced acceptance of the 21 demands. I shall not take time, Mr. President, to go into the details of that covenant because that has been done many times upon this floor. Every man who is familiar with it knows that instead of constituting a complete return it is virtually a promise the performance of which will invest China with little more than the shell of that which Germany wrested from her.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] yesterday, in speaking upon this subject, drew one or two comparisons in other sections of the globe which aptly illustrated the conditions following the performance of her agreement by Japan. If Japan were in possession of California, and agreed to return it to the United States subject to her reservation of the city of San Francisco and the Golden Gate, retaining her joint control over the lines of railway radiating eastward and northward and southward from that great city, and the additional right to develop the mining industries of a large section of California, we readily conclude that the restoration of California to the United States would be giving the shadow only, Japan retaining the substance, such is her covenant with China, which very naturally protested against it, and hoped with our assistance to at least secure such action at Paris as would give her an opportunity to present her claims and seek there vindication before the tribunal of the league of nations.

So, Mr. President, I have reached the conclusion that we as a Nation are morally bound to aid China in this controversy, to the extent that we can do so consistently, with our own interests, our other obligations, and having in mind at all times what may be the result of our action upon this treaty.

No man can defend the attitude of Japan toward Kiaochow. No man has attempted to do so upon this floor. The President has not done so. It is one of those events which expediency alone can justify, if it can be justified at all. In his Indianapolis speech, on the 4th day of September, Mr. Wilson said:

> There is another thing in this covenant which cures one of the principal difficulties we encountered at Paris. I need not tell you that at every turn in those discussions we came across some secret treaty, some understanding that had never been made public before, some understanding which embarrassed the whole settlement.

Of course, he was referring to those secret agreements made in the spring of 1917 between Japan, on the one side, and England, France, Italy, and Russia, upon the other, under the terms of which Japan was to succeed to all German interests in China. He continued:

> I think it will not be improper for me to refer to one of them. When we came to the settlement of the Shantung matter with regard to China, we found that Great Britain and France were under explicit treaty obligation to Japan that she should get exactly what she got in the treaty with Germany, and the most that the United States could do was to urge upon Japan the promise, which she gave, that she would not take advantage of those portions of the treaty but would return to the Republic of China, without qualification, the sovereignty which Germany had enjoyed in Shantung Province.

I construe that, Mr. President, to refer to an assurance given by the representatives of Japan different from and supplementary to that of her covenants with China in 1915; for that does not restore to China "without qualification" the sovereignty which Germany had enjoyed under the provisions of her treaty, unless we concede the assertion sometimes made that China ceded no sovereignty under her treaty with Germany, a position which I think can not be reconciled with those recitals of the treaty which refer to Kiaochow, Kiaochow Bay, and the islands immediately adjacent. The President said, further:

> We have had repeated assurances since then that Japan means to fulfill those promises in absolute good faith. But my present point is that there stood at the very gate of that settlement a secret treaty between Japan and two of the great powers engaged in this war on our side. We could not ask them to disregard those promises.

I construe the repeated assurances to which the President refers to be identical with that given him at Versailles, and I earnestly hope that Japan may speedily perform them.

I regret that when the condition mentioned by the President presented itself, our delegation did not, when the treaties were insisted upon, withdraw from the conference. I believe that if it had done so they would have been withdrawn, and the United States would not only have been stronger in the subsequent conferences of that congress, but that a much more desirable treaty would have been secured from the other powers.

If we have learned anything by this war, it is the danger of secret engagements, and no one has denounced them more eloquently or more earnestly than President Wilson. I am not here to speak in judgment of the President or of the peace conference. I could not do so intelligently if I would, because I am not sufficiently familiar with all of the matters which were within their knowledge, and of which they necessarily had to take note in connection with every course pursued and every conclusion reached.

But I believe, Mr. President, that at that crucial moment the opportunity presented to our delegation justify my suggestion. The effect of these secret treaties not only ignored but seriously injured a co-ally. Such a course would have vindicated those principles of right and justice, which we flatter ourselves to lie at the very basis of American institutions. But that was not done. The treaty provides, in complete accordance with the sentiments of the secret agreements to which I have referred, that Japan shall have everything, and China only that which Japan, in an outside agreement, supplemented by an oral assurance, proposes to bestow upon her at some time in the indefinite future. This is eternally wrong.

Mr. President, what is our duty under the circumstances? Shall we strike the word "Japan" from the treaty in these four articles and insert the word "China," thus not only amending, but reversing the action of the congress of Versailles, and throw the whole subject back to the consideration of that congress? Or can we meet this condition by appropriate reservations, which not having that effect will do justice—not complete justice, perhaps, substantial justice to China? I can not with confidence determine this alternative, although I must act upon it.

No one believes for a moment that if this amendment is adopted Japan will accept its conclusions. If she returns to the congress at all, it will be a matter of surprise to me. Why should she? We are the only dissenting nation. Independently of this treaty, she has the solemn engagements of all the other great powers of the world, every one of which will observe them and observe them faithfully. She has, in addition, the full and complete possession of Kiaochow and of all the appurtenances belonging to that concession under the German treaty. She is fortunate, therefore, not only by the fact of possession, but by the covenants of the great powers, the United States alone excepted; and if her ambitions are as declared by many Senators, and as may be the case, then would she not be plausibly justified in declaring that inasmuch as the United States had officially expressed lack of confidence in the integrity of her agreement and inasmuch as there would be no interference with her projects except by the United States, ignore her engagements with China and remain where she is—in full and complete possession of everything as a permanent part of her Empire?

What would we do under similar circumstances? Would we pursue any other course or would England or France or Italy? Not unless some higher authority, the compelling force of an international public opinion, dictated to the contrary. But, however that may be, I do not believe that Japan would further concern herself with the affairs of the congress at Versailles. This might or might not be desirable. If the league is to be established, her exclusion from it might render it innocuous.

It was stated on numerous occasions, Mr. President, during the latter days of the war, with what basis I know not, that Japan was not entirely averse to a rapprochement with Germany; that Japan's policy and her institutions in the East were a duplicate of Germany's policy and her institutions in central Europe; that her army was founded and based upon the German model and her methods of government largely copied from the efficient policies of the German Empire.

I saw yesterday in a pamphlet which I received in the mails what purports to be an outline of a provisional agreement between Germany and Japan, said to have been captured at Perm, but its identity is not entirely free from suspicion. We have reason to know, however, that the attitude of Japan toward Germany was in some respects different from that of the United States, France, Italy, and Great Britain. Her institutions are not republican, her people are not democratic; they are progressing perhaps in that direction, but she is and has been since the war the sole surviving autocratic Government of any considerable dimensions. She has penetrated Siberia, thanks to our unsatisfactory course and policy toward Russia—when I say "our" I include all the Allies—she has entrenched and is entrenching herself in eastern Siberia; and, in my opinion, she will remain there, a fact which we will soon realize, and whatever regrets we may then have that our attitude toward Russia was not more effectual, they will be but vain regrets, indeed.

She is thoroughly intrenched in Mongolia and Manchuria. Between the new German Republic, which still calls itself the German Empire, and the ancient Japanese Empire, which dominates the Orient, is a vast territory occupied by 180,000,000 people—distressed, disorganized, unhappy, and bound, sooner or later, to throw themselves in the arms of the "man on horseback." Why should we expect Japan to reenter the conference at Versailles when the prospect of a combination of these three great countries is more than probable under the control of Japan herself? What more alluring to her dreams and ambitions of the future than to dominate the resources and the people in conjunction with Germany of what but a few years ago was one of the most powerful empires in the world? What better justification could she discover for such a movement than America's repudiation of the treaty by the adoption of the amendment which we are now considering?

Let us also assume, Mr. President, that China, dissatisfied with the covenants of the treaty and encouraged by our adoption of this amendment, should herself attempt to overthrow the domination of Japan in Shantung. Alone, she would be helpless. Great Britain might give her some moral support; France, perhaps, and Italy—nothing more. Indeed, under the Anglo-Japanese treaty, Great Britain might be required to furnish a contingent of troops or of ships not in behalf of, but against, China should Japan demand it. If China resorts to arms, ours is the one Nation in the world to whom she can appeal. That she will do so is inevitable, and what shall we do in that emergency? We have heard many expressions of sympathy for China, many protests against the injustice of which she will be a victim under this treaty. But does any man within the sound of my voice suppose for a moment that in the contingency which I have imagined the United States would actively interfere in behalf of China against Japan? I do not think the sentiment of the United States would justify it for a moment. We have just emerged from a great war. Its cost in men has been comparatively small, but large enough, God knows. Its cost in money and material has been appalling, and largely because we had to wage the war 3,000 miles from home and across an intervening ocean. But in this case the distance would be doubled, for it is 6,000 miles from San Francisco to China, as against 3,000 miles from New York to Brest. We there had hospitable shores upon which to embark our troops. However eager the people of China to welcome us, the navy of Japan would challenge our progress and prevent, if possible, the landing of our armies. If we succeeded, the cost of its maintenance, in addition to that which we have already encountered, would bankrupt even so great a Nation as the United States. So that I take it that interference under those circumstances is out of the question. But what is the alternative?

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] yesterday expressed grave misgivings regarding the future of our relations with Japan. He outlined some of her purposes and ambitions, and no doubt many of them are well stated. We feel instinctively toward Japan as we felt toward Germany after her declaration of war in 1914; not that there is cause for any immediate difference between the two great peoples, but that the ambitions of Japan and the interests of the United States in the Orient and in the Pacific may not always parallel each other. Here are the most probable causes of future difficulty, a contingency confronting us against which we must make some preparation.

But if as a result of our action upon this treaty China should take up arms for the overthrow of Japan in Shantung, and appeal to us in vain, the attitude of Japan toward the United States from that moment on would be intolerable. Her people would in all probability regard us as not measuring up to the test of national dignity and honor, if, indeed, they should not conclude that we were afraid of testing the power of the Empire of the Rising Sun lest the result might be disastrous to the great Republic. Her aggressions in the East would then, in all probability, assume an attitude which sooner or later would reach a crisis, and that would, of course, mean war. We must not forget, Mr. President, that we have a possession in that far-flung region always vulnerable to attack from a powerful enemy. I, of course, refer to the Philippines. When we acquired them, by the way, we ourselves made the first assault upon the integrity of the Monroe doctrine. It was then that we first interfered in the affairs of the Old World, by identifying ourselves with its dominions. For it is an essential condition of the integrity of the Monroe doctrine that we should not meddle in what Mr. Jefferson called cis-Atlantic affairs, lest we encourage the nations of the Eastern Hemisphere to meddle with our own.

Mr. President, these conditions I do not think are wholly imaginary; we should therefore have them in mind in determining how to dispose of this important amendment, in some respects the most important one we are called upon to consider, and one which every Senator desires to dispose of in accordance with the best interests of the great country which he in part represents.

There has been a good deal of latter-day sentiment here regarding China and a great many crocodile tears have been shed in her behalf. We are not particularly fond of the Chinese people. We do not permit them to come here. The few who are here permanently occupy a very low social position. In some of our political campaigns in the West we allude to them as "moon-eyed lepers," and sometimes use adjectives equally opprobrious, if not more expressive. We are just now greatly concerned about the home of Confucius. That, too, is purely sentimental. We did not care anything about the home of Confucius when Germany grabbed it, nor of Mencius, possibly because Germany was a nation of white men.

But this sudden sentiment over old Confucius and the sanctity of his birthplace, however commendable, should have no place in the consideration of this most important proposition. It is quite as important, perhaps, as the consideration of the missionaries in Korea. I dislike to hear of outrages upon the Christian missionary, but I can not forget, Mr. President, that frequently he has been an advance agent for freebooting nations. We would have had no Shantung question but for the murder of two German missionaries in 1897, thus giving to the Kaiser the excuse for which he had been looking for some time, and which he at once made the basis of a demand for Kiaochow and the Shantung concessions. Great Britain herself is not entirely free from censure in this regard, for English missionaries suffering in China and elsewhere have occasionally enabled Great Britain to push her claims for compensating territory far beyond the limits of justice.

So it has been, and, I am afraid, so it will be. They are inspired by the loftiest sentiment and by the noblest aspirations of duty; nevertheless the commercial side of the foreign mission is there, and predatory nations have seldom failed to take advantage of it when opportunity came.

Mr. President, were it not for possible consequences of far-reaching character which may result from transformation of the Shantung domination from Japan to China, I should vote for the amendments. Only through them can we effectively register our protest against the wrong to China; but our adoption of them does not help China a particle. On the contrary, such action may serve to perpetuate the presence of Japan in Shantung, besides bringing us face to face with conditions which, to say the least, are portentous with trouble.

I have read very carefully the proposed reservation of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. We are all familiar with it. It recites the understanding of the Senate of the United States regarding this subject in our vote of ratification. In view of the President's statement at Indianapolis, I should like to see it go further and, using his language, provide for the restoration to China of her unqualified sovereignty over the entire Province, which can only be done by the cancellation of those economic advantages, and particularly control of transportation, embodied in the German concession. We can insert such a reservation, Mr. President, and at the end of two years, if Japan has made no move toward restoration, we can serve notice of withdrawal from the league, basing the reason upon her failure to comply with her agreement. I am inclined to think that if the United States ever gets into this league, and then serves such a notice, the complaint which forms its basis will be at once rectified. If not, our retirement from the league at the end of the prescribed notice will abundantly satisfy the people.

I shall, therefore, Mr. President, although it is by no means a satisfactory course, vote for a reservation, either that of the Senator from North Dakota or a stronger one, upon this subject. I should like to see inserted in such reservation, if it be politic to do so, some reference to our contemplated action in the event, within a reasonable time, this great wrong to China is not rectified.

I am not one of those who desire to reject this treaty out of hand; I shall not do this unless forced to do so by the defeat of reservations that I think absolutely essential. I wish it were possible to add that all of my objections to the treaty could be crystallized in the form of reservations. But there is at least one amendment, which will be presented later, which I feel compelled under my oath of office and my convictions of duty to support.

Mr. President, I did not intend, when I took the floor, to speak upon this subject at such length, but it is one capable of such infinite detail and presenting so many angles, every one of which sustains and supports the views of Senators regarding the wrong to China in transferring her great Province to her dominating and powerful neighbor.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have listened, as I always do, with interest to the discussion by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. I agree with him practically with reference to everything he has said, except possibly some of his conclusions as to his duty under the facts. I do not disagree with him as to the main facts which he has stated; neither do I disagree with him as to what those facts properly import as to the future.

I am particularly in accord with his criticism, if it may be called such, of our failure to manifest our opposition to the annexation of Korea by Japan. Having made the treaty which we had made, I think we were under obligations to exercise our friendly offices in preventing the amalgamation or incorporation of Korea with Japan. I am very much of the opinion, Mr.

President, that that same criticism may be lodged against the Senate in the future if we do not meet this issue upon the ground of what is right and just rather than upon the ground of sheer expediency.

I am quite sure that the consideration which prevented the Government of the United States from taking action in 1910 with reference to the treaty between this country and Korea was the view that it might involve us in a condition of affairs which we were not ready to assume. We temporized with conditions and postponed our plain duty. There is scarcely any end to the road if you undertake to travel it upon the pure question of expediency rather than upon that which is deemed to be right and just in the premises.

We find ourselves in regard to this particular matter at this time in a very unhappy situation. Upon the one side is the question of expediency, of what we may properly do with the least possible sacrifice; and, upon the other hand, there is the question of right. No one is in doubt as to what is right and as to what we really should do if we were acting upon moral grounds, leaving out the question of expediency entirely.

As the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] has stated, no one has undertaken to defend this proposition upon the question of right and the principles of justice. Every member of the Versailles conference whom I have read of as having spoken upon the subject condemns it. The President of the United States, a member of the conference, has repeatedly rather frankly and fully condemned it. Practically every Senator who has spoken upon the subject here has either condemned it or apologized for it. Everyone feels, Mr. President, that the United States is involved in a condition of affairs from which it is difficult to escape without sacrificing something of its historical reputation for honor and for fair and just dealing with the other nations of the world.

We find ourselves in that situation by reason of certain secret treaties which were made during the pendency of the war. It is believed upon the part of many—and undoubtedly it was believed upon the part of those attending the conference at Versailles—that the United States in some way, by reason of having been associated with those who had made the secret treaties, is bound to give some consideration to their existence and to their terms. It was undoubtedly by reason of a secret treaty that the President finally yielded upon the Shantung matter. He has stated many times in his addresses that it was a secret treaty which so entangled the situation as to make it impossible to do that which he and the delegates from the United States desired to do. It is that particular phase of this situation and this controversy to which I shall address myself for a very brief time.

There were certain secret treaties made between Great Britain, Italy, France, Russia, and Japan, beginning in the year 1915, or the early months thereof, and extending up until about June, 1918. I do not care to-day to discuss the proposition of whether those treaties should have been made under the exigencies under which they were made. We do know that those treaties dealt with most vital and important affairs not only with reference to the enemy but with reference to the rights of allies and associates. We know that the treaties ran counter to the policies and principles which were announced again and again as the guiding policies and principles of the war. They were treaties, whatever may have been the reason for making them in the first instance, which the makers were under every obligation to make known to the United States after it entered the war.

To fail to advise the United States of the terms and conditions of those treaties, in view of the attitude of the United States with reference to certain policies, in view of the announced principles of the United States in the conduct of the war, amounted to bad faith upon the part of the countries which withheld the information, bad faith to such an extent as to relieve the United States from any moral obligation whatever of giving any consideration to the terms of those treaties either at the peace conference or at any other time during their existence. If this information, which we were entitled to have and which good faith required us to have, was withheld, certainly when it was given under a changed condition of affairs entirely and at a time when the United States was not in a position to retrieve itself in any way whatever concerning their terms, we were under no obligation to give any consideration to them at Versailles nor are we under any obligation now to consider them.

It has been stated many times since the debate opened upon this league that the hope of the league rests in the fact that we are to have a changed Europe, a changed system of diplomacy and of international affairs. Lord Cecil said some days ago that the covenant itself would amount to practically nothing, except that it was based upon a new condition, a different world, and new principles were to obtain, and that these principles lying back of the league were the only assurance of its success.

Mr. President, these secret treaties, and the manner in which the nations have dealt with them, disclose that we have no new Europe, no new system, no change in the diplomatic policies or principles of Europe, and that we are dealing with the same condition, so far as the European system is concerned, as that which obtained prior to the war. The fact that these treaties were withheld from this Government until the last hour is, I take it, no longer a matter subject to dispute in this country.

I send to the desk and ask to have the Secretary read a statement made by the President at the time the Foreign Relations Committee visited the White House.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

"Senator BORAH. I wish to ask some questions in regard to the secret treaties. I do not feel as free about those matters as I do about the league, because there are certain things that I recognize may not be entirely open for public consideration; but, nevertheless, in so far as we can, I should like to know when the first knowledge came to this Government with reference to the secret treaties between Japan, Great Britain, Italy, and France concerning the German possessions in Shantung?

"The PRESIDENT. I thought that Secretary Lansing had looked that up and told you. I can only reply from my own knowledge, and my own knowledge came after I reached Paris.

"Senator BORAH. We did get a reply from Mr. Lansing to the same effect so far as he was concerned. When did the secret treaty between Great Britain, France, and the other nations of Europe with reference to certain adjustments in Europe first come to your knowledge? Was that after you had reached Paris also?

"The PRESIDENT. Yes; the whole series of understandings were disclosed to me for the first time then.

"Senator BORAH. Then we had no knowledge of these secret treaties so far as our Government was concerned until you reached Paris?

"The PRESIDENT. Not unless there was information at the State Department of which I knew nothing.

"Senator BORAH. Do you know when the secret treaties between Japan, Great Britain, and other countries were first made known to China?

"The PRESIDENT. No, sir; I do not. I remember a meeting of what was popularly called the council of ten, after our reaching Paris, in which it was first suggested that all these understandings should be laid upon the table of the conference. That was some time after we reached there, and I do not know whether that was China's first knowledge of these matters or not.

"Senator BORAH. Would it be proper for me to ask if Great Britain and France insisted upon maintaining these secret treaties at the peace conference as they were made?

"The PRESIDENT. I think it is proper for me to answer that question, sir. I will put it in this way: They felt that they could not recede from them; that is to say, that they were bound by them, but when they involved general interests such as they realized were involved, they were quite willing, and indeed I think desirous, that they should be reconsidered with the consent of the other parties. I mean with the consent, so far as they were concerned, of the other parties.

"Senator MOSES. Were all those treaties then produced, Mr. President?

"The PRESIDENT. Oh, yes.

* * * * * * *

"Senator JOHNSON of California. I think you answered to Senator BORAH the question I am about to ask, so pardon me if it is repetitive. It is this: Was the United States Government officially informed, at any time between the rupture of diplomatic relations with Germany and the signing of the armistice, of agreements made by the allied Governments in regard to the settlement of the war?

"The PRESIDENT. No; not so far as I know.

"Senator JOHNSON of California. So far as you are aware, was it unofficially informed during that period?

"The PRESIDENT. I would be more clear in my answer, Senator, if I knew just what you were referring to.

"Senator JOHNSON of California. I am referring to the so-called secret treaties which disposed of territory among the belligerents.

"The PRESIDENT. You mean like the treaty of London?

"Senator JOHNSON of California. Yes; like the London pact.

"The PRESIDENT. No; no, sir.

"Senator JOHNSON of California. Could you state whether or not any official investigation was made by our Government to ascertain whether or not there were any such treaties of territorial disposition?

"The PRESIDENT. There was no such investigation.

"Senator JOHNSON of California. These specific treaties, then—the treaty of London, on the basis of which Italy entered the war; the agreement with Roumania, in August, 1916; the various agreements in respect to Asia Minor, and the agreements consummated in the winter of 1917 between France and Russia relative to the frontiers of Germany, and particularly in relation to the Saar Valley and the left bank of the Rhine—none of these did we (and when I say 'we' I mean you, Mr. President) have any knowledge of prior to the conference at Paris?

"The PRESIDENT. No, sir. I can confidently answer that 'No,' in regard to myself."

Mr. BORAH. We see, therefore, that these treaties which dispose of territory, which dispose of people, which divided up people, which ran counter to every principle which the Allies had announced as the guiding principles of the war, which would necessarily have a controlling influence upon the peace conference, which would necessarily embarrass any nation not familiar with their terms, were kept a secret by our allies, including Japan and Great Britain, from 1915 and 1917 until the peace delegates met in conference at Versailles.

Under what possible theory, legal or moral, can the people of the United States be asked to do a questionable, a dishonorable thing by reason of the existence of those treaties? We are relieved not only, of course, as a question of binding obligation, but we would be relieved in the court of any man's conscience from paying any consideration whatever to them. If Japan and Great Britain saw fit to enter into a treaty in 1917 by reason of conditions which existed at that time and because of exigencies in the war, I pass it by. Although it was imperialistic and contrary to all the principles which they were announcing, that is not a matter of concern to me. I did not believe them sincere in their declarations of principle at the time, and I was not misled. I do not, therefore, care to discuss that feature of the affair. But when they concealed those treaties, their terms and obligations, from the people who were entering into the war upon a specified program and upon specified principles, they had no right thereafter at any time ever to ask the United States to give any consideration to their terms or conditions. I thoroughly agree with the able Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] that when these treaties were laid upon the table at Versailles and the insistence was made by those who had signed them that they should be carried out the United States should have rejected them out of hand and, if necessary, have quit the conference, because moral prestige is still a national asset.

But, Mr. President, they not only concealed them, but, if I may be permitted to say so, they affirmatively misled the world in regard to the fact of their concealment, and particularly the United States. I read from the debates in Parliament upon the 4th day of March, 1918:

> Mr. King asked the Secretary for Foreign Affairs whether there have been communicated to President Wilson copies of all treaties, whether secret or public, and memoranda of all other agreements or undertakings to which this country has become a party since the 4th day of August, 1914; and, if not, whether copies of all such documents will be handed to the American Ambassador in London.
>
> Mr. BALFOUR. The honorable member may rest assured that the President is kept fully informed of these facts by the Allies.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, will the Senator give the date?

Mr. BORAH. I did give the date—the 4th of March, 1918.

I am not going into a discussion of the different secret treaties, because they are not relevant here to-day; but let us apply the facts to the Shantung situation, and see if the United States is not perfectly free to deal with it just as in good conscience and honor it thinks it ought to deal with it, and see if we may not deal with it without being subject to the charge of offending Japan or any other nation if we shall do what we think is right with regard to it.

China entered the war upon the urgency of both Great Britain and the United States. I think it is a pretty well established fact—I have stated it before and have never seen it denied—that the United States sent a representative to China who spoke before public meetings, commercial clubs, and so forth, and stated to the Chinese people in terms that they could rely upon the President of the United States to see that China had a place at the peace conference, and that her rights would be protected. Thi was not the statement of the ambassador, although such statements were, in effect, made by him and published in the Chinese press from time to time; but it was the statement of a special envoy, as it were, sent to those people, encouraging them to do what they could for the allied cause, and assuring them that as we had ever been their friend in the past we would continue to be their friend in the future, and that their rights should be protected at Versailles.

Mr. President, of course I have no doubt that those statements were made to the Chinese people by the United States representative in perfect good faith.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. In just a moment. I do not assume for a moment that there was any intent at that time of in any wise misleading the Chinese people, or in any way—if I may use the term—of betraying their interests at Versailles. Now I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator kindly indicate the basis of his information that the United States made such representations or promises to China?

Mr. BORAH. I will not only indicate it but I will state it. There is a distinguished Chinese gentleman in this country, whose name I can not recall but whose name can be had, who traveled with Mr. Crane throughout China as his interpreter, and interpreted his addresses to the Chinese people, in which he stated to them that, as the representative of the United States, he was authorized to say to the Chinese people that they would have a friend in the United States and in the President at Versailles.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. In just a moment. I have also been informed that Mr. Crane feels somewhat offended that he was placed in that situation. That, however, was not stated to me by this gentleman. The other facts were stated to me by him. He is one of the leaders of the Y. M. C. A. in China. That is my authority. If it is not true, I should like to have it denied. I feel that I am stating a fact. This gentleman came with a gentleman who knew him—had known him well in China. He impressed me as thoroughly reliable.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It seems to me that that is very vague and very unreliable. I supposed the Senator was basing his statement on the testimony given before the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BORAH. No; I was not basing it on that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I recall to the Senator the fact that Mr. Ferguson, who was the confidential adviser of the Chinese Government, testified before the Committee on Foreign Relations, and that his statement was far short of what the Senator has stated. If the Senator will permit me, I can read a paragraph in which Ferguson's testimony appears——

Mr. BORAH. As I have not referred to Mr. Ferguson and am not relying on his statement, I do not care to have the time taken up by reading it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will not intrude on the Senator, but will he permit me to say that Ferguson being the confidential adviser of China, and Ferguson not claiming as much as the Senator claims for China, it is very evident to me that the claim could not be made with authority on behalf of China.

Mr. BORAH. Well, Mr. President, whether the charge which I have made in all its import is true or not, there is no doubt that it was well understood in China, and understood by reason of the statements of our ambassador, as well as from other sources, that the United States would undertake to be a friend of China at Versailles.

It is further true that after China went to Versailles she relied upon the United States; that by reason of the fact that the United States advised her not to employ special counsel she failed or neglected to do so; and any number of circumstances are available to show that from the very beginning the United States placed herself in such a position that China understood she was to have a particular friend who would protect her interests. Furthermore, one of the very objects of the secret treaties of 1917, so it has been stated, and, indeed, the French treaty incorporates it, if I remember correctly, was that Japan was to no longer throw any obstacles in the way of China going into the war.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator recall what it was that the representative of China testified to before the Committee on Foreign Relations?

Mr. BORAH. No; I do not.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. All he stated was that the United States agreed to assist China in securing representation at the Paris conference, which Japan had resisted. That is the beginning and the end of his testimony.

Mr. BORAH. Very well. The Senator can have his construction of it. But I have never heard it denied, Mr. President, that the United States attitude toward China was that of encouraging her to enter the war. I have never heard it denied that it was the attitude of the United States that she was friendly to China and intended to protect her interests at Versailles. It is a notorious fact that at Versailles she did intend and did endeavor for a time, until confronted by the secret treaties, to protect China's interests at Versailles. It is further true that the President has expressed regret time and time again that by reason of the secret treaties he was prevented from doing what he desired to do, and what I have no doubt he would have undertaken to do had it not been for the secret treaties.

Mr. President, the same attitude toward China was assumed by Great Britain. Certainly Great Britain encouraged China to enter the war, and certainly they accepted her services, and those services were of an important and vital nature to the cause. Now, at the very time she was entering the war, at the very time that China was preparing to assist the Allies, Great Britain was entering into a secret agreement with Japan, another ally and associate, by which she was to take a portion of the other ally's territory and give it to Japan. This treaty was kept secret from China by Great Britain until they arrived at Versailles. It was kept secret from the United States until our delegates arrived in Paris—a secret combination or a secret treaty by which one associate in the war enters into a combination with another to deprive a third of property and territory.

It was bad enough, Mr. President, inherently bad enough, and it became indefensible and intolerable, from the standpoint of the United States, when it was kept away from us during all the months in which we were announcing our position in reference to those policies and principles by which we were supposed to be guided.

Mr. President, what did Germany have by virtue of this leasehold or treaty? What could she transfer to Japan or what could Japan acquire as German property by reason of a treaty? The German treaty itself provided that her rights were not subject to transfer to any other power. Germany had nothing which she could transfer had she affirmatively, of her own motion, undertaken to do so. Therefore there was nothing which Japan could acquire except what she acquired or could acquire by virtue of an act of war. When she undertook to take possession of the German rights, she found nothing but a lease which was forfeitable when it ran against the claim of any other nation.

Secondly, it was but a leasehold; it was not a concession. It did not undertake to transfer any sovereignty. It expressly provided against such transfer. Therefore under every rule with which I am familiar, of either municipal law or international law, the moment China entered the war those rights were forfeited and reverted to China. Being nothing but a lease, the moment it was forfeited by reason of the act of China entering the war, all rights reverted to the original lessor. Both by reason of the fact that it was nontransferable under the treaty, and by reason of the fact that it was a lease, China's entrance into the war took away any possible property rights which Japan could acquire by treaty from Germany.

What did Great Britain and France agree to? They agreed to support Japan in her claim for the German rights under the German lease, and nothing more. They did not undertake to cover any rights which Japan might have acquired by virtue of her entering upon the possessions of China as a separate and distinct nation, as an act of war, but undertook to support Japan in her claim at Versailles for whatever rights Germany had under this treaty, and that was all.

Now, what did Germany have when they met at the Versailles conference? What property interests did she have? I do not believe that there was anything there which could be transferred; secondly, that if there was any transfer which was effectual, the United States could disregard it in view of the fact that the terms of the treaty had been concealed and kept from her attention during the entire war.

In view of this record, therefore, Mr. President, we stand in the position to-day to do what in good conscience and in justice we ought to do. We can not be charged with bad faith by Japan or by Great Britain. We are in a position to assert our honor and to protect our honor by our act here in the ratification of this treaty. We stand free of all obligations save the obligation to do justice, to deal honorably with the entire situation. What right has Japan to complain that we disregard a treaty which she laboriously concealed? Indeed, she is under the highest obligation in good conscience to affirmatively release the United States from any obligation to consider these treaties. That is even more true with reference to Great Britain. If ever one nation was under obligation to deal in open candor, in unconcealed fashion, with another, Great Britain was under that obligation to this Government after we entered the war. I let her record answer how she met that obligation.

Could Japan complain of the United States if the United States refused to recognize a secret treaty? Would she stand with any success in the public opinion of the world if she should quarrel with the United States because the United States refused to be bound by that which she concealed from the United States? Could Japan complain of the United States if the United States should write into this treaty that which international law and municipal law has already written into the treaty, to wit, the complete reversion of these rights and properties to China?

So I say, Mr. President, that neither in honor nor in law are we bound to give any recognition to the past or to past transactions between Japan and Great Britain.

Much has been said here from time to time to the effect that if we should do what is contemplated, it might lead even to a conflict with Japan. I do not think so. But if we are to have difficulty, if that can not be avoided, if the situation in the Far East is such, and made such by reason of these secret treaties, that disturbances must come, let us at least have a clean record behind our position; let us at least be in a position where the world can never assail us for doing an improper or an unjust or an unconscionable thing. If the situation in the Far East is as has been contemplated by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] and by others, and we must face it, we can face it with double strength, both in our own conscience and before the world, if we do right by our associate and our ally in the war. "Thrice is he armed who has his quarrel just." But in my opinion, Mr. President, that condition need not be considered.

I should think that it would be embarrassing indeed for the Japanese Government to insist against Great Britain, the United States, and France that she should have the possessions which Germany had in China, as against the undoubted legal principle that they reverted to China the moment China entered the war. Upon what foundation will she base her claim? Upon what contention will she rest it? She will rest it upon the contention which she is making now and which we are about to indorse—nothing in the world but desire and force. When you get down to the bottom of this and analyze it, the taking of Shantung by Japan is not based, except for arguments and camouflage, upon the treaty of 1915 at all. It is based upon opportunity, expediency, and force. Before she made the treaty of 1915 she had presented her 21 demands to China, presented them out of a clear sky. She was not at war with China. There was no occasion for the demands. She had had no trouble with China. She was, in effect, an ally, but these 21 demands incorporated the German rights and, in addition to the German rights, incorporated other demands which would have made China a subject nation to Japan. It was intended at the time to initiate the policy which the treaty of 1915 afterwards attempted to carry out. We will be called upon, Mr. President, to add our moral prestige and the strength of this Republic to the program which had been initiated, not by the treaty of 1915, but the wrong which had been initiated by the 21 demands which preceded that treaty.

We are becoming a party to the dismemberment of China, an ally. The initial step of this dismemberment is not the treaty of 1915, but the demands which preceded it.

I say that the United States should draw back from that proposition. There can not be anything possible in the world's situation which requires this Republic to do a dishonorable thing toward any nation, great or small. As certainly as conscience is left in the world, as certainly as there is a morality to which men will adhere, there must be in the minds of civilized and Christian people of the world a sufficient power to force justice to the front when it is so clear and unmistakable as it is in this instance.

As I said a moment ago, there is not a Senator upon the floor who defends it upon the ground of right. There is not a Senator who defends it upon the ground of justice. There is not a Senator who undertakes to put under it a basis of morality. There is not a Senator but regrets that it is here. The President regrets it. The people of the United States regret it. If to-morrow morning it could be known that the conscience of the United States was clean and clear of this "damned spot" which will stain her honor for all time, there would be an exhilaration of the public mind which has not been felt since the war closed, for we are essentially a just and honorable people. Will the United States rise to meet the situation? Will we send word to all the nations of Europe and of Asia that "you may dismember and partition and plunder and separate peoples until you get to that body which represents the people of the United States—there you must stop"? It would have a most wholesome effect throughout the world. To do right, to do justice, that is the highest service we can now render to a doubting, distrustful, and suspicious world.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, the Shantung provisions of the treaty of peace, sections 156, 157, and 158, are shameful. They are the culmination of a long series of unjust and regrettable international arrangements, every one of which is repugnant to that sense of justice which fortunately pervades the United States and which, please God, may never be diminished or destroyed.

In 1896 and 1897 Germany indicated clearly her determined policy to acquire for herself territory in China.

In 1898 when two Christian ministers of German citizenship had been killed by a mob, Germany promptly seized the opportunity of making this unfortunate incident a basis for the peremptory demand of the desired rights in Shantung. It had no more foundation in justice than, as has been well said, would exist if as a result of mob violence in the city of Baltimore a citizen of Great Britain should be killed and the unfortunate incident should be made the demand for the cession to England of the Chesapeake Bay and its adjacent territory.

Soon after the war broke out in 1914 the Chinese Government was anxious to expel the German forces from Chinese territory, and under the circumstances was able to do so. This would have brought China directly into the war, but Japan with great vigor insisted that China should not act in the matter and prevented her entrance into the war upon the side of the Allies, while Japan herself, at an almost negligible cost of men or material resources, dispossessed Germany from her Chinese possessions. It is significant that Japan in thus dispossessing Germany did not content herself alone with the acquisition of the territory which Germany had acquired but landed her troops a hundred and fifty miles in the interior and took military control of a far greater extent of territory than Germany had ever possessed.

In 1915 Japan, by the threat of force and by dominating diplomatic insistence, compelled an unwilling China to agree that the rights of Germany should on the termination of the war be transferred to Japan. Japan with great cunning secured, owing to the stress of world conditions, an agreement from England and France and Italy that they would consent in the final treaty with Germany to the acquisition by Japan of all Germany's rights.

It is, as I have said before, inconceivable that the representatives of the United States at the peace table who have asserted that the first knowledge they ever had of any such agreement between England, France, Italy, and Japan regarding Shantung came to them at Paris should ever have consented to proceed with the negotiations until these secret arrangements of such vital importance to the future welfare of the world were by the consent of all parties thereto entirely abrogated, so that the conference at Paris might begin their negotiations unencumbered by secret arrangements of which the United States had no prior information. One would have thought that the President would promptly have said to his associates:

"Gentlemen, I learn for the first time of the secret treaty which you have made between yourselves. I do not impugn the motive or the necessity which may have been the cause of its original creation, but as we now come together to consider the welfare of the world, and to consider it alone upon the principles of honor and of justice, I say to you in the name of the United States that before we enter upon this conference that secret treaty, by the consent of every one of you who formed it, must now be laid upon the table and canceled, in order that we may proceed, unfettered by secrecy, to do now what is right in the matter. I will not enter into a conference with my hands tied by a secret arrangement concerning which I had no information whatever."

But such action was not taken at Paris. The treaty of peace was negotiated with provisions which did give to Japan the very territory in China which England and France and Italy had secretly agreed with Japan should be given to her, and that treaty is now an accomplished fact and in practical operation. Germany has already ceded her rights in Shantung to Japan. Japan is in actual possession of the Shantung Peninsula, and nothing that we can do will dispossess her unless, indeed, by very force we eject her from the peninsula.

If we adopt these amendments as they are written, which expressly cede Shantung to China and take Shantung away from Japan, we ought to make it effective.

If the United States in its wisdom actually transfers territory, as these amendments do, from Japan to China, we ought to see to it that such transfer on our part is accomplished; otherwise it is nothing but a verbal bubble that by its very lack of substance suggests its insincerity.

Is it not also apparent that by these amendments, whether we proceed to enforce them by war or not, we are intermeddling in the most aggravating manner in the quarrels and disputes of the Far East? We seek to change an existing condition of territory of which we disapprove, and not only express our disapproval but actually take the disputed territory and give it to another. There could be no greater intermeddling in the affairs of the Far East than this.

If we adopt these amendments we are not helping China in the least. We do not change by a hair's breadth the existing condition of Japan's possession of the Shantung Peninsula. We do nothing more than create a diplomatic situation which renders real help to China more difficult in the future.

For my own part, I want to record my abhorrence of the Shantung provisions as they are written in the treaty; and yet I am not blind to a condition which actually exists and which for the moment the United States is helpless to remedy. If the pending amendments could accomplish the transfer to China of Shantung I would vote for them.

Before the Senate is through with the treaty I shall avail myself of the opportunity or I shall create the opportunity by my vote of expressing my views; but at the present time the amendments as they are proposed are impotent to help China unless we inject ourselves into the very center of the eastern question. Their adoption would cause the United States to intermeddle in the disputes of the Far East, from which we ought to earnestly seek to be free. Are we not wiser before the world, Mr. President—wiser from the viewpoint that has been so eloquently stated by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]—more consistent with our established polity, and more helpful to our sister Republic of China, if, under the situation as we now find it actually to exist, we express our disapproval of the provisions of the treaty with regard to Shantung, refuse ourselves to be bound by them, and indicate in clear terms our intention of remedying the wrong at the first opportunity?

I think so, and because I think so I shall vote against the pending amendments.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have listened with great interest to the very forceful statement of my colleague [Mr. SPENCER], and I dislike very much to take issue with him, because he is my colleague; but I desire very respectfully to call his attention to the fact that his entire argument proceeds upon a fallacy, and I believe that I can make that so clear that my colleague will be almost, though perhaps not quite, convinced.

The Senator states that the rape of Shantung is abhorrent to him and abhorrent to the world. These are not his words, but that is their import. The Senator having laid down that proposition then proceeds to say that this is an accomplished fact because the treaty has already been signed by Germany, has already been signed or agreed to by Great Britain, by France, by Japan, and by Italy; therefore, the treaty is an existing fact; that the transfer is consequently a completed thing; that what the United States now proposes to do is to disregard and defy this existing condition; and that if she does so she takes the responsibility of summoning her armies and her navies and going to war with Japan in order to assist China in wresting from Japan this Province thus finally turned over to Japan. That is a fair statement of the Senator's position.

The only trouble with that is that it is all aside from the facts. What are the facts? We are now asked to ratify this treaty, to become a party to it, and until we do become a party to it it will not be binding upon us. If we now proceed to amend it, it will have to go back to all of the nations that have signed it, and they will then have the question put to them of agreeing to the treaty as we have amended it. So the question presented is not whether we shall undertake to upset a treaty that is concluded, but it is whether, while the treaty is under consideration, we shall insist upon a just amendment being written into it.

This treaty is not an accomplished fact, so far as we are concerned, until the United States shall act. If the United States amends this treaty by providing that Shantung shall go to China, and the other nations refuse their assent to the treaty as thus amended, then the treaty does not bind us and the treaty does not bind any other nation unless those other nations see fit to make a treaty disregarding and leaving out the United States altogether; and if the other nations see fit to make a treaty with Germany disregarding and leaving out the United States altogether, then well and good, we will make our own treaty, and when we make it we will not agree to furnish the men and furnish the money to fight the wars of these other nations.

If this treaty is already settled, as the Senator argues; if it is an accomplished fact, as the Senator argues, why do we sit here deliberating upon a thing already done? What is there left for us to do, if it is already an accomplished thing? What reason is there for us to adopt it, if it is an already accomplished thing? Is it the position of the Senator and of those who share his views that the United States has nothing to say; that we have been put out on a limb, to use a common expression, and the limb sawed off between us and the tree; or is it a fact that this treaty is still before the world and that we are performing an important function with reference to it when we sit here deliberating and when we propose to vote upon it? What utter and sheer nonsense it is for us to spend our time deliberating about this treaty if it is already accepted! What use is there to talk about amendments or reservations if the thing is already a fixed fact? What good will a reservation be, what virtue, to a thing we can not change, an immutable, unchangeable thing already accomplished and fixed? The Senator overlooks that.

My view is that this treaty is still before the Senate of the United States; my view is that if the Senate of the United States amends this treaty it will go back; and when it goes back the other nations of the world will then either have to accept our views or they will have to make a treaty to suit themselves, and we will be at liberty to make one that suits us. So when the Senator argues in one breath that we can alter the situation by a reservation, and in the next breath that we can not alter it by an amendment because it is already fixed and settled and beyond our control, it seems to me he is not in a very logical position.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). Does the senior Senator from Missouri yield to his colleague?

Mr. REED. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. SPENCER. Am I not right and does not my distinguished colleague agree with me in the statement that when three of the principal allied or associated powers agree to this treaty it becomes an accomplished treaty? And, even though we never acted upon it, is it not a treaty every provision of which with regard to Germany and with regard to Shantung, which the Senator is now discussing, would be actually accomplished? Am I wrong in that?

Mr. REED. The Senator is right in the position that the treaty recites that when it has been approved by three of the principal powers it shall become effective and peace shall ensue; but the Senator does not mean to say that three of the powers can bind the rest of the world to that treaty? They can bind themselves, and three of the powers have bound themselves; but the United States is not bound. She is at liberty now to take such action as she sees fit; and if the United States should disagree to this treaty altogether and reject it, there would be world peace, except that nominally there would not be peace between us and Germany, although there would be in fact. But while that is true, does the Senator differ from my statement when I say that if the United States amends this treaty now it will go back to the other nations, and that if it does go back to the other nations they will then have their option to accept our amendments or to reject our amendments, and if they do reject our amendments we still are free then to act?

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I quite agree with the senior Senator from Missouri; and it is for the very purpose of preventing, unless it is absolutely necessary, such amendments as will carry the treaty back that I prefer the reservations. I think perhaps the Senator would like amendments that do carry it back, but in that I am not in agreement with him.

Mr. REED. In other words, the Senator, recognizing that this treaty is now effective as between these nations who signed it, and that it contains this enormity, does not want to send it back so that the cancer may be cut out, but he wants simply to put in a reservation saying that we are not a party to the cancer. Well, Mr. President, I want to give them a chance to cut it out, and I want to make them cut it out. What we need is a little more American nerve and not quite so much acquiescence in the demands of other countries.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield further?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. SPENCER. I want to express, in a word, my concurrence in the cancerous nature of the situation. The difference between my distinguished colleague and myself is this: He thinks that that cancer can be best removed by an amendment, and he proposes to give the other nations the chance to cut out the cancer.

Mr. REED. To make them do it.

Mr. SPENCER. To make them do it. I think the cancer can be best removed not by sending the treaty back but by leaving the situation in such a condition that the United States itself is free to act in regard to the removal of that cancer later on.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, we will be free to act in what way? We will have ratified a treaty that expressly approves the theft. We will have breathed, or will have helped to breathe, the breath of life into the treaty that guarantees to Japan the loot. Then we propose to say, after having done that, "We reserve, for the sake of conscience, an approval of it."

Mr. President, either a reservation means something or it means nothing. If a reservation has any potentiality whatsoever, then the United States is protesting against this great wrong; and if she protests against this great wrong the time to right it is when the contract is being made, and not later.

The Senator is a distinguished lawyer. The Senator never yet was confronted with a situation where a party said to his client, "I am going to restore this property to you, but I am going first to insist that you shall sign a deed of it to me," and under those circumstances advised his client to make the deed. He has invariably said, if he was ever confronted by that situation, "If you are going to restore this property, then, instead of your requiring a deed from my client to you, you ought to make a deed to my client," and now is the time to settle these matters.

The Senator says, however—and this is the part of his argument I want to dwell on for a moment—that if the United States adopts his amendment, the United States then becomes bound, practically, to go to war to make it good. Mr. President, when the United States adopts this amendment she passes the amendment back to the other nations of the world and asks them to accept it. If they do accept it the wrong is righted. If they do not accept it the United States is bound to nothing. She has simply expressed her abhorence by an amendment. If we adopt this amendment to-day, and the other nations of the world refuse to ratify and confirm it, we are bound to nothing. The Senator surely knows that. The league of nations, the assembly of nations, this association of powers, will be bound, if they ratify it and it becomes a living thing, to see that Japan does the thing that they say shall be done; but if they do not do that, then all we have done is to adopt an amendment which is dead or dies because the other nations of the world refuse to concur in it.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. REED. I do; yes.

Mr. COLT. As I understand the situation, I might say to the Senator, if the treaty consisted of 12 articles, one of which the United States did not agree to, and we ratified the treaty as to 11 articles, it would be only a partial ratification of the treaty on our part. When we do it by a reservation it leaves the 12 articles in full force between the other parties. When, however, we make a textual amendment, we make in fact a new treaty, and it must be submitted to all the other signatories.

I thought the Senator was perhaps a little strong in the statement that if we ratify the treaty with reservations we ratify the treaty and the whole of it. That is not true. It is only a partial ratification upon our part. I so understand it.

Mr. REED. The Senator and I do not disagree. We may disagree about phraseology, but not about the thought. Of course, if we ratify the treaty outright, we have consented to all of it. If we reject it outright, we have rejected all of it. If we amend it, we have then ratified the treaty with amendments, and it must go back to the other powers for their agreement to the amendments. If we merely put in a reservation, we leave the situation in this wise—that all the wrongs and all the villany and all the crimes remain. We are no longer in a position even to protest against them. We have consented that the instrument shall be a living instrument; but we say that, as far as we are concerned, we will not be a party to the wrong, which, however, becomes consummated.

Mr. COLT. I understand that.

Mr. REED. Now, I am not willing that this treaty should contain these wrongs. I want to employ the only opportunity we will ever have to take them out. I do not want them to exist. I want the treaty to go back, and I want these nations to have the pressure of the United States put against them, so that we may prevent these international crimes.

And why should we not send it back? What is the reason why it should not go back? What is the delicacy of the situation that makes it so that the United States can not ask for the reassembling of a body that is already assembled? There has been talk about reassembling the peace conference. The peace conference is in session now. The representatives of all these nations are there, and this question or any question can be placed before them. If not, what utter nonsense it is for us to pretend that we have any right to say anything or do anything! If it is impossible to assemble these gentlemen, then we ought to take this work as it was handed to us and swallow it, or else we ought utterly to reject it.

Why is it that Senators fear to reassemble these nations? They are assembled; I use the term "reassemble" because it has been used so often. Will it make any difference with Germany? Germany has already yielded these rights, and it is a conceded fact that Germany has nothing to say about them. It will make some difference to Japan. That is the only nation it will affect.

That brings me to a consideration of this Japanese proposition.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Before the Senator goes to that, I think the Senator has very accurately stated the situation that would result if this amendment were adopted. If it were accepted by the other signatories to the treaty, of course the situation would be solved. If it should not be accepted, I think the Senator has correctly stated that the treaty would stand as between the three powers and Germany, and we would be perforce obliged to negotiate a separate treaty with Germany.

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I desire to inquire of the Senator whether that situation gives him any anxiety whatever?

Mr. REED. Not the slightest; not the slightest.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I imagined as much, because I could not understand his desire otherwise to attach amendments to the treaty which would amount to a rejection.

Mr. REED. I can see no reason why it should give anybody anxiety. Let us see what we need, as far as we are concerned, in our dealings with Germany. Suppose we were to say to Germany: "We want from you, so far as the United States is concerned, in a separate treaty, everything you have agreed to give the United States in the treaty you negotiated." Now, what would it be? Not a dollar of indemnity; not a ship, except these merchant ships that we took here during the war; not a foot of territory.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Can the Senator give us any idea of the value of those?

Mr. REED. Well, about the amount that it took us to furnish shells for five minutes in one good battle.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That amounts to how much?

Mr. REED. Oh, I do not know.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It amounts to something like a hundred millions, does it not?

Mr. REED. Possibly. We give that away every day here. [Laughter.] Is the Senator alarmed about that? Does my distinguished friend mean to say to me that Germany would hesitate in making peace with us, to tell us to keep these old tubs? I will not say "old tubs." They were fairly good vessels of an obsolete type.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; I think the Senator ought to revise that statement; but I will say to the Senator that, however he may feel about it, I have no disposition whatever to make a present of a hundred million dollars or $1,000,000 to Germany.

Mr. REED. I have not any disposition to do it, and I have not said so, and the Senator did not so understand me, either.

I said that Germany would not hesitate one second, in order to have peace and good will reestablished with this country, to let the ships go as they go now. There is nobody going to be deceived by that argument. Is the United States selling her birthright of honor for this mess of pottage? Are we afraid to do an act of justice to the world because, if we made a separate peace with Germany, she might say, "We will not give you this hundred million dollars," if that is the amount, when, as a matter of fact, she has no option except to do it? The good will of the United States, the fact of having peace with the United States, is worth more than a hundred million dollars to Germany in one month's time, aye, in one hour's time. There is nothing in that. Nobody will be deceived by it.

What is there, then, that makes gentlemen fear making a separate peace with Germany if the other nations of the world should refuse to accept our amendment?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator just one more question. All our troops, with insignificant exceptions, are now withdrawn from the seat of war. We would be in exactly the same situation if we were to negotiate a treaty of peace with Germany as if all the military forces had been withdrawn from the area of conflict immediately upon the cessation of hostilities. I inquire of the Senator whether he would be willing to proceed to negotiate a treaty of peace with Germany on that basis?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, there is no use answering a part of that question. But let us look at the situation just as it is now. All of our troops are withdrawn from Germany, and Germany has not any troops over here that I have heard of. So the two nations would stand at arm's length. We have Germany's ships, and that is all we are ever going to get, and it is all we have ever asked.

Now, the question that is presented to this bankrupt nation, this half-starving nation, to which we have had to send food, is this, "Do you want to make peace with the greatest power in the world or do you not?" Do you think that Germany would hesitate a minute because our troops are withdrawn?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. One moment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I want to correct a statement made by the Senator.

Mr. REED. I want to finish the statement; then I will submit to the correction. The Senator from Montana says our troops are withdrawn from Germany. Our troops, unfortunately, are not withdrawn, and under the treaty we are making we are to keep American troops on German soil for 15 years. They are recruiting boys now for service in foreign parts, and the contract expressly specifies it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not care to answer that statement, Mr. President; but I desire to correct the statement of the Senator that the ships we took from Germany are all we have asked for or all we get.

Mr. REED. What else do we get?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. We get $750,000,000 worth of property which the Alien Property Custodian has taken from German citizens.

Mr. REED. We have that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; we have that.

Mr. REED. And Germany has not any army to come and get it back.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; she has not; but we have it.

Mr. REED. Yes. Does the Senator from Montana mean to tell the Senate and the country that for those considerations the United States ought to hesitate, for fear that Germany will not make peace with us? Germany stands with her arms extended begging peace. We are not the people who need fear Germany. If there is any hitch in the making of peace with Germany, it is not the United States that need be fearful; it is France and England and Italy, the countries that are near by. That is one of the reasons why I think those countries might accept our amendment. We alone of all the nations stand in a position where we can not be hurt, unless we enter into a compact that hurts us.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Just one more interruption and I will not trouble the Senate further.

Mr. REED. Certainly; I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I agree fully with the Senator that we are in a most advantageous position from financial and other similar considerations in negotiating a treaty of peace. But why does the Senator want to throw away every advantage that we acquired by reason of the military victory over Germany?

Mr. REED. We are not throwing away a single advantage. What advantage are we throwing away? I am speaking from the standpoint of the United States. You tell me that the treaty is already in effect. You say that Germany has already made her peace with all the other nations of the world, and you say that the treaty is acceptable to her. If the United States were not to sign that treaty, it would still stand. But if we send it back with an amendment, and the other nations see fit to accept that amendment, then there will be that much good done to the world. Let us see. Germany has not a thing to say about that. That was admitted by the President. Germany is not a member of the league of nations. Germany has signed away Shantung. What we are asked to do is to dispose of Shantung and to ratify and confirm the transfer to Japan. There is nothing in those arguments.

It was argued here by a Senator, for whom I have the most profound respect, that if we refuse to consent to this transfer and to ratify and confirm it Japan may refuse to come into the league of nations; she may refuse to become a partner in the regeneration of the world. That is to say, in order to get Japan to join in this effort to uplift the world, in order to get her to be a partner in this association that proposes to wipe out all international inequalities and injustices and to produce a reign of equity, we must bribe her by turning over to her her ill-gotten gains and guaranteeing them to her. What kind of a partner is that going to be? If I am going to organize a church I do not want any gentleman to join only upon the consideration that he shall be bribed into his membership. That is not the kind of men to make churches with.

If you are going to organize a partnership of the nations of the world for the purpose of producing universal justice, then you can not bring into this partnership any nation that is so debased that it will not join unless it is guaranteed its ill-gotten wealth. I would rather have a pirate nation outside than a pirate nation inside. I do not want to sit at the same table and consult with and submit to the votes and the decisions of a nation that will only join provided it is allowed to have its crimes recognized and justified and guaranteed.

It is a strange sort of argument that we are hearing here. If that nation is so selfish, so brutalized, so criminal as it has been pictured, then instead of admitting it into the household we ought to bar our gates against it. We ought to preserve our own councils against it. You can not take a lot of savages and transform them into saints by bringing them into this compact, and certainly you can not when they tell you that they will not come in unless they are permitted to keep their international stealings.

Now, we are asked to sanctify this proposition; we are asked to justify it, and we are told that if we do not do it Japan may stay out; that she may join Germany; that she may join Russia. If Japan is that sort of treacherous thing, then in the name of Heaven why should we take her into partnership? Do you gain anything by admitting the enemy and the traitor and the conspirator into your own councils and your own home? That argument ought to exclude Japan as an undesirable and a dangerous factor in the life of the world.

Then we are told that we are powerless to help China. Mr. President, if we sign this treaty without amendment, we will be powerless to help China. Now is our one chance to help China, and to help her without a great and bloody war. Now is our chance to say that the United States refuses to concur in this treaty unless at this time, at the moment of signing and as a part of the exchange of documents, Shantung shall be delivered back to China. If we do that, it does not involve us in war. If the other nations accept, then this great wrong is done away with and all cause for war in the future between China and Japan will have been removed and all cause for war between us and Japan or any other nation concerning that great wrong will have been removed.

But if you sign the treaty as it is now and turn this great Province over to Japan, then you have that question before you, you have that great world irritant fastened in the international body. You have the certainty that if China is ever able to rise from the dust she will strike, and when she does that many nations may be drawn into the conflict. For the safety of the world, for the preservation of peace, for the settlement of this controversy when it can be settled—for all those considerations, the amendment ought to be adopted.

Now, what is the amendment? The amendment proposes that Japan shall do now what she professes she is going to do to-morrow or some other day in the near future. She has never made a statement yet that binds her Government, but she has made statements to control the opinion of the world. She says in those statements, "Give us a good title, then we will graciously give it back some day." If she is in good faith about that, now is the time to do it, when the contract is being made. If we do not do it now, then the question is an open one. Then comes the question, What can the various nations of the world do about it? If we accept the league of nations that is adopted, we will assume that China files her complaint before the league of nations, and the league undertakes to deliberate upon it. Japan will lay down as her muniment of title a solemn treaty confirming her in the possession of this property, and when China undertakes to reply she will be able to put in evidence only the oral statement made by some Japanese statesman. Japan has not by an official act declared what she will do, so China will lose her case for that reason, and, as I said yesterday, she will lose it for another reason, that the most potential nations represented on the council will be the nations who have signed the secret pact, who themselves are responsible for this situation.

But suppose, sir, that the league of nations, just as it stands now, would undertake to decree that Japan should turn this property back to China, then what? I am speaking now of the possibilities of war. If Japan is now in such temper and is made of such material, if she is ready to conspire with Germany against her associates, if she is ready to conspire with Russia against her associates, she will, in the case I have supposed, carry out that conspiracy, join those great nations who are outside of the league. There are over 50,000,000 more white men outside of the league than are inside of it, and she will join in an alliance and in an agreement with them. Then look for a world war indeed!

If Japan will not do justice now, we can not trust her in the future. If, with their armies and their navies intact, and if, with Japan now having great gains to be made through this war outside of Shantung, with Japan professing unofficially to do justice to-morrow or the next day or next year, we can not now secure from Japan a fair deal and a fair understanding, then beware of what we will be able to do under the league of nations; beware of the conduct of Japan in the future.

Mr. President, Japan can be handled to-day. I say to you that if you consummate this robbery Japan can not be handled to-morrow. Why do I say that? She has approximately 50,000,000 people. She has taken over Korea with 20,000,000 people. If she acquires Shantung she gets 40,000,000 more of people, making 110,000,000 of people drawn under the authority of this—and I use the oft-repeated expression—Prussian of the Orient, with her fatalism, with her cruelty, with her indomitable will, with her towering ambition. Not only does she gain control of these 40,000,000 Chinamen, but she gains practically the key to all China, and you have opened there for her an empire of conquest and a sphere of influence such as the world has hardly dreamed of before.

Fifty years is a short time in the life of nations. Give to Japan 50 years to work upon that material, with the power to Japanize—if I may use that adjective—these Chinese populations, and you will have created a yellow peril indeed. You will have brought together this mighty host of yellow men—I am assuming that Japan is successful in holding these possessions—and you will have created a menace that will cause not only Europe but the United States to have great reason for fear.

The proposition is that Japan to-day is so powerful that we can not make her do justice at this time, hence we will make her much more powerful in the hope that at some future time, by a tribunal that we are setting up, we can get her to do justice. The long line of international treachery which the world has witnessed ought to give us a lesson. When England entered this war Lloyd-George said England did not propose to demand a single foot of territory; but Great Britain has absorbed more territory through this war than Rome ever gained in a similar period of time. When England entered Egypt she protested to high heaven that she did not intend to acquire that territory. The language was read here to-day. But in a few years' time England's clutch grew tighter and she had taken over the control of Egypt. She has now entered upon a similar course of conduct with reference to Persia. England, through this war, with her other possessions, now drives her railroad from the cape to Cairo on English soil. Possibly that may not be a bad thing for the world; but it illustrates how little confidence can be placed in the statements that nations do not propose to take territory or that they propose to yield the territory already in their possession.

Japan has repeatedly promised to restore the possessions she has taken, and she has broken every promise that she has made to China or made to the world. The history of mankind is that when nations gain possession of lands they keep them, if they have the power to keep them.

When we gave Cuba the right of self-government—we came very near giving her complete self-government—we furnished about the only example in modern history at least of a nation ever relinquishing territory. In that case we had not gone in as conquerors, but simply as friends. We have not been able to let go of the Philippines yet. The spirit of keeping ground is strong in the human heart.

If Japan intended to give back this property to China, she would give it back now. Only children are really fooled by the professions of a man or of a nation that says, "We propose to give back the thing we are taking, but before we give it back you have got to certify a title to us." If she is going to give it back, why does she need the title certified? Why does she need to have it sanctified and sanctioned and made pure?

If we make this amendment, it may be that when the treaty goes back Japan will snap her fingers and say to all the world that she disregards their will, that she proposes to keep this land and these people. If so, one of two courses will be open. One will be for the nations to undertake to enforce by war the liberation of China. I do not think any such obligation rests upon us. We did not make the conditions and we are under no obligation to send troops there to carry them out. The other course would be, or at least the result would follow, that we would know the heart of Japan; we would know what is her purpose now, and the world would stand on guard against them.

It is a singular thing to find the Senate of the United States solemnly debating the question whether it ought to do what is right for fear that it might offend a nation by not according to that nation the privilege of keeping its stolen property. So far as I am concerned, I do not fear Japan to-day, but if you make her the monarch of the Orient, her Emperor the master emperor of all the yellow men she can gather by force of arms, you can create a force there before which the world may well tremble.

Mr. President, I only intended to reply to my colleague. I have talked too long on this matter, but I protest that it is a shameless thing to stand here and say that this is a great wrong and yet vote for that wrong.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, the appealing arguments of the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] for the adoption of these amendments are not very persuasive to me when I consider the fact that, even though these amendments and all of the other amendments and reservations proposed by the committee shall be adopted, if I understand the position of those Senators correctly, they will then vote to reject the treaty. It seems to me their position is that during the consideration of this treaty as in Committee of the Whole they are very solicitous for the protection of China, but when it comes to the final act of voting upon the resolution of ratification they will abandon China to her fate.

I thoroughly indorse everything that has been said in denunciation of the articles of the treaty with respect to Shantung; I indorse what the Senator from Idaho said, that we were not in honor bound to give any recognition to the secret pacts out of which these articles in the treaty grew. I will go further, Mr. President, and say that, in my judgment, we are in honor bound to refuse to give any recognition to these articles in the treaty; but I do not believe that it should be done in the manner it is now proposed to do it. I believe it ought to be done by the Senate declaring in the resolution of ratification that it withholds its assent from all of the provisions in the treaty relating to Shantung and reserves to itself full liberty of action with respect to all matters that may arise thereunder. I want to assure the Senate that they will later on have an opportunity to vote for such a reservation. If no other reservation is proposed, I shall offer a reservation substantially in this form: The United States withholds its assent to articles 156, 157, and 158, and reserves full liberty of action with respect to any controversy that may arise under said articles.

It is immaterial to me what form the reservation takes, provided that when we come to vote upon the resolution of ratification we do not vote to agree to these articles with respect to the cession of Shantung and reserve to ourselves full liberty of action with respect to any matter that may arise under these articles.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. LENROOT. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. Will the Senator again read his proposed reservation?

Mr. LENROOT. As I stated, I am only suggesting the substance of what I believe would be a proper reservation—that the United States withholds its assent to articles 156, 157, and 158, and reserves full liberty of action with respect to any controversy that may arise under said articles.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. I have very great respect for the Senator's judgment in regard to this matter. As I understand the Senator, he takes the position that the United States by some process should relieve itself wholly and absolutely from any obligation to enforce this portion of the treaty?

Mr. LENROOT. We certainly should do that; but, in addition, we should be perfectly at liberty to assist China at some time in the future if we saw fit to do so.

Mr. BORAH. The question which I desire to ask the Senator is this: What is the difference, then, so far as the substance is concerned, between the position which the Senator takes and that taken by me? His reservation is, in effect, an amendment, is it not?

Mr. LENROOT. It is not.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, technically it is not; but the moral effect of it must be the same.

Mr. LENROOT. Well, let us see—and that is what I was about to discuss——

Mr. BORAH. Very well.

Mr. LENROOT. Let us see the difference between that kind of a reservation and the amendment proposed by the committee. The amendment proposes to strike out in the articles the word "Japan" and to insert the word "China," so as to make the cession from Germany to China instead of to Japan. As the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] has said, the treaty during the present week has come into full life, so far as the parties are concerned who have ratified it. The treaty at this moment is in full effect between the British Empire, France, Italy, and Germany, and it is safe to say that before the treaty passes out from the Senate, whether it be ratified or rejected, Japan also will have ratified it. Whatever may be said with reference to the cession from Germany to Japan being effective at this date—which is a question I do not care to argue to-night—it certainly will be effective just as soon as Japan ratifies the treaty, so that every concession that Germany has in Shantung will have passed to Japan before the Senate votes upon the resolution of ratification.

What is proposed, then, by the amendments? Although the title of Germany will have passed from Germany to Japan, the amendments would provide that Germany shall agree to cede to China something that she has already ceded by quitclaim to Japan. I insist that this amendment can not be accepted by the British Empire, by France, or by Italy without the consent of Japan.

Mr. BORAH. What, then, is the legal effect of the Senator's reservation? What does it accomplish? What does it do with reference to this territory? Where does it leave us?

Mr. LENROOT. The reservation leaves the United States not a party in any way to that which I believe is correctly denominated a crime. If we do not become a party to it, we will be at liberty in any way that the American people and the United States Congress may determine at any time in the future to assist China in her claims to Shantung.

Mr. BORAH. In any event the result is that Japan is left in absolute possession of Shantung. The reservation does not change the status at all.

Mr. LENROOT. It does not; and neither does the amendment, if adopted by the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. In other words, we simply refuse to hold the lantern while the burglary is taking place.

Mr. LENROOT. But the burglary has taken place, and the amendment does not change that fact, unless Japan consents to it.

Mr. BORAH. Precisely so; but the Senator's reservation does not require the treaty to be sent back for the action by anybody.

Mr. LENROOT. It does not.

Mr. BORAH. So it is a moral certainty that the situation will remain permanent, and the only thing we will accomplish by the reservation is to say that we do not like the transaction.

Mr. LENROOT. That is true; that we do not approve it and are not a party to it. The Senator, I am very sure, is convinced, as I am convinced, that if this treaty is sent back, with the British Empire having agreed to this cession—I am not speaking of secret treaties, for I indorse wholly what the Senator from Idaho has said with reference to them; I believe that every one of them was abrogated by the acceptance of the 14 points—the British Empire, France, and Germany, by signing and ratifying the treaty, having agreed to this cession to Japan, they can not undertake honorably, after having made that agreement in this treaty, to accept any amendment changing the status unless Japan is willing to accept it. Does the Senator from Idaho think that Japan, being in possession, having the assent of the great powers named, having the title that Germany had to Shantung, is going to assent to such an amendment?

Mr. BORAH. Perhaps not; but, Mr. President, the only possible way by which we can force Japan, Great Britain, and the other countries to reconsider this matter is by an amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. But those countries can not honorably reconsider the matter without the consent of Japan.

Mr. BORAH. But being as they were not honorable in doing the thing, they may be willing to do an honorable act by reconsidering a dishonorable act.

Mr. LENROOT. Then the Senator's position is that, having done a dishonorable thing in insisting upon the Shantung provision, they might be expected to do another dishonorable thing in disregarding the word they have given in the treaty.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a suggestion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. REED. If it is true that the nations are now so far committed that they will not at this time, when the question is still open, do justice to China, what chance does he think China will have in trying the case before the league of nations on her appeal to have Shantung restored to her?

Mr. LENROOT. I would prefer that the Senator ask some Senator who has more confidence than I have in the efficacy of the league of nations with respect to such a controversy.

It is true, Mr. President, that the United States and all of the other nations may later insist upon Japan carrying out her agreement to restore Shantung to China; but, with the reservation that I suggest, we do not participate in this crime; we are exactly, sirs, in the position which some Senators have asked us to occupy when you asked us to reject the treaty and make a separate peace with Germany, or pass a joint resolution declaring the war at an end. Where would Shantung be then?

The fact is, and we might as well face it very frankly, that we are confronted with the proposition that if we adopt these amendments the United States is out of the treaty entirely; that is the issue. I can not give my consent to the position that I am unwilling to make peace with Germany unless Shantung is restored to China. Other Senators may take that position if they choose; but I will not do so.

I must confess, Mr. President, that it seems to me some Senators are very inconsistent in the position they are taking with reference to these articles of the treaty. The Senator from Missouri made a most eloquent appeal concerning the duty of the United States to rignt this great international wrong, and, if I remember his language, he said the United States ought to use some "nerve" about it; and yet, if I recollect aright, the Senator is one of those who has steadily advocated—and I have been very much in agreement with him—that we ought not to interfere or meddle in quarrels in Europe.

Mr. REED rose.

Mr. LENROOT. Just a moment. If I remember aright, the Senator from Missouri voted for every one of the so-called Fall amendments, which were designed to prevent representation on the part of the United States on all the commissions provided for in the treaty with relation to boundaries in Europe and in connection with many other questions there, leaving to the countries in Europe perfect freedom to commit any international wrong that they might see fit to enter into without any protest or concern of the United States. Now I yield.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, just to get the matter right, if the Senator will permit me, I desire to say that I was not here when the Fall amendments were before the Senate.

Mr. LENROOT. Then I ask the Senator's pardon.

Mr. REED. But if I had been present, I was in favor of those amendments and would have voted for them. I simply make the statement for the sake of having the record complete; there is no difference in principle. But the Senator's statement of my position on this particular matter is a little inaccurate. I did not say that it was our duty to right the wrong of China in the sense the Senator puts it. I did say that it was our duty when we were making peace to try to right that wrong in the treaty, but not that we should interfere in such affairs hereafter. Now, mark you, the difference: We have here a peace treaty which requires affirmative action upon this question. Instead of taking that action so as to turn the citizens and property of China over to Japan, I am in favor of taking that action so that the citizens and property of China shall remain the property of China. That does not mean that I am trying to interfere in the affairs of Europe. I am trying to prevent this treaty being adopted as it is, and, as it is, it does interfere. So the Senator can not fairly state that I am in any contrary position. I want to keep out of the quarrels of other nations; I want to let them settle their own difficulties; but here we are making a treaty, and in the treaty we propose to deal with a certain subject. The question is, How shall we deal with it; shall we give this property to Japan or shall we try to have it retained by China?

Mr. LENROOT. I can not yield further, Mr. President.

Let us see just a moment as to whether the Senator is exactly accurate in the attempted distinction between the two positions.

He says that he wants to keep out of Europe. He says that if present he would have voted for all of the Fall amendments relating to boundaries growing out of this very war. By voting for the Fall amendments he would have said, "I want to have the United States have nothing to do with European affairs." Now, that is the position that I am taking with reference to Asia by this reservation. But the Senator, when it comes to Asia, takes an entirely contrary position. When it comes to Asia he says, "While I want the United States to keep out of Europe, I want the United States to dictate what shall be done in Asia"; and I say that is an inconsistent position. I think we ought to take the same position with reference to both, that we ought not to dictate to either; and if the United States is going to attempt to dictate boundaries, either in Asia or in Europe, it ought to be prepared to use the force that is necessary to defend the boundaries which it has dictated. That I am not willing to do, and neither do I think the Senator from Missouri is, and that is why I am not going to vote to dictate what shall be done with Shantung. I propose, however, that the United States keep out of that, not assenting to it, refusing to assent to it, leaving the United States free to take such action in the future with reference to that question as to it may seem just.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat, I think he did not quite state the difference between the effect of an amendment and the effect of a reservation. I am not going into an argument as to whether or not we ought to interfere in Shantung, although I draw a distinction between Asia, where we are an Asiatic power, holding the Philippines, and Europe, where we have no interests whatever; but my point is this:

Suppose we adopt this amendment. Either they would have to agree to that amendment, or we should not be parties to the treaty.

Mr. LENROOT. That is true.

Mr. LODGE. They would have to choose between us and Shantung.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; they would; and that leads me to say, Mr. President, that it seems to me it ought to be clear to every Senator in the present situation that the adoption of this amendment means the killing of the treaty, because it ought to be plain that Japan is not going to consent to the amendment, and the British Empire and France and Italy can not consent to the amendment without the consent of Japan. I want to say, Mr. President, as I have said before on this floor, that unless the United States is protected from many of the onerous obligations that this treaty imposes, I propose to vote for the rejection of the treaty; but I prefer to do it outright, with a vote against the treaty, than to vote for an amendment that in my judgment is sure to kill it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I only want to say a word and then I am going to move a recess, because there are several Senators who want to speak on this matter before a vote is taken.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator, before he calls for a recess, permit me just a word? I want to say it before we take a recess, in about two minutes.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to finish.

Mr. REED. I simply want to say this——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I rather object to being taken off the floor.

Mr. REED. Oh! I thought the Senator had yielded.

Mr. LODGE. No, Mr. President; but I will yield to the Senator in a moment. I wanted to say something in conclusion to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. LODGE. That is, that he never will see the day, and we never shall see the day, when Europe refuses to let the United States come into this treaty on any terms the United States says. Without the United States it is a house of cards, and we can dictate what we think right and honorable to-day if we choose; but when we are once snarled in the league we can not do it, so that it behooves us to move carefully.

I yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. I beg the Senator's pardon. A moment ago I thought he had made a motion with his hand for me to proceed.

All I want to say is this: The Senator from Wisconsin and I get along so well together, and he is so fair a man, that I do not want him to leave me, or try to leave me, in the position of taking contradictory positions.

Here is the great difference between the Fall amendments and this Shantung situation: In the Fall amendments we were dealing with European nations and with European peoples. We were dealing with our enemies and with our enemies' countries. The Shantung amendment is proposing to sanctify the looting of our ally, and to that ally we owe a very high duty. There is a distinction that warrants a difference of attitude.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, before the Senator from Massachusetts moves to take a recess, in reply to the able Senator from Wisconsin as to the apparent inconsistency of our voting for this amendment and then voting to defeat the entire treaty, I desire to say to him that in my humble way every possible vote that I can cast anywhere along the line in the hope of defeating it I am going to cast.

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, I do not question that.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD and as a public document for the use of the Senate a compilation of all reservations placed on all treaties hitherto by the Senate of the United States. I think Senators will find it useful for reference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Senate Document No. 135, Sixty-sixth Congress, first session.]

COMPILATION OF TREATY RESERVATIONS.

A compilation of all reservations placed in all treaties hitherto by the Senate.

Treaty of peace, amity, commerce, and navigation with Korea concluded May 22, 1882.

January 9, 1883: Reported by Mr. Windom.

On motion of Mr. Windom, and by unanimous consent,

The said treaty was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and, no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Mr. Windom submitted the following resolution for consideration:

"Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty of commerce and navigation between the United States and the Kingdom of Korea, or Chosen, concluded on the 22d of May, 1882.

"Resolved, That it is the understanding of the Senate, in agreeing to the foregoing resolution, that the clause 'Nor are they permitted to transport native produce from one open port to another open port,' in Article VI of said treaty, it is not intended to prohibit and does not prohibit American ships from going from one open port to another open port in Korea, or Chosen, to receive Korean cargo for exportation or to discharge foreign cargo; and

"Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate the foregoing interpretation of said clause to the Korean, or Chosen, Government on the exchange of ratifications of said treaty, as the sense in which the United States understand the same.

"Resolved further, That the Senate, in advising and consenting to the treaty mentioned in the foregoing resolutions, does not admit or acquiesce in any right or constitutional power in the President to authorize or empower any person to negotiate treaties or carry on diplomatic negotiations with any foreign power unless such person shall have been appointed for such purpose or clothed with such power by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, except in the case of the Secretary of State or diplomatic officer appointed by the President to fill a vacancy occurring during the recess of the Senate; and it makes the declaration in order that the means employed in the negotiation of said treaty be not drawn into precedent.

"Resolved, That the Secretary communicate all the foregoing resolutions to the President."

The Senate proceeded, by unanimous consent, to consider the said resolutions, and,

On the question to agree thereto,

It was determined in the affirmative, two-thirds of the Senators present having voted in the affirmative.

General act for the repression of African slave trade, signed July 2, 1890.

January 11, 1892: Mr. Sherman * * * reported it without amendment, accompanied by the following resolution:

"Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the general act signed at Brussels July 2, 1890, by the plenipotentiaries of the United States and other powers, for the suppression of the African slave trade, and for other purposes.

"Resolved further, That the Senate advise and consent to the acceptance of the partial ratification of the said general act on the part of the French Republic and to the stipulations relative thereto, as set forth in the protocol signed at Brussels January 2, 1892.

"Resolved further, as a part of this act of ratification, That the United States of America, having neither possessions nor protectorates in Africa, hereby disclaims any intention, in ratifying this treaty, to indicate any interest whatsoever in the possessions or protectorates established or claimed on that Continent by the other powers, or any approval of the wisdom, expediency, or lawfulness thereof, and does not join in any expressions in the said general act which might be construed as such a declaration or acknowledgment; and, for this reason, that it is desirable that a copy of this resolution be inserted in the protocol to be drawn up at the time of the exchange of ratifications of this treaty on the part of the United States."

On motion by Mr. SHERMAN, and by unanimous consent,

The said general act (having heretofore been read the second time) was considered as in Committee of the Whole and no amendment being made it was reported to the Senate; and

On the question to agree to the resolution reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations,

It was determined unanimously in the affirmative.

Ordered, That the Secretary lay the said resolution before the President of the United States.

Supplementary industrial convention concluded April 15, 1891.

March 8, 1892: Mr. Hiscock * * * reported the same without amendment, accompanied with the following resolution, viz:

"Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of protocols 3 and 4, signed at Madrid April 15, 1891, by the United States and other powers, amendatory to the convention of March 20, 1883, for the protection of industrial property, subject to the reservation of the plenipotentiary of the United States in the international conference for the protection of industrial property at Madrid, as follows:

"The share allotted to the United States to contribute to the dotation of the international bureau is not to be augmented until the Congress of the United States shall have approved the augmentation.

"That articles 3 and 4 of the fourth protocol shall not go beyond what shall be established by the legislation of the United States."

On motion by Mr. Hiscock and by unanimous consent,

The protocols were read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and no amendment being made thereto, they were reported to the Senate.

On the question to agree to the resolution reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations,

It was determined unanimously in the affirmative.

Ordered, That the Secretary lay the said resolution before the President of the United States.

Algeciras convention of 1906.

December 12, 1906: On motion by Mr. Cullom, the Senate proceeded to consider the same as in Committee of the Whole, and no amendment being proposed, it was reported to the Senate; and no amendment being proposed,

Mr. Cullom submitted the following resolution for consideration:

"Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the general act and an additional protocol, signed on April 7, 1906, by the delegates of the powers represented at the conference which met at Algeciras, Spain, to consider Moroccan affairs."

Which, by unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider.

Mr. Bacon reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations the following resolution:

"Resolved further, That the Senate, as a part of this act of ratification, understands that the participation of the United States in the Algeciras conference and in the formation and adoption of the general act and protocol which resulted therefrom, was with the sole purpose of preserving and increasing its commerce in Morocco, the protection as to life, liberty, and property of its citizens residing or traveling therein, and of aiding by its friendly offices and efforts in removing friction and controversy which seemed to menace the peace between powers signatory with the United States to the treaty of 1880, all of which are on terms of amity with this Government, and without purpose to depart from the traditional American foreign policy, which forbids participation by the United States in the settlement of political questions which are entirely European in their scope."

After discussion,

On motion by Mr. Hale that the resolution reported by Mr. Bacon be added as an amendment to the resolution of ratification,

It was determined in the affirmative.

On the question to agree to the resolution of ratification as amended, it was determined in the affirmative, two-thirds of the Senators present having voted in the affirmative. So the resolution as amended was agreed to.

Ordered, That the said resolution be laid before the President of the United States.

Convention for the settlement of international disputes signed at The Hague, 1907.

April 2, 1908: The Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the same, and no amendment being proposed,

After discussion,

It was reported to the Senate, and no amendment being proposed,

Mr. Carter submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent:

"Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of a convention signed by the delegates of the United States to the second international peace conference, held at The Hague from June 16 to October 18, 1907, for the pacific settlement of international disputes, subject to the declaration made by the delegates of the United States before signing said convention, namely:

"'Nothing contained in this convention shall be so construed as to require the United States of America to depart from its traditional policy of not intruding upon, interfering with, or entangling itself in the political questions of policy or internal administration of any foreign State, nor shall anything contained in the said convention be construed to imply a relinquishment by the United States of its traditional attitude toward purely American questions.'

"Resolved, further, as a part of this act of ratification, That the United States approves this convention with the understanding that recourse to the permanent court for the settlement of differences can be had only by agreement thereto through general or special treaties of arbitration heretofore or hereafter concluded between the parties in dispute; and the United States now exercises the option contained in article 53 of said convention, to exclude the formulation of the 'compromis' by the permanent court, and hereby excludes from the competence of the permanent court the power to frame the 'compromis' required by general or special treaties of arbitration concluded or hereafter to be concluded by the United States, and further expressly declares that the 'compromis' required by any treaty of arbitration to which the United States may be a party shall be settled only by agreement between the contracting parties, unless such treaty shall expressly provide otherwise."

On the question to agree to the said resolution,

It was determined in the affirmative, two-thirds of the Senators present having voted in the affirmative.

Ordered, That the Secretary lay the said resolution before the President of the United States.

Convention concluded at the second Hague peace conference held at The Hague, 1907, concerning the rights and duties of neutral powers in naval war.

April 17, 1908: On motion by Mr. Bacon, the Senate proceeded to consider the same as in Committee of the Whole, and no amendment being proposed, it was reported to the Senate; and no amendment being proposed,

Mr. Bacon submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and unanimously agreed to:

"Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the adherence of the United States to a convention adopted by the second international peace conference held at The Hague from June 15 to October 18, 1907, concerning the rights and duties of neutral powers in naval war, reserving and excluding, however, article 23 thereof, which is in the following words:

"'A neutral power may allow prizes to enter its ports and roadsteads, whether under convoy or not, when they are brought there to be sequestrated pending the decision of a prize court. It may have the prize taken to another of its ports.

"'If the prize is convoyed by a warship the prize crew may go on board the convoying ship.

"'If the prize is not under convoy the prize crew are left at liberty.'

"Resolved further, That the United States adheres to this convention with the understanding that the last clause of article 3 implies the duty of a neutral power to make the demand therein mentioned for the return of a ship captured within the neutral jurisdiction and no longer within that jurisdiction."

Ordered, That the Secretary lay the said resolution before the President of the United States.

Convention respecting the limitation of the employment of force for the recovery of contract debts signed at The Hague, 1907.

April 17, 1908: On motion by Mr. Carter, the Senate proceeded to consider the same as in Committee of the Whole.

And no amendment being proposed, it was reported to the Senate; and no amendment being proposed in the Senate,

Mr. Carter submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and unanimously agreed to:

"Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of a convention signed by the delegates of the United States to the second international peace conference held at The Hague from June 15 to October 18, 1907, respecting the limitation of the employment of force for the recovery of contract debts.

"Resolved further, As a part of this act of ratification, that the United States approves this convention with the understanding that recourse to the permanent court for the settlement of the differences referred to in said convention can be had only by agreement thereto through general or special treaties of arbitration heretofore or hereafter concluded between the parties in dispute."

Extradition convention with Portugal, signed May 7, 1908.

May 22, 1908: The Senate resumed consideration of the same as in Committee of the Whole, and, no amendment being proposed, it was reported to the Senate.

Mr. Carter submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and unanimously agreed to:

"Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of an extradition treaty between the United States and Portugal, signed at Washington on May 7, 1908.

"In giving this advice and consent to the ratification of the said treaty, and as a part of the act of ratification, the Senate understands that it is agreed by the United States that no person charged with crime shall be extraditable from Portugal upon whom the death penalty can be inflicted for the offense charged by the laws of the jurisdiction in which the charge is pending, and that this agreement on the part of the United States will be mentioned in the ratifications of the treaty and will, in effect, form part of the treaty."

Ordered, That the Secretary lay the said resolution before the President of the United States.

Ship canal treaty with Panama signed January 9, 1909.

March 3, 1909: On motion by Mr. Cullom, the Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to resume consideration of the same, and no amendment being proposed it was reported to the Senate; and no amendment being proposed in the Senate,

Mr. Cullom submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and unanimously agreed to:

"Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of a treaty between the United States and the Republic of Panama relating to the Panama Canal, signed January 9, 1909.

"Resolved as a part of this ratification, That the United States approves the treaty between the United States and Panama, with the understanding that so far as the United States is concerned no question shall be submitted to arbitration herein provided for which in any way affects the vital interests of the United States in the protection, operation, maintenance, sanitation, and protection of the Panama Canal."

Ordered, That the Secretary lay the said resolution before the President of the United States.

Agreement with Russia regulating the position of corporations and other commercial associations, signed June 25, 1904.

May 6, 1909: Reported favorably by Mr. Root:

On motion by Mr. Root, and by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the said agreement, and no amendment being proposed, it was reported to the Senate; and no amendment being proposed,

Mr. Root submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and unanimously agreed to:

"Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of an agreement (Ex. D, 58th, 3d) between the United States and Russia to regulate the position of corporations or stock companies and other commercial associations, signed at St. Petersburg on June 25, 1904.

"Resolved, That the Senate advises and consents to the ratification of the said agreement with the understanding that the regulations referred to in the third paragraph in the agreement as existing in the several countries refer to and include on the part of the United States the regulations established by and under the authority of the several States of the Union."

Arbitration treaty with Great Britain, signed August 3, 1911.

March 7, 1912 (in open executive session): The treaty was reported to the Senate, and the amendments recommended in the Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

Mr. LODGE offered the following substitute resolution of ratification:

"Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of a treaty signed by the plenipotentiaries of the United States and Great Britain on August 3, 1911, extending the scope and obligation of the policy of arbitration adopted in the present arbitration treaty of April 4, 1908, between the two countries, so as to exclude certain exceptions contained in that treaty and to provide means for the peaceful solution of all questions of difference which it shall be found impossible in future to settle by diplomacy, with the following amendments:

"On page 3, line 4, after the word 'tribunal,' insert a comma.

"In the same line strike out 'may' and insert in lieu thereof 'shall.'

"On page 4, strike out the paragraph commencing on line 28 and ending on line 35."

Mr. BACON. I offer as a substitute for the proviso the one I now send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia offers an amendment in the form of a substitute for the proviso, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the proviso insert:

"Provided, That the Senate advise and consents to the ratification of the said treaty with the understanding, to be made part of such ratification, that the treaty does not authorize the submission to arbitration of any question which affects the admission of aliens to the educational institutions of the several States, or the territorial integrity of the several States or of the United States, or concerning the question of the alleged indebtedness or moneyed obligation of any State of the United States, or any question which depends upon or involves the maintenance of the traditional attitude of the United States concerning American questions, commonly described as the Monroe doctrine, or other purely governmental policy."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia to the resolution of ratification.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and Mr. Bacon's amendment to Mr. LODGE's resolution was agreed to—yeas 46, nays 36, not voting 9.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution of ratification as amended.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary called the roll. The result was announced—yeas 76, nays 3, not voting 12.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the resolution as amended is adopted.

International wireless telegraph convention concluded July 5, 1912.

January 22, 1913: On motion by Mr. Root, the Senate proceeded to consider the same.

The convention was read the second time and considered in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment being proposed,

Was reported to the Senate.

The convention was considered in the Senate; and no amendment being proposed,

Mr. Root submitted the following resolution for consideration:

"Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the radiotelegraphic convention signed at London on July 5, 1912, with the final protocol and service regulations connected therewith: Provided, That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of said convention with the understanding to be expressed as a part of the instrument of ratification that nothing in the ninth article of the regulations affixed to the convention shall be deemed to exclude the United States from the execution of her inspection laws upon vessels entering or clearing from her ports."

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and unanimously agreed to.

Ordered, That the said resolution be transmitted forthwith to the President of the United States.

Convention signed at Paris on January 17, 1913, modifying the international sanitary convention of December 3, 1903.

February 19, 1913: On motion by Mr. LODGE, and by unanimous consent, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to the consideration of the said convention, and no amendment being proposed, it was reported to the Senate; and no amendment being proposed,

Mr. LODGE submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and unanimously agreed to:

"Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of a convention between the United States and other powers, signed at Paris on January 17, 1913, modifying the international sanitary convention of December 3, 1903: Provided, That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of said convention with the understanding, to be expressed as a part of the instrument of ratification, that nothing contained in article 9 thereof shall be deemed to prevent the United States from carrying out any special quarantine measures against the infection of its ports which might be demanded by unusual sanitary conditions."

Ordered, That the Secretary lay the said resolutions before the President of the United States.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I wish to give notice that to-morrow, at the convenience of the Senate, I shall submit some remarks on the pending Shantung amendment.

RECESS.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, October 16, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, October 15, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty and most merciful God, our Heavenly Father, we thank Thee for the gift of choice which Thou hast bestowed upon us and which lifts us infinitely above the brute creation and makes us indeed Thy children; yet we realize the awful responsibility it brings with it and we most earnestly pray for strength, that we may resist the temptations which are round about us and submit our will to Thy will. In the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution (S. J. Res. 112) continuing temporarily certain allowances to officers of the Navy and Marine Corps, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 3190) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Pocomoke River at Pocomoke, Md., in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 46) extending until July 1, 1920, the effective date of section 10 of an act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

SENATE BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill and joint resolution of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 3190. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Pocomoke River at Pocomoke City, Md.; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. J. Res. 46. Joint resolution extending until July 1, 1920, the effective date of section 10 of an act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 6810. An act to prohibit intoxicating beverages and to regulate the manufacture, production, use, and sale of high-proof spirits for other than beverage purposes, and to insure an ample supply of alcohol and promote its use in scientific research and in the development of fuel, dye, and other lawful industries;

H. R. 8986. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Paris-Hugo Bridge Co. to construct a bridge and approaches thereto across Red River, near Arthur City, Lamar County, Tex.; and

H. R. 7972. An act to improve the administration of the postal service in the Territory of Hawaii, in Porto Rico, and the Virgin Islands.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. DUNBAR was granted leave of absence for one day, on account of important business.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

The SPEAKER. To-day is Calendar Wednesday, and the Clerk will call the roll of committees.

The Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries was called.

ESTABLISHMENT OF LOAD LINES FOR CERTAIN VESSELS.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 3621.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan, on behalf of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, calls up the bill which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3621) to establish load lines for certain vessels.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I think under the rule the House automatically goes into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The bill is on the Union Calendar, and the House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 3621, with Mr. SNELL in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 3621, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3621) to establish load lines for certain vessels.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that the bill has not been read, may we have it reported in full?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill in full.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That this act shall apply to the following vessels:

(a) Cargo-carrying vessels of 500 gross tons or over loading at any port or place within the United States or its possessions for a foreign voyage by sea.

(b) Cargo-carrying vessels of the United States of 500 gross tons or over loading at any foreign port or place for a voyage by sea.

(c) Other vessels loading at any port or place in the United States or its possessions, whenever, in the judgment of the Secretary of Commerce, the safety of such vessels and their crews requires the establishment of a legal load line.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of Commerce is hereby authorized and directed in respect of the vessels defined in section 1 (a) and (b) of this act and is hereby authorized in respect of the vessels defined in section 13 (c) of this act to establish by regulations from time to time the load water lines and marks thereof indicating the maximum depth to which such vessels may safely be loaded. Such regulations shall have the force of law.

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the owner and of the master of every vessel subject to this act and to the regulations established thereunder, to cause the load line or lines so established to be permanently and conspicuously marked upon the vessel in such manner as the Secretary of Commerce shall direct, and to keep the same so marked. The Secretary of Commerce shall appoint the American Bureau of Shipping or such other corporation or association for the survey or registry of shipping as may be selected by him, to determine whether the position and manner of marking on such vessels the load line or lines so established are in accordance with the provisions of this act and of the regulations established thereunder: Provided, however, That, at the request of the shipowner, the Secretary of Commerce shall appoint, for the purpose aforesaid, any other corporation or association for the survey or registry of shipping which the shipowner may select and the Secretary of Commerce approve; or the Secretary of Commerce may appoint for said purpose any officer of the Government, who shall perform such services as may be directed by the Secretary of Commerce. The Secretary of Commerce may, in his discretion, revoke any appointment made pursuant to this section. Such corporation, association, or officer shall, upon approving the position and manner of marking such load line or lines, issue a certificate in a form to be prescribed by the Secretary of Commerce, that the same are in accordance with the provisions of this act and of the regulations established thereunder, and shall deliver a copy thereof to the master of the vessel. It shall be unlawful for any vessel subject to this act and to said regulations to depart from her loading port or place without bearing such mark or marks, approved and certified by such corporation, association, or officer, and without having on board a copy of said certificate.

SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any vessel subject to this act and to the regulations established thereunder to be so loaded as to submerge, in salt water, the load line or lines marked pursuant to this act and to the regulations established thereunder, applicable to her voyage; or so as to submerge under like conditions the point where such load line or lines ought to be marked pursuant to the provisions of this act and of the regulations established thereunder; or so as in any manner to violate the said regulations.

SEC. 5. That whenever the Secretary of Commerce shall certify that the laws and regulations in force in any foreign country relating to load lines are equally effective with the regulations established under this act, the Secretary of Commerce may direct, on proof that a vessel of that country has complied with such foreign laws and regulations, that such vessel and her master and owner shall be exempted from compliance with the provisions of this act, except as hereinafter provided: Provided, That this section shall not apply to the vessels of any foreign country which does not similarly recognize the load lines established under this act and the regulations made thereunder.

SEC. 6. That it shall be the duty of the master of every vessel subject to this act and to the regulations established thereunder and of every foreign vessel exempted pursuant to section 5 of this act, before departing from her loading port or place for a voyage by sea, to enter in the official log book of such vessel (if any) a statement of the position of the load-line mark applicable to the voyage in question with reference to the actual water line at the time of departing from port, as nearly as the same can be ascertained.

SEC. 7. That if any collector of customs has reason to believe, on complaint or otherwise, that a vessel subject to this act and to the regulations established thereunder is about to proceed to sea from a port in the United States or its possessions within his district, when loaded in violation of section 4 of this act; or that any vessel exempted pursuant to section 5 of this act is about to proceed to sea from such port, when loaded in violation of the laws and regulations of her country with respect to load line, he may by written order served on the master or officer in charge of such vessel detain her provisionally for the purpose of being surveyed. The collector shall then serve on the master a written statement of the grounds of her detention and shall appoint three disinterested surveyors to examine the vessel and her loading and to report to him; whereupon the said collector may release or may, by written order served on the master or officer in charge of such vessel, detain the vessel until she has been reloaded in whole or in part so as to conform to section 4 of this act, or, in case of a vessel exempted pursuant to section 5 of this act, so as to conform to the laws and regulations of her own country with respect to load line. If the vessel be ordered detained, the master may, within five days, appeal to the Secretary of Commerce, who may, if he desires, order a further survey and may affirm, set aside, or modify the order of the collector. Clearance shall be refused to any vessel which shall have been ordered detained.

SEC. 8. (a) That if the owner or master of any vessel subject to this act and to the regulations established thereunder shall permit her to depart from her loading port or place without having complied with the provisions of section 3 of this act, he shall for each offense be liable to the United States in a penalty of $500. If the owner or master of any vessel exempted pursuant to section 5 of this act shall permit her to depart from her loading port or place without having the load line or lines required by the laws and regulations of the country to which she belongs marked upon her as required by said laws and regulations, he shall for each offense be liable to the United States in a penalty of $500. The Secretary of Commerce may, in his discretion, remit or mitigate any penalty imposed under this paragraph.

(b) If the master of any vessel subject to this act and to the regulations established thereunder or of any foreign vessel exempted pursuant to section 5 of this act, shall fail, before departing from her loading port or place, to enter in the official log book of such vessel (if any) the statement required by section 6 of this act, he shall for each offense be liable to the United States in a penalty of $100. The Secretary of Commerce may in his discretion remit or mitigate any penalty imposed under this paragraph.

(c) If any person shall knowingly permit or cause or attempt to cause any vessel subject to this act and to the regulations established thereunder to depart, or if, being the owner, manager, agent, or master of such vessel he shall fail to take reasonable care to prevent her from departing from her loading port or place when loaded in violation of section 4 of this act; or if any person shall knowingly permit or cause or attempt to cause a foreign vessel exempted pursuant to section 5 of this act to depart, or if, being the owner, manager, agent, or master of such vessel he shall fail to take reasonable care to prevent her from departing from her loading port or place when loaded more deeply than permitted by the laws and regulations of the country to which she belongs, he shall in respect of each offense be guilty of a misdemeanor, unless her going to sea in such a condition was, under the circumstances, reasonable and justifiable; and shall be punished by a fine not to exceed $1,000 or by imprisonment not to exceed one year, or both, at the discretion of the court.

(d) If the master of any vessel or any other person shall knowingly permit or cause or attempt to cause any vessel to depart from any port or place in the United States or its possessions in violation of any order of detention made pursuant to section 7 of this act, he shall in respect of each offense be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be punished by a fine not to exceed $500 or by imprisonment not to exceed three months, or both, at the discretion of the court.

(e) If any person shall conceal, remove, alter, deface, or obliterate, or shall suffer any person under his control to conceal, remove, alter, deface, or obliterate any mark or marks placed on a vessel pursuant to this act or to the regulations established thereunder, except in the event of lawful change of said marks, or to prevent capture by an enemy, he shall, in respect of each offense, be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be punished by a fine not to exceed $1,000, or by imprisonment not to exceed one year, or both, in the discretion of the court.

(f) Whenever the owner, manager, agent, or master of a vessel shall become subject to a fine or penalty by way of money payment pursuant to the provisions of this act, the vessel shall also be liable therefor, and may be seized and proceeded against in the district court of the United States in any district in which such vessel shall be found.

SEC. 9. That this act shall take effect six months after the date of its approval or at such earlier time as the Secretary of Commerce may fix.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I would like to submit a request for unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks on the subject on which I spoke yesterday.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks on the subject on which he spoke yesterday. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Under the rules there are two hours for general debate. Who is to control the time?

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I would ask that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] ask for recognition at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there anybody on the committee opposed to the bill?

Mr. SCOTT. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the time will be controlled one-half by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SCOTT] and one-half by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER].

Mr. SCOTT. I ask that the gentleman from Missouri be recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for one hour.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this is a bill to establish a load line on certain vessels. The hearings on the bill were very full and complete, and the bill comes before the House with a unanimous report by the committee. Section 1 of the bill applies to the following vessels: (a) Cargo-carrying vessels of the United States and vessels under foreign flags of 500 gross tons or over loading at any port or place within the United States or its possessions for a foreign voyage; (b) cargo-carrying vessels of the United States of 500 gross tons or over loading at any foreign port or place for a voyage by sea. We have always claimed the right to inspect and determine whether or not a vessel departing from a port in the United States was seaworthy. Hence the first subdivision (a) applies not only to vessels of the United States but to foreign vessels departing from ports of the United States—that is, cargo vessels; (b) applies to cargo vessels of the United States departing from any port, domestic or foreign, and enforces against that vessel the provisions of this act.

We would not have jurisdiction to enforce the provisions (b) and regulations thereunder against foreign vessels departing from any other ports than ports of the United States, but the bill applies to all vessels of the United States, whether they are departing from ports of the United States or from some foreign port, provided they are of 500 tons or over.

Section 1, subdivision (c), applies to other vessels of less than 500 gross tons loading at any port or place in the United States or its possessions whenever in the judgment of the Secretary of Commerce the safety of such vessels and their crews requires the establishment of a legal load line. This subdivision (c) would apply, of course, to vessels not only in our coastwise trade, but in our foreign trade, if less than 500 gross tons. It is not intended at this time, nor is it made mandatory on the Secretary of Commerce at once, to enforce the provisions of this bill against vessels of less than 500 gross tons, whether those vessels are engaged in the coastwise or foreign trade.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Subsection (c), as I understand it—and I ask to be corrected if I am in error—applies to vessels of less than 500 tons and also applies to both vessels of American register and vessels of foreign register?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I wanted to ask that to be sure.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Now, section 2 provides as to vessels defined in paragraphs (a) and (b) that the Secretary of Commerce is authorized and directed, and in respect to vessels defined in paragraph (c) the Secretary of Commerce is authorized to establish by regulation from time to time the load water lines and marks thereof indicating the maximum depth to which such vessels may safely be loaded. Such regulations shall have the force of law. Now, it will be noticed that paragraphs (a) and (b), section 1, apply alike to vessels of the United States and foreign vessels of 500 tons gross or over loading at American ports for foreign ports and are mandatory, while paragraph (c) applies to vessels of the United States of less than 500 tons gross engaged in the coastwise trade and to vessels of the United States and foreign vessels of less than 500 tons gross engaged in the foreign trade and is directory. In other words, it is left to the discretion of the Secretary of Commerce to determine when the provisions of paragraph (c) shall go into effect.

It will take some time to get this system into actual operation. The Secretary of Commerce is authorized and directed, in the first instance, to apply the law and the regulations established thereunder to vessels of 500 gross tons or over in the foreign trade and later to vessels of less than 500 gross tons in the coastwise or foreign trade. Now, this bill applies alone to vessels of the United States and foreign vessels loading at any port or place within the United States or its possessions for a foreign voyage by sea and to our own vessels without reference to what ports, whether a home port or a foreign port, those vessels may depart from.

For years past an effort has been made to secure an international conference composed of the maritime nations of the world to agree upon or to formulate a convention to determine and make uniform load lines for vessels. And that will be done sometime. Arrangements were well under way for such a conference when the war broke out, and it is desirable that it should be so. In my judgment that is the only way to treat the subject in a comprehensive manner. But in the meantime and with a view of making this law effective and that its terms may be equitable as between our vessels and foreign vessels, section 5 of the bill provides:

That whenever the Secretary of Commerce shall certify that the laws and regulations in force in any foreign country relating to load lines are equally effective with the regulations established under this act the Secretary of Commerce may direct, on proof that a vessel of that country has complied with such foreign laws and regulations, that such vessel and her master and owner shall be exempted from compliance with the provisions of this act, except as hereinafter provided: Provided, That this section shall not apply to the vessels of any foreign country which does not similarly recognize the load lines established under this act and the regulations made thereunder.

In other words, section 5 provides that we shall recognize the load lines established by foreign nations substantially the same as our own load lines if they in turn recognize the load lines established by us and applicable to our ships.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. In just a moment.

Now, Great Britain, France, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, and Germany—in fact, most of the maritime nations—have load-line laws, although some do not; and for that reason section 5 of the bill provides that where the nations have load-line laws, and those laws are similar to our own, we will respect their laws fixing load lines on their vessels coming into and departing from our ports if they recognize the load water lines marked on our vessels that may enter or clear from their ports.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Under this section, does the Secretary of Commerce recognize the lines that are placed on our own ships, or would those foreign laws apply to markings on foreign ships? It says, "any vessel." I presume, if we have authority in this country to regulate the loading of foreign vessels in our ports, they might perhaps have authority in other countries to regulate the loading of our vessels in their ports. Would this section permit that?

Mr. ALEXANDER. If they recognize the load water lines we place on our ships when our ships go into their ports, we will recognize the load lines fixed by them on their ships if and when they enter and clear from our ports.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I was thinking, however, that this section might permit the foreign authorities to fix load lines on our ships when in their ports.

Mr. ALEXANDER. No; I think not. In the absence of an international agreement they might undertake to do so, and, in turn, we might undertake to enforce our load-line law upon them, but section 5 provides for the reciprocal recognition of load lines. If the gentleman will take pains to read the report of the committee, he will find that we have set out the provisions of the British load-line law and regulations, and he will observe that this bill follows very closely the British load-line laws. The load-line laws of the maritime nations will be in a large measure uniform, but they do not have the force of an international agreement, and for that reason, and in view of the expansion of our American merchant marine, it will be important to have the load lines on vessels leaving our ports fixed by our law until they can be fixed by international agreement.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. On page 2, line 7, it says "such regulations shall have the force of law." Why is that?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Because this bill does not set out the regulations. It does not state to what depth a vessel may be loaded. It is not practicable to do so. The regulations must work out scientifically and apply to vessels of different types and different tonnage and in different trades and for different seasons of the year, but when they are once formulated and promulgated by the Secretary of Commerce they shall have the force of law.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. The reason I ask is this: They ascertain after due inquiry and examination that the mark shall be placed at a certain point on the vessel. Now, can we provide when that mark is so established that the owner of the vessel shall not load beyond that mark? I was wondering if there was not some danger, by putting in such a regulation as having the force of law, of that being a delegation of legislative authority. Of course, we can authorize any agency to establish a marking and then say the owner must not load beyond that mark, and Congress would still be legislating, but if you put this in that "such regulations shall have the force of law," I fancy it does not add anything. I would like to have the gentleman's opinion on the subject. I have no convictions on it, but I was wondering if that was not a hazardous or unnecessary thing to do.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The most important thing is to frame the rules under which the load lines shall be placed on the vessel. Hence when that is once done it should have the force of law, because after having been once formulated it is made mandatory on the captain or vessel owner to place that load line on the vessel, indicating how deep she may be loaded. And if he fails to do that, if he fails to put the mark on the vessel, or if he obliterates the mark, or if he overloads, in either one of those events he is subject to the penalty prescribed in the bill. But the most important matter, and the one that involves the scientific or technical investigation, is to formulate the rules and to determine where that load line should be placed, and that must be provided in the rules or regulations.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Well, nothing in this act, as I see it, would be changed at all if these words were stricken out. The owner is still required to do the things that he is directed to do by the Secretary of Commerce touching this mark. He has to establish that mark, and he can not exceed it.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Before the mark is established it must be made in pursuance to some rule, and that rule must have the force of law, or else he may question the authority of the Secretary of Commerce to determine where that load-line mark shall be.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. How can he question that if we provide here that he shall be punished if he does not do it?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I think that Congress has full authority to authorize the department to make the regulations for carrying out the purposes of this act, and that being so, the regulations which the department promulgates have the force of law. In that state of facts I can not see any harm in stating in the bill what is in fact in it, that the regulations do have the force of law. That is the way it lies in my mind.

Mr. ALEXANDER. We rarely pass a bill through this House that does not contain such a provision as this, so far as that is concerned, that the rules and regulations made to carry the law into effect shall have the force of law. That is true not only with reference to our revenue laws and vessel-inspection laws but many other laws I might cite.

Mr. CLEARY. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CLEARY. The object and purpose of this legislation is to promote the safety of life and property?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes; that is true.

Mr. CLEARY. Then, does not the gentleman think that lumber ought to be exempted, because a boat load of lumber can not sink? Some of the men carrying lumber up from the south or around to the Pacific perhaps would like to load more deeply than the general regulations would provide. I know that a boat load of lumber is in no danger, because the lumber itself sustains it. I was thinking that perhaps it might be well to have a provision to the effect that it should not apply to lumber. I do not see any sense in making it apply to lumber. A raft will not sink.

Mr. ALEXANDER. We leave that to the regulations in the department. Of course, the load line on different ships or vessels will be different and will depend upon the cargo and upon the trade in which the vessel is engaged, and whether it is in the summer or in the winter, or in the North Atlantic or in the South Atlantic. Hence these regulations must be very elastic.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. SCOTT. I suggest to the gentleman, in reply to the inquiry of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CLEARY], that it would be humanly impossible to legislate and prescribe as to the character of the ship that could be marked in consequence of its load. To explain: There might be a certain cargo of lumber on a ship which would not float. I see the gentleman from New York smiling. There are many instances of lumber and logs that will not float.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. They will pretty nearly float.

Mr. SCOTT. Yes; they will pretty nearly float. But it is necessary to dog them; it is necessary to dog every one of the logs in order to keep them on the surface; so that it would be impossible to legislate on the cargo that is to be carried in many particular instances.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think that is true. But we must not lose sight of the purpose of this legislation, which is to promote the safety of the crews on cargo vessels. I think the records of the Coast Guard Service will show that most of the derelicts in the North Atlantic which menace navigation are water-logged lumber vessels that have been overloaded; that is, they are still floating and were not entirely submerged, but they were overloaded and have partially sunk and are floating around. They were not seaworthy, and in a storm were wrecked and the crew lost, if not rescued by some passing ship. They are a menace to navigation. Not infrequently have they caused the wreck of other vessels. And there is no reason why the crew on a lumber vessel should not be protected as well as the crew on any other vessel.

Now, as the gentleman from New York says, this law is intended to protect the crews of ships. He is right. That is the purpose, and we should not lose sight of that purpose. Some captains and vessel owners are so greedy of gain that they overload their ships. Every additional ton carried means additional freight money, and they do not have the proper regard for human life. The purpose of this law is to provide by law how deeply a vessel may be loaded, having regard to the safety of the crew.

Again, if this law were to apply to one class of vessels and not to another, the conscientious captain or owner who stands ready and willing to comply with the law, out of regard for his crew, would be prejudiced by the unscrupulous vessel owner who would load his vessel down beyond the limit of safety in order to increase his profits. Hence this legislation has a two-fold purpose: First, the safety of the crew, and, second, to prevent unfair competition—to protect the upright vessel owner against the unscrupulous vessel owner.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes, with pleasure.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. In further answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CLEARY], the very first section of the bill limits the application of the bill to three kinds of vessels: First, cargo-carrying vessels loading at a port within the United States or its possessions for a foreign voyage by sea; secondly, cargo-carrying vessels of the United States loading at a foreign port; and, thirdly, it provides that other vessels loading at any port of the United States may be subject to the provisions of this law whenever in the judgment of the Secretary of Commerce the safety of such vessels requires it. So that it is left entirely with the discretion of the Secretary of Commerce whether a vessel not loaded for the foreign trade or at a foreign port shall require the establishing of a load line. It seems to me that covers the inquiry completely and entirely.

Mr. CLEARY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CLEARY. Of course, a vessel loaded with yellow pine or white pine, or any kind of pine or spruce, could not sink and could not endanger the life of the crew. You could not get any better life protector than a load of such logs. I was thinking that wherever it was seemingly unnecessary to establish regulations you only hinder trade instead of helping it by establishing them. Now, a boat loaded with pig iron or any other substance of that kind goes down very quickly and is dangerous, and I admit that there are certain kinds of lumber, such as mahogany logs and logs of that character, which would readily sink; but as to spruce and pine lumber there would be no danger. I know that any kind of a boat loaded with such lumber is in no danger, either to the cargo or the crew. According to the chairman's remarks it might endanger others. Of course, that might be true in the instance of derelicts, but there is no danger to the cargo or to the crew in a load of pine or spruce lumber, and in the case of anything to which you do not have to apply regulations you ought not to apply them, because it is bothersome and it brings about unnecessary trouble to the men who engage in that hazardous kind of business.

Mr. ALEXANDER. We assume that this law will be administered in the light of what the gentleman says, but with due regard to the safety of the crew of the vessel.

Now, just a moment more. Mr. E. T. Chamberlain, Commissioner of Navigation of the Department of Commerce; Mr. John A. Donald, commissioner, United States Shipping Board, who has had large and varied experience in the shipping business; Stephenson Taylor, commander in the United States Naval Reserve Corps and president of the American Bureau of Shipping; Capt. Charles McAllister, vice president of the American Bureau of Shipping; and Mr. Hendon Chubb, of New York, representing the American Institute of Marine Underwriters—during the war Mr. Chubb was director of insurance of the United States Shipping Board—all these gentlemen appeared before the committee and urged the passage of this bill. No one appeared in opposition to it. As I have stated, it comes from the committee with a unanimous report in its favor. It applies primarily to vessels engaged in the foreign trade. On September 1 we had 2,884 seagoing ships of 1,000 gross tons or over, making a total of 8,554,714 gross tons. Of those in the foreign trade on June 1 there were about 2,300 ships, making a total of 6,300,000 gross tons. Of these about 2,200 were cargo ships, and of the 2,200 ships about 1,377, of 4,938,000 gross tons, or about 60 per cent, belonged to the Shipping Board.

Before the war we had very few ships engaged in the foreign trade, and hence this legislation was not important; but now we have a large and increasing American merchant marine in the overseas trade, and it is important that we enact this legislation.

This bill, H. R. 3621, is identical in its provisions with the bill S. 575, reported to the Senate October 6, 1919, and therefore has the approval of Hon. William C. Redfield, Secretary of Commerce, as will be noted by the following letter addressed to Senator DUNCAN U. FLETCHER and referring to S. 575:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, May 28, 1919.

DEAR SENATOR FLETCHER: I have received your letter of the 26th instant, inclosing copy of S. 575, a bill to establish load lines for certain vessels, with request that I furnish your committee with such suggestions as I may deem proper touching the merits of the bill and the propriety of its passage.

I have to recommend the passage of this bill for the following reasons:

The purpose of the bill is to establish load-line regulations in the simplest and most practical form, which may be applied promptly without interfering with the prompt dispatch of ships.

Before the war preliminary arrangements had been made for an international maritime conference to consider uniform national regulation of load lines and other matters relating to cargo ships in the same manner as questions relating to passenger ships had been considered by the London international conference of 1913–14 on safety of life at sea.

The conference was necessarily delayed. At that time the United States had very few seagoing cargo ships, but for the past two years our shipyards have built cargo ships almost exclusively, and for the past 80 days we have been completing such ships faster than they were being built by the whole world before the war.

The bill, except in special cases, is limited in application to seagoing vessels of 500 gross tons or over, because the need of regulation is greater in the case of larger ships and because the administrative machinery will operate more successfully and promptly if not embarrassed by special problems raised by small ships of varying types and trades. On May 1 there were 1,513 American documented seagoing steam and gasoline vessels of 1,000 gross tons or over, aggregating 5,880,750 gross tons, and 320 sail vessels of that size aggregating 520,501 gross tons; in all, 1,833 seagoing vessels of 6,401,251 gross tons, and the output is now increasing at the rate of nearly 300,000 gross tons a month. Nearly all of these ships, including many formerly engaged in domestic trade, are now engaged in the foreign trade, and the application of the bill is limited to the foreign trade on salt water. Fresh-water load-line regulations for obvious reasons must differ from salt-water regulations, and the department deems it wise at this time to undertake the preparation of salt-water rules only.

The administrative machinery proposed by the third section is similar to that which has been in successful operation in the United Kingdom for some years. The American Bureau of Shipping occupies, in respect of American ships, a position analogous to that of Lloyd's Register to British ships, the Bureau Veritas to French ships, and other classification societies toward the ships of other civilized maritime powers, respectively. The bill will enable the Department of Commerce to make use of the American Bureau of Shipping and will incidentally aid in establishing the American classification society. At the same time it enables the department to avail itself of the survey officers of Lloyd's registry, who have cordially cooperated with the department during the war in the solution of load-line difficulties, and of the survey officers of the Bureau Veritas, the French organization, who have at all times been willing to cooperate.

The aim of the fifth section is to bring about temporary substantial accord in load-line regulations among civilized maritime powers until by international conference and agreement later they must establish such similarity, which is necessary, of course, to competition on terms of equality in this important matter.

Respectfully,

WILLIAM C. REDFIELD, Secretary.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

The following letter, approving the enactment of load-line legislation and referring specifically to H. R. 3621 and approving same, was inserted in the hearings on the bill by Hon. WILLIAM S. GREENE, chairman:

AMERICAN BUREAU OF SHIPPING,
New York, July 29, 1919.

Hon. WILLIAM S. GREENE,
Chairman Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: During my hearing before the subcommittee on marine insurance, on the 16th instant, Mr. EDMONDS suggested, in the course of the investigation, that he would be pleased to have the views of this bureau concerning the advisability and importance of the enactment of load-line legislation. I therefore take pleasure in submitting the following comments thereon for the consideration of your committee:

It is quite surprising that this country has not long ago had laws governing this important factor in the operation of its merchant ships. This, however, is largely attributable to the general apathy concerning merchant marine affairs and to the logical sequence of our having but few merchant vessels in the foreign trade. Now conditions have so decidedly changed for the better the matter of load-line fixing becomes one of the most important items of pending legislation.

It is needless to go into the history of load-line fixing or to its vital necessity in the interests of the safety of the lives of passengers and crews, as well as of the cargoes and vessels themselves, as it will suffice to state for present purposes that all great maritime nations have recognized this obligation to their peoples, with the sole exception of our own country.

Prior to our entrance into the war the Secretary of Commerce, having cognizance of such matters, made earnest efforts through a conference of shipbuilders and others affected to crystallize the recognized sentiment as to the necessity of immediate action. The writer was the chairman of a committee appointed at that conference, and will here state that the consensus of opinion was then, as now, that legislation should be enacted at the earliest possible time to provide a legalized American load water line before an international committee was convened on the subject, as recommended at the international conference on safety of life at sea, held at London in 1913–14. This would put the participation of the United States in such an international committee on a much stronger basis than if, as at present, when no governmental rules for the fixing of load lines are provided by law.

The bill, H. R. 3621, introduced by Representative ALEXANDER, and now pending before your committee, will, so far as legislation is concerned, admirably answer the demands at the present time. This bill is essentially the same as was introduced in the last Congress by Senator FLETCHER in the Senate and by Representative ALEXANDER in the House. In approving that bill the Secretary of Commerce said in his letter of October 19, 1918:

"The American Bureau of Shipping occupies in respect to American ships a position analogous to Lloyd's Register of Shipping to British ships, the Bureau Veritas to French ships, and other classification societies toward the ships of other civilized maritime powers, respectively. The bill will enable the Department of Commerce to make use of the American Bureau of Shipping and will incidentally aid in establishing the American Classification Society."

The above quotation quite clearly points out the direct interest this society has in the pending measure. The designation of this bureau to act on behalf of the Department of Commerce is in keeping with that portion of the British merchant shipping act which directs the board of trade to appoint Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Shipping to act in a similar capacity for British vessels.

Your attention is particularly invited to section 5 of the Alexander bill, which provides reciprocal relation with foreign countries concerning mutual acceptance of load-line fixing. The vital necessity for this section and for expediency in the passage of the entire bill may best be illustrated by a concrete example furnished by Admiral Bowles, formerly of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, in correspondence which he had with a foreign classification society concerning the marking of load lines of the ships built by the American International Corporation. Copies of this correspondence were furnished officially to Senator RANSDELL, of the Senate Committee on Commerce, and are appended hereto for the information of your committee in considering this proposed load-line legislation.

Briefly you will note that the direct statement is made that it would be of no use for an American classification society to fix load lines on the Hog Island ships, as they would not be recognized abroad; the only alternative suggested was to have the classification society of one of our leading maritime competitors attend to this very important function for us. I am sure that you, as well as the other members of your committee, will agree with the sentiment so tersely expressed by Admiral Bowles that "this is an intolerable situation."

I feel quite sure that your committee will recognize the importance of passing this bill at the earliest opportunity, and on behalf of this bureau I will state that the proposed legislation meets with its hearty approval, and further that so far as our participation as outlined in the bill is concerned, we have the technical talent and resources necessary for a prompt compliance with the law as soon as it may be enacted.

Very truly, yours,

STEVENSON TAYLOR, President.

At the hearings on the bill H. R. 3621 Mr. Hendon Chubb stated that the American Institute of Marine Underwriters of the United States, which is made up entirely of people representing American companies, passed the following resolution at their meeting on September 15, 1910:

The association desires to express its approval of the provisions for fixing load lines and freeboard, as provided for in H. R. 3621 (Alexander bill), and hope that they may be enacted into law.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SCOTT] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. SCOTT. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Hawaii [Mr. KALANIANAOLE].

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. Mr. Speaker, I wish in my own time to read into the RECORD a statement in correction of a statement made by one of the Members of the Senate in Washington, October 12:

DENIES JAP SUGAR PURCHASE—ATTORNEY FOR HAWAIIAN PLANTERS ISSUES STATEMENT.

WASHINGTON, October 12.

Judge Sidney Ballou, attorney for the Hawaiian Sugar Planters' Association, in a statement here to-day, denied that next year's Hawaiian sugar crop had been sold to Japanese interests, as stated by Senator SMOOT, of Utah, yesterday during the course of debate in the Senate on the sugar shortage.

"The entire Hawaiian crop," said Judge Ballou's statement, "has been sold to two sugar refineries in California—the California & Hawaiian and the Western. It will be refined on the Pacific coast and distributed to American consumers. No sale to the Japanese has ever been contemplated. The Hawaiian planters would consider it an act of disloyalty to divert their supplies from their own country in time of need, and there is nothing in their record of unswerving support of the Food Administration during the war which would justify the circulation of such a report."

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The article which the gentleman has read refers to the crop of next year as not having been sold. What about the crop of this year, 1919?

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. It has been sold.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The article that the gentleman read referred to next year's crop?

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. At what time in the year is the crop harvested in the islands?

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. Usually between January and August.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Is it true that the cane grows there all the time, in all seasons of the year about alike, and that the making of the sugar goes on at all times?

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. Yes; the cane grows the year around, but the manufacture of sugar only takes place during the cutting and grinding season, which is about eight months of the year. The plant crop of cane takes from 16 to 18 months to mature.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. There is some sugar produced every year, is there not?

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Is that true as to all the cane fields?

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. They all run the same?

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. They all run more or less the same.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Does that mean also that there will be no production of sugar from the islands this year?

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. No. It takes 18 months for a plant crop to mature, but the rattoon crop is harvested yearly.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. So that there will be a crop this year as well as next year?

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. What has become of the crop of this year—the crop of cane cut and made into sugar in the year 1919?

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. That crop was sold in the United States, as usual; a portion, I believe, going to the refineries on the Atlantic coast and the balance was sold to the refineries on the Pacific coast, and none, to my knowledge, was ever sold to the Japanese Government.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The gentleman will understand that I am asking this question because the article that he has read speaks of the crop of next year, and I was perhaps laboring under a misapprehension that that would be the crop of sugar made in 1920.

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. You are correct; the sugar manufactured next year would be termed the 1920 crop. I assume the reason Mr. Ballou did not specifically refer to the 1919 crop was because that crop was handled by the Sugar Equalization Board. The point I desire to make is that no sugar of either crop has been sold to the Japanese Government.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I thank the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Hawaii has expired.

Mr. SCOTT. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I have always been very much interested in an American merchant marine, and I have hoped to see the day when the American flag would fly in all foreign ports and we would have a merchant marine worthy of our country. I have taken some pains to follow the course of procedure of other nations, and I have never been able to satisfy myself that we could pay our seamen $75 or $80 or $100 a month, and pay twice as much for the manufacture and construction of our ships, and still operate them in competition with those of foreign nations. I am satisfied that the ship which will do it the cheapest will carry the cargo. Now, we can not deny that a good many of the foreign laborers who work on foreign ships work for about $25 a month, or for a third or a half what our men get. We have constructed a large number of ships for war emergency, which we now have on hand. Even if our men, with their skill, are able to operate our boats more successfully than those of foreign nations, still every other nation engaged in the transoceanic mail service or in the foreign shipping trade has subsidized its vessels. As far as I have observed, there is only one way to meet competition; and unpopular as the subsidy is, if we are going to get this foreign trade and build up an American merchant marine, there is only one way to do it, and that is to meet other nations upon an even footing and operate our ships the same as other nations operate them. Then we will get our share of this trade. Every one of us is in favor of forming closer relations with the nations of the Western Hemisphere, and I am in favor of a league of nations of the Western Hemisphere; but outside of that I do not want to commit myself without clear and strong American reservations.

In this Western Hemisphere I am for building up a merchant marine that will obtain its share of the trade with the western nations in competition with any other nation on earth. I am looking forward to the day when we will establish closer relations with Mexico. It occurs to me that anything that can be done to facilitate our carrying trade should be done. So I am strongly in favor of the American merchant marine.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will.

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman a little while ago got up to the point, but did not say that he was in favor of a subsidy. I would like to ask the gentleman if he favors a subsidy?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I favor a subsidy if it is necessary to establish a merchant marine. There is not a man who has explained how against other nations granting subsidies our ships, without a subsidy, can enter into successful competition with them. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York if, in his opinion, we can operate our ships without a subsidy?

Mr. SNYDER. I do not think we can. I favor a subsidy, and I only wanted to find out whether the gentleman from Michigan did.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. How did Germany develop her great merchant marine? She did not pay a subsidy except to the southeastern African trade.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. My information is—I may be wrong—that they did grant a subsidy.

Mr. SNYDER. I can tell the gentleman from Missouri what they did; they made a freight rate so advantageous to the merchant marine that they did not need a subsidy.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; they shipped all their domestic merchandise to the coast without any expense to the shipowners.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS].

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of this bill, and I also agree with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] in his remarks about the bill. I wish to go a little further and call to your attention that on September 25, 26, and 27 the subcommittee of the Merchant Marine Committee on marine insurance had hearings, and the presidents of a great many large marine insurance companies testified before it. At the opening of the session they presented a brief in connection with the marine insurance in this country, and in the last paragraph they say:

This association also desires to express its approval of the provisions for fixing load lines and free board, as provided in H. R. 3621 (Alexander bill), and hope that they may be enacted into law.

Of course, I suppose you will ask what insurance has to do with the load line, but you can very well realize that with a load line on a vessel that you do not see when you insure has considerable effect on the rate, providing you know the man that owns the ship. An unscrupulous man would overload the ship, where a careful man will see that it is loaded carefully. If the bill is passed, it will equalize the load line of all ships, and therefore the insurance man who can not see the property he is insuring will be safeguarded in making rates that would probably be to the advantage of the American merchant marine insurers.

Following that out the committee asked a number of questions of the insurance men appearing before them. Mr. McGee, of W. H. McGee & Co., representing 10 or 12 large marine insurance companies in this country, said:

We intended to recommend, I think, that a load line would be advisable not only for coastwise, not only for deep sea but for coastwise, but that entirely different rules or lines would be used for each. The present British Board of Trade's load line is a flexible thing. The disk which they paint on the side of a ship when they fix the load line has several different marks in it. The ship may load to one line for one class of trade and at one season of the year; at another season of the year, or in another trade, she must do something else.

Further on he said:

I have had, within the past two or three days, my attention drawn to a case of a schooner, an old American schooner that has been sold to French owners, loading hard pine in Providence, I am told, and as I hear it she is loaded down to within 1 inch of her scuppers, and she has a deck load they think is within a foot of the water line; the top of the deck load is down to 1 foot of the water. Perhaps you have heard of that case.

Questioning him further, he said that that would have considerable effect on the insurance rates, because if she met bad weather she would have to throw a deck load overboard.

Further along, Mr. Parsons, of the Atlantic Mutual Insurance Co., made this statement:

I think it is a very important measure and that a determination of the load-water line on vessels of American registry is very necessary and should be adopted at once.

I asked him the question who would be the proper party to establish a load line and take care of it. He answered:

Some recognized classification society, such as the American Bureau of Shipping. There is an organization now that tends to regulate the loading of vessels in the port of New York—the Board of Underwriters of New York; but there is no plimsoll line mark, of course, upon steamers, and they go by their own rules for loading. That, of course, is a great safeguard for many of the vessels loading from this port, but there is no law which makes it necessary for the vessels to be loaded under the supervision of the Board of Underwriters of New York.

Mr. Chubb, one of the largest marine insurance men in the country, who, with his brother, is the head of the Federal Insurance Co., said:

Well, I think there should be load water-line legislation, and I think that load water-line legislation should be so drawn as not only to have regard to the enforcement of our law but also reciprocal arrangements with other countries. There is a bill now before you, which I had some part in drawing, because the Shipping Board asked me to go into it after the bill was first introduced by the Department of Commerce, and in the bill now before you, I had a great deal to do with it. I consulted with the Department of Commerce on behalf of the Shipping Board, and I believe that contains all the features necessary for reciprocal action.

Mr. Chubb, who gave up his business through the war and attended to the shipping insurance of the Shipping Board, also had a hand in the insurance of the War Risk Insurance Bureau. Mr. Chubb rendered a very patriotic service and a very successful service, as the investigation we made shows that the Government saved a great deal of money by the operation of these bureaus.

You will notice that he speaks of the reciprocal relation. It is absolutely necessary in order to make this load line a success that our Department of State arrange to have a recognition of the load line by other countries. All of the other countries have a load line, I think, with the exception of Japan, and I understand that Japan is now considering a bill in its Parliament for its establishment. All these other nations have recognized each others' load lines. This bill will force a recognition of our load line by other nations, and therefore we will be in the same position that every other nation is in this connection.

Mr. CLEARY. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. EDMONDS. I yield.

Mr. CLEARY. I notice in the hearings that insurance people were heard. Have the vessel owners, the captains, been heard?

Mr. EDMONDS. I would ask Mr. SCOTT to answer that question, because I was not on the subcommittee.

Mr. CLEARY. The reason I mention that is because I know that the insurance men are all for anything that makes it almost impossible to have any loss. That is their business. If they can make it less dangerous, of course, that is to their interest; but in the meantime you have to consider that the vessel should be permitted to load almost as much as possible in order to overcome the situation which the other gentleman just spoke about—that is, the difficulty of competition—and if you put the load line too low down, give too much freeboard, you hinder the vessel from carrying a proper cargo, because the last foot of the vessel will carry very much more than any other foot, because the vessel widens out.

Mr. EDMONDS. In connection with the insurance end of the line, I will answer that by saying that if we expect to become a large marine underwriting country, as we should with our commanding position to-day in the finances of the world, we have to be prepared to take ships to any portion of the world at any time. If a man is loading an American ship with coffee in Brazil, to go to Italy, if we have a load line, the insurance men know exactly how that ship will be loaded and whether it will be loaded safely, and they can make a rate. I would like to say that the insurance companies are preparing to do a world-wide business in insurance. They are going to try to retain more than one-third of the marine insurance business of this country in this country, and I think we ought to do everything we can to help them along. I think any gentleman will realize that we are going to get away from doing a local business between port and port and get into a world-wide business, and in doing that we must use every facility in this country to do so, and if we do not give the proper tools to aid these facilities certainly they will dry up, the same as they have in the past.

I have a copy of a letter here which was written last year by Lloyd's Register of Shipping in New York to Admiral Bowles, who then represented the Shipping Board. To show you why it is absolutely necessary to have our facilities here instead of in England, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk may read this letter in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

There was no objection, and the Clerk read as follows:

LLOYD'S REGISTER OF SHIPPING,
New York, September 11, 1918.

Admiral BOWLES,
United States Shipping Board
Emergency Fleet Corporation,
Philadelphia, Pa.

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of the 10th instant, and note that you have referred the whole subject of load lines for the vessels specified in your letter of the 29th instant to the home office for instructions, but that you have arranged with your representatives at Hog Island and the Merchant Shipbuilding Corporation to make application to the American Bureau of Shipping for the assignment of load lines in the case of the Quistconck and Watonwan and Saccarappa.

The case of the Quistconck has already been dealt with by this society, and a preliminary freeboard has already been assigned, while in the case of the Watonwan this vessel has been measured, the final freeboard established, and the necessary instructions as to the marking of the ship issued from this office on the 24th of August last.

Your action in now making application for freeboard assignment to these vessels to the American bureau is accordingly not clearly understood.

As you are aware, freeboards are a matter in which the maritime countries of the world have established international agreements whereby the load lines assigned by the recognized assigning authorities in the several countries are reciprocally accepted for vessels trading to or from the ports of the countries in question.

The American Bureau of Shipping has not been recognized as an assigning authority by any of the maritime Governments, and as far as I am aware the freeboard which might be assigned and marked on the vessels' sides by that body would not be accepted as legally defining the line to which these vessels would be permitted to load.

Presuming that the load lines determined by the American Bureau of Shipping are to be based on the British Board of Trade tables, it must be apparent that in the absence of this country having established legislation controlling the loading of ships, and in the absence of the agreement referred to above, that vessels, bearing load-line marks other than those of a recognized assigning authority, would most certainly be liable to serious detention in foreign ports.

It is therefore considered that the interest of the Shipping Board would be best served if the assignment of load lines to the vessels for which application has been recently made by you were left entirely to this society; and it is further suggested that in view of the far-reaching experience which this society has in this particular work that where load lines are required for vessels now being constructed for the Emergency Fleet Corporation that application should be made to this society, irrespective of the classification to which these vessels have been allocated.

The advantage to the Emergency Fleet Corporation of having the minimum freeboards permissible under the tables now in force granted the various vessels of the fleet must, I feel sure, be appreciated by you, and I can assure you the services of the society's technical staff are available to you for this purpose.

I may add that according to the rulings which have been laid down in connection with the assignment of load lines, and which are recognized and accepted, applications for assignment must be confined to one, and one only, of the recognized authorities, and the suggestion made in your letter of the 29th ultimo as to the American Bureau of Shipping and this society agreeing on load lines to be assigned in each case is one which the established regulations preclude this society taking any action upon, apart from the consideration that the American bureau, to the best of my knowledge, has no status in the matter of freeboard assignment.

I am inclosing copy of the official form of application, and would direct your attention to the paragraph which I have marked and to which reference has been made in the preceding paragraph.

Yours, very truly,

R. P. HUTCHINSON, Secretary.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman from Michigan to yield me some more time.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I merely call attention to that letter and say it was written by an officer of a British corporation in New York City to an officer of the United States Government, telling him that the load lines marked by the American Bureau of Shipping would not be accepted by the British authorities. If we purpose making ourselves the second largest maritime nation in the world, we must set up the tools to carry on that business. So far as I am concerned I do not propose to allow any nation to say to this Nation that we can not set up our load line and that they will not recognize it if we do, when they recognize the load lines of Norway, Sweden, Germany, Austria, and other nations. I say that they must recognize this Nation just the same as any other nation or we must know the reason why. [Applause.]

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY].

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I hardly think it necessary to argue justification of a measure authorizing the fixing by law of a load line for our freight vessels. It not only affects the insurance of those vessels disadvantageously to have no legally fixed load line but it also endangers the lives of those who go down to the sea in ships. I think it is unjustifiable to permit private owners to compete with each other by reckless and unprincipled loading of their vessels to a dangerous point. I think we owe it to humanity to provide something reasonably safe in the loading of our vessels. It is not that a great many of these shipowners wish to unfairly and unreasonably load their vessels, but they are forced to it by the freedom of other vessel owners to unfairly load theirs. Where a shipowner might want to do right and make his vessel reasonably safe but is in competition with other shipowners who are reckless about the matter, he is forced by competition to assume further and still further risks, and, therefore, to neglect the measure of safety. So far as I know there is no person interested in either the ownership or in the insurance of ships but what agrees that there ought to be legislation authorizing the fixing of safe load lines.

Having said that much I wish to diverge a little in order to refer to some remarks that were being made when I came into the room by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] along the line of the difficulty of the competition by the American shipowner with others. I note that that subject comes up perennially, and we are almost always engaged in the fight for or against a ship subsidy. The gentleman referred to the practice of Germany and other nations subsidizing their ships. I would say this to the gentleman from Michigan, that I have not the remotest idea but that upon fair and equal terms the American shipowner can compete with any other shipowner in the world. I know that Germany in the way of specially favorable freight rates on cargoes brought in in her own vessels did favor her shipping. Her railroads were government-controlled, and we understand that specially low rates were made by them to merchandise that came into Germany in German ships, when these goods had to be shipped to the interior. In this way goods coming into Germany in German ships had a great advantage over goods coming in in other ships. On the other hand, we have favored our shipowners, when it comes to coastwise trade. A vessel that comes from Liverpool to New York, laden with an import cargo and can make its return trip by way of Charleston or Savannah or Mobile or New Orleans, carrying between New York and those ports another cargo and earning money, as our American ships can, where a foreign vessel under a foreign flag can not do it, has a great advantage over the ship under the foreign flag. That has been practically the only way in which we have sought to build up our shipping—that is, by excluding all ships under foreign flags from participating in our coastwise transportation.

Now, gentlemen, I desire——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is it not true that the same conditions exist in foreign countries—that they have their coastwise trade and really prohibit every other country from it?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. To some extent that is true, except as to England. They have no exclusion of foreign ships from their coastwise shipping, and England has negotiated treaties with various other nations under which she is permitted to engage in their coastwise trade. And this further thing is true, that the commerce conducted in our coastwise trade is the greatest on earth, and the privilege of engaging in our coastwise trade is a greater privilege than engaging in coastwise trade of a half dozen other nations. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Michigan and the attention of the House to another essential in the question of competition. We are constantly being told that we can not compete in shipping because of our high wages. Do you know that wages is really a very minor consideration in the question of competition? The overhead charges are the great thing that enable or prevent our competition. I wish I had it here, but I will try to insert it in my extended remarks—a statement which I recently read, which shows the amount of time that our ships have operated on the seas in actual transportation and the amount of time that they were laid up in harbors; the lost motion, the lost time. My recollection is that this statement or report shows that our Shipping Board ships since they have been in operation have only been on the seas 42 per cent of their time. They have had 58 per cent wastage, either in ports by reason of strikes, as in Liverpool for quite a while, or awaiting cargoes or sailing dates. In other words, through failure to utilize every moment of their time. The wastage and costliness of a ship standing still is enormous. Our shipping authorities say, "An analysis shows the average daily cost of keeping a 10,000-ton vessel in port exceeds $3,000."

Mr. Chairman, there are so many things that enter into the question of shipping cost, and therefore into the question of ability to compete, that in a brief 10 or 15 minutes a man could not go over them all. I can only tell you what some of them are. In the first place, when two vessels compete it is well understood the bigger the vessel the cheaper the unit of transportation on a given voyage. With that principle well understood it would be hastily believed that big ships would run all the little ships off the ocean, but somehow they do not do it. The truth is that if you give the ship able management, under which it is arranged beforehand for the unloading of the vessel when it reaches port; if the master can reload promptly; if he can use 75 per cent of his time on sea in actual transportation, as against another vessel that used 40 per cent or 50 per cent of its time in port, the vessel that utilizes all of its time at sea has an immense advantage. In such a case no kind of lower wages could make up for the idle vessel its losses from its idleness. Now, here is the great American people, with the greatest commerce on earth. If we can get a great many of our people interested in our shipping and let them arrange it so that, having a part ownership in the ships that travel on the seas, they will aid in furnishing them with the cargoes and in avoiding delays and empty voyages, you have got the basis of a prosperous merchant marine. Let me tell you, and the gentleman from Michigan particularly, this same statement I read stated that over 50 per cent of our vessels—I may not have the exact percentage figures, but a very large percentage of our ships—went out well laden with cargo but returned home in ballast. There is again lost motion and enormous cost. The necessity for a successful shipping enterprise is that it be organized so as to cut down overhead charges and permit our ships to go and return well laden with cargoes to save expenses of empty or ballast-laden ships coming thousands of miles in order to get a cargo—and I believe that even paying wages which cost twice as much—which I am undertaking to show is no longer the case since the seamen's bill has put the laborers on the sea upon an equality by making them free—but if wages did cost our shippers twice as much as the wages paid in foreign ships, we could still compete successfully.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield me five minutes additional?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I get so interested in this subject I can not realize how time is progressing.

Mr. WELLING. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I will.

Mr. WELLING. If it would not interrupt the gentleman now, I want to ask what is the gentleman's solution of the problem of having laden vessels come back from foreign ports as well as going out? I can see how we can fill our ships to go to foreign ports, but how can they always obtain cargoes on their return home?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. It is a hope I have of the policy of this Nation. English shipping is upon equal terms with that of all the world. They do not subsidize their freighters. They are expert in the operation of their ships. An English vessel generally makes a triangle. It carries its goods to South America and brings South American goods to New York and takes the goods of New York to some other port or back to Liverpool, and we must follow that example and use American ingenuity and skill in our shipping transactions, and provide that somehow our vessels will always go laden outward and inward bound.

Mr. WELLING. Has the committee found out why it is not done to-day?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I am stating that I have just received the statement I referred to. We are practically beginners in the overseas trade. We must learn the business over again, because for half a century we had abandoned the overseas carrying. Perhaps, unless we are willing to consent to receive imports as well as to send out exports, we will never get any return cargo, and therefore can not ever have an overseas merchant marine.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. I just wanted to inject that remark. As I understand it, Great Britain is practically a free-trade country, and if we follow the policy of a high-protective tariff wall, would it be possible for us ever to build up any foreign trade so that we can have return cargoes?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I am hoping that somehow we will manage to buy and import something as well as sell and export things. That we will learn that we can not trade at all with the world unless we both buy and sell, that even our protectionist friends will learn this, and leave some kinds of merchandise not wholly excluded from our shores by their high tariffs.

That will be a handicap, unquestionably, as long as we refuse to receive imports from other countries; but ingenuity will probably find a great many imports from other countries that will come in here. Heretofore, in some way some kinds of imports have been brought here, and what we do bring in can be carried as well in our ships as in foreign ships; and furthermore, I want to say this, that in becoming a creditor Nation instead of a debtor Nation, the other nations of the world will be compelled to export to our country some of their products, or else they can not pay what they owe us. All these matters are matters that come outside of, but related to, shipping. I have heard so much about our high wages preventing our competition in shipping that I wanted to call the attention of the gentlemen here to the fact that difference in wages, if there is a difference, is one of the smallest problems in our shipping. I have been mentioning the economies and the overhead charges, and the utilizing of our shipping space, the management of our shipping overseas, and those things, with the advantage of the exclusive right of our ships in our coastwise trade, and I believe that due attention to these things will make our merchant marine a success.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman pardon another question?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Notwithstanding the fact that we have always had that coastwise trade that the gentleman thinks is such an element in building up the merchant marine, still we have lost the shipping. But the particular question I wish to ask is this: I understood the gentleman to make some remark as to the people having an interest in the shipping. Does the gentleman mean by that that it should be Federal ownership?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Oh, no. I mean that our people at large ought to, so far as they are able, take shares of stock in the shipping interests and industry of the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Outside of the Government?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Outside of the Government; yes. Of course, the gentleman has not heard all of my efforts and discussions of this question.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The gentleman is very interesting and is well informed.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. There have been many things which have destroyed our shipping. In the first place, we by our laws provided a condition under which an American-built ship cost 50 per cent more than a foreign ship, and therefore if a man wanted to trade between Liverpool and New York on a direct line, he bought a British ship and put it under a foreign flag, and, as a consequence, we had hundreds of millions of dollars invested in foreign ships, under foreign flags.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It will not be true under this arrangement?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Not if our shipbuilders enter into competition with the shipbuilders of the world. In that case we will take the trade of the world. We will have next year 14,000,000 tons of shipping, and probably can not utilize for our own people more than 8,000,000. What are we going to do with the extra 6,000,000 tons? If we tell our shipbuilders now to take contracts wherever they can and bid against the Clyde shipbuilders and all of Europe, they will do it. My opinion is that all we need is to try, and then compete. As long as we say we can not do it, we never will. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE].

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, we have had this question of load line, as applied to vessels, brought up in the committee several times for consideration during the last few years, but never have we reached that stage of action where we could bring it before the House of Representatives. Fortunately, we now have a committee that is able to bring out some legislation for consideration in the House, and we have been fortunate thus far in agreeing upon bills to be presented to the House.

I am very happy to state that on this proposition there does not seem to be a difference between the two sides of the center aisle. We all agreed that this bill was a necessity in connection with the merchant marine. A number of years ago a constituent of mine who had traveled a great deal around the world came to me and asked why the committee, of which I was a member, did not take up the question of a load line on our vessels in this country. I took up the question with the Department of Commerce, which was a place where I could get considerable information, and they replied to me then that we had a very limited number of vessels; that we could not establish the system of load lines because we had so few vessels under the American flag; our shipping had fallen off because of fierce competition and because of our inability to construct vessels for the overseas trade, because of excessive costs of construction; therefore the great American Government was not in the position whereby we could be considered in the question of establishing a load-line system.

Now we have quite a number of vessels that have been constructed since the beginning of the war, and under its stimulus our shipbuilding industry has been growing from time to time, and we have been building better vessels all the time, commencing, of course, with but a few practical shipbuilders. Consequently we could not rank as builders of remarkable ships. Some of them that were built did not prove to be as good as was anticipated; but we have now arrived at the position where we can construct vessels that can make their way on the high seas and get back home safely and be ready without a great deal of repair to continue their voyages. We hope to continue the improvements for American shipping, and with this purpose in view we have provided for a bureau of American shipping which will take the place heretofore occupied in this country by foreign interests, the same relative place that the British Lloyd's occupy in classifying vessels abroad.

We have, therefore, reached a position where we can demand an American standard. It was suggested in the debate by questions presented to the speaker who preceded me that possibly the Governments on the other side of the water would not recognize our load lines and our rules of shipping. I agree that there might be a little discussion in that line, because we have some gentlemen who have been engaged in foreign shipping for many years who have become tinctured with English notions, and by reason of their connections with the British Lloyd's quite naturally believe that our American Bureau of Shipping can never reach the high standard of Lloyd's Bureau. I am an American who does not believe anything of that kind. I believe the United States of America is equal to any other nation when they enter upon a project which past experience has proven that they are able to handle successfully. Having men qualified by long sea experience in every line of endeavor, I am willing to fearlessly state that we will take no rebuff from any nation on earth. We shall be able within a very short time to establish a load line for American shipping and thereby to send a vessel under a classification made by the American Bureau of Shipping, and no nation on earth will dare to refuse that classification. And if they should refuse, we can retaliate.

Now, I am a very peaceful man myself, but still I would show that there was still a little fighting blood left in me if anyone should attempt to override anything that was strictly American. I happen to have been born in America, and I have not left her shores, and I shall not leave unless I am deported, and I have no fear of ever being placed in such a position. I shall stand pat on the question of the American merchant marine.

I have given a good deal of attention to this question of establishing load lines. I have thought a good deal about it. And the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] was very active in his advocacy of this load line for vessels while he was chairman of the committee, and, as he reintroduced the load-line bill in the present session of the Sixty-sixth Congress, the committee unitedly joined that he should report the bill.

I have examined the report very thoroughly, and I have found it is full of good material, and it explains the bill completely, so that no man need to vote on the bill without having ample knowledge conveyed to him by reading the report. Then we also have a communication here that was addressed to me from the American Bureau of Shipping, of which Mr. Stevenson Taylor, long in the naval service, is the president, and that bureau has laid out a proposition which by this bill, if it is passed, will enable the Department of Commerce to establish and make use of the American Bureau of Shipping, which will be an efficient aid in the creation of a proper classification society for the interest of American vessels. Everybody who knows anything about it knows that it is continually being thrown up to us that the British Lloyd's provide this or provide that, and even some Americans come before our committee, claiming to have the American spirit in them, who say, "Why, the British Lloyds will not agree to that proposition." Whether they agree or not, they will eventually have to take second place, because we shall be a larger merchant-marine nation than the British nation itself if we continue to build ships, as I hope we may.

We have a number of men who know how to build ships to-day, and the question between the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] as to whether or not there would be a subsidy granted to American ships built in American shipyards need not disturb us. I can say for myself that if it should become necessary to have a subsidy in order to keep the American vessels upon the high seas, I should not fear any criticism that might arise because of that necessity. If we can not operate great ships on the great ocean without some form of subsidy in the transportation of foreign products in American vessels or American products in American vessels, that would be a subject for future consideration. But that subject is not before us now. We have a demand for all the vessels we now have. The men who run the vessels we now have know how to run them, and it would be folly to have anybody else to undertake to run them unless they do know how and are not novices in the trade. Our master mariners have been operating with foreign-built vessels when they could not get anything else. Now that they can get American vessels they will prefer to take them, so that we do not need to discuss the subject of making some provision to keep the fleet of vessels on the seas until that problem confronts us. But I believe if it becomes necessary the House and the Senate will adopt a system which will keep the American flag on the ocean That is what we really want. We want to have the American flag on the ocean, and we want to take part in the trade with foreign nations. Why? Because we produce so much in this country by means of our productive machinery and the great ability of our workmen; we produce so many products that we do not consume and which we must send out of the United States. We prefer to send out our products by American-built vessels manned by American sailors. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I wanted to take the floor just to make one observation. I agree with the distinguished chairman of the committee [Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts] that this country will become a great merchant-marine country. I think there is no doubt that we are on the sea to stay there. That was our policy declared, and I have no doubt but that it will materialize.

I am glad to hear the statement also of the distinguished chairman that if a subsidy is necessary there will be no hesitancy to adopt the method, because a subsidy would not be anything more than the difference paid for the operation of the merchant marine, and that would be a subsidy to labor. Without the necessity of covering the difference in wages paid by us and our competitors, no subsidy would be required. Consequently there will be nothing of that sort unless the difference in cost in building and operation will command it.

I want to make this further observation: Here is a committee having—I will not say the most important problem that is to come before the country, because I think the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has a problem that is equally as important, if not greater—but here is a committee that has one of the most important functions to perform in behalf of the American people, to resuscitate and to build up our power on the sea. It involves more or less differences of policy, and yet the committee has at this session been on the floor of the House three times, according to my memory, and it has been not only unanimous as a committee, but it has been very enthusiastically supported both in Committee of the Whole and in the House. And yet this committee deals with problems that do supply many angles of differentiation. The other day we amended one of the most sensitive laws that have been passed since I have been in Congress, namely, the LA FOLLETTE seamen's bill.

The committee was not only unanimous in the proposal, but there was very little, if any, opposition, either in the Committee of the Whole or on the floor of the House. Here comes the same result in this proposal, and this proposal is not confined to an economic side. It goes to an extent also to the humanitarian side. It aims to secure safety. It is not only to prevent taking advantage of insurance by negligently allowing a ship to be overloaded and sunk, but it also prevents useless wastage of human life by overloading vessels. It has that humanitarian side, and I want to commend the House for not overlooking that element in legislation.

Here is another suggestion that I want the committee to note. I came into this Congress in 1913. I have been present during much of the debates on legislation, and I can not now recall any bill reported in the House by a minority Member until now. I know bills were framed in committees by minority Members, and I know that reports of committees were written by minority Members and the bills carried through in discussion by minority Members, but I have never until now seen a bill presented here on the floor, during the time I have been here, by a Member of the minority party and given control of the legislation. Here is a bill that was fathered by the distinguished former chairman of this great committee, Judge ALEXANDER. All of us greatly enjoy him, and highly appreciate his ability, having had him in charge of the bill in prior Congresses, but the bill not having reached the stage of passage, he was permitted by this great committee to still retain the fatherhood of the bill and was allowed to present it at this time. [Applause.] I want to commend the committee for that mark of respect to a distinguished member of the committee in which no politics of any sort is shown. [Applause.]

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, in connection with the statement of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], I want to say that in the last Congress the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROWE] introduced a bill to increase the pay of inspectors in the Steamboat-Inspection Service. He, by my designation, reported the bill in the House and had charge of it on the floor. Not one committee of this House has less politics in it than this Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. I think the last statement of my friend is absolutely correct, and I compliment him for the generous treatment of my friend Mr. ROWE, although that had escaped my attention. [Applause.]

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] if he desires to use his time now?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 13 minutes remaining.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I agreed to yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS].

The CHAIRMAN. If no one claims the time, the Clerk will read. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SCOTT] has 12 minutes. Does he desire to be recognized?

Mr. SCOTT. For years there has been a growing demand for legislation of this character. Great Britain, Norway, Sweden, France, Italy, Germany, and the other large maritime nations, excepting Japan, have had laws similar to the one which is now proposed.

This law is almost identical with the load-line laws of other maritime nations. I presume the question has presented itself to the members of the committee how we are to compete with foreign vessels which are not required to carry a load line. We do it in this way: The bill provides that all vessels, no matter under what flag, if they come to American ports, shall carry either the American load line or a load line of similar nature. You can readily see that so far as ships competing with American ships in American ports are concerned that amply protects the American ships.

It developed in the hearings that in consequence of the enormous amount of work incident to this bill it would be humanly impossible for the Department of Commerce to place the load line on transoceanic vessels, on coastwise vessels, and on the vessels engaged in the Great Lakes trade simultaneously. Mr. Chamberlain, who for a great many years has been the head of the Department of Navigation, indicated to the committee that it would probably take at least two years before the department could carry out the provisions of the act in the coastwise trade and on the Great Lakes.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCOTT. Gladly.

Mr. DOWELL. Does the gentleman mean that all American vessels are within the law, but the coastwise and Great Lakes will not be brought within its provisions within two years?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes; as a practical proposition. I am sure the gentleman appreciates the fact that with the number of ships that the United States Government is operating at the present time in the transoceanic business, and the number of ships that are being operated by independent concerns, the Department of Commerce, even with an enormous force, could not make the necessary investigation as to all these ships in less time.

Mr. DOWELL. But does not every ship come within the provisions of this bill?

Mr. SCOTT. Every ship does come within the provisions of this bill, but as a practical proposition it is humanly impossible to place this load line on all of the transoceanic vessels, all the coastwise vessels, and all the vessels engaged in the Great Lakes trade in less than two years.

Mr. DOWELL. Will ships that belong to private corporations be required to place this line on the side, or is the Government alone required to do it?

Mr. SCOTT. The law requires every ship operating under the American flag to carry this load line.

Mr. DOWELL. Then the owners of the ships must put it on?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Will not this be required immediately upon the passage of this act?

Mr. SCOTT. It will; but the gentleman will understand that where the Department of Commerce can not make the necessary determination or furnish the necessary service then it can exercise the power exercised many times in the past to exonerate the persons it precludes from complying with the provisions of the act. In consequence of that fact, the Great Lakes and coastwise people who can not be served will not be penalized under the provisions of the bill.

Mr. EDMONDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes.

Mr. EDMONDS. I call attention to section 9, which provides that the act shall take effect six months after the date of its approval, or at such earlier time as the Secretary of Commerce may fix.

Mr. SCOTT. The testimony in committee was that during that six months' period after the passage of the bill the great majority of the ships operating in the transoceanic business could undoubtedly be taken care of, and that was one reason why the bill was not made effective until six months after its passage.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I suggest the reading of the bill.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has one minute.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks on this bill in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 13 minutes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS].

Mr. SCOTT. And I yield the gentleman from Pennsylvania the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for 11 minutes.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, when I reflect that I stand in the greatest legislative body in Christendom, that here assembled as lawmakers are the representatives of the most powerful, the freest, and the proudest people in all the world, that here in the midst of big broad-minded men, of great wisdom and experience, I am privileged to enter, I am abashed by the sense of my own limitations.

Yet when I reflect that I too have been chosen to represent a great constituency in this historic Hall I am inspired by a high sense of duty and responsibility and I am assured that my colleagues on both sides of this aisle have the same sense of obligation, for though in the battledore and shuttlecock play of partisan quip and retort differences are apparent and party zeal is always on tap, yet I am sure that underneath all that this House stands for Americanism. This is no time for pussyfooting and namby-pamby talk. We have let the radicals and the reds go too far. We have laughed at it; we have sneered at it; but the damned stuff has been preached into ignorant brains by evil men, so that it is a menace, it threatens to control the vast labor organizations with the doctrines of the syndicalist, and Americans must stand up to be counted. [Applause.] Americans must rise up and drive the men who preach such doctrines out of the country. [Applause.]

Every good Democrat is a real American, and the Republican who does not put America above party is not a good Republican.

Of course we have differences. Of course there is sparring for position, appeals to partisan prejudices, and the manufacture of campaign stuff for 1920, but we differ without rancor.

There are those two distinguished Democratic leaders, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]. They are the twin leaders of the Democrats. [Applause.] Both are stars of the first magnitude in the Democratic firmament. Both are gifted with remarkable powers of vociferation. [Applause.]

When the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] debate a protective-tariff measure, then does Greek meet Greek, and the gentleman from North Carolina rises to such eloquent loudness that one can not hear what he says, but he has reiterated that tariff speech so often that the House always knows what is coming. [Applause.]

But he himself seems blind and deaf to what is coming.

The solid South has dammed up public sentiment with a free-trade dam, against which common sense and public intelligence has been rising until the accumulating flood threatens the whole dam construction.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield before he leaves the labor question?

Mr. HULINGS. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think my leader colleague, Mr. BLANTON, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania and myself have the same sympathies and understanding and agreement, perhaps, in regard to this great problem which the gentleman mentions—the labor problem. Of course, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] and myself are not in the inner councils of the Republicans who are in control of the House. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania kindly indicate to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] and myself what steps the Republican Party in the House has taken to meet the great labor problem that the gentleman thinks threatens the country? I agree with him, and perhaps the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] and myself and the gentleman from Pennsylvania can work in harmony together. Have there been any bills introduced to take care of the threatening labor problem? I was just reading about that very problem——

Mr. HULINGS. Let me say to the gentleman I only have 11 minutes, and, although I would be glad to hear the gentleman further, I want to say to him that I introduced a resolution in this House for the appointment of a committee whose duty it should be to map out a plan of education for these ignorant foreigners and give them a good substantial idea of what Americanism is.

Mr. KITCHIN. When did the gentleman introduce it?

Mr. HULINGS. About seven days ago. I am not sure.

Mr. KITCHIN. To what committee did it go?

Mr. HULINGS. I do not recollect.

Mr. KITCHIN. Some Republican committee has it. Has the committee reported it out or had any hearings?

Mr. HULINGS. On reflection, I believe the resolution still lies on my desk, but I shall introduce it at once.

The first trickles developed when the Democratic Party enacted in the Underwood tariff bill a bonus of 5 per cent in favor of goods imported in American bottoms and a tariff on Angora goat hair, and only recently the talented and ornate gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] presented a bill to impose 40 per cent duty on graphite. Yes; southern business men are beginning to see the light, and as the South devotes herself more and more to diversified industries the tide in favor of a protective tariff rises higher and higher and progressive Democrats throughout the country more and more deplore the efforts of heedless Bourbon leaders to commit the party to free trade when they ought to be able to see that "free trade" is a dead cock in the pit and can not fight. [Applause.]

The people of the South are beginning to see the light, and thoughtful, progressive Democrats throughout the country deplore the idea that these blind Bourbon leaders of the Democratic Party insist on committing their party to free trade, when they ought to see that free trade is a dead cock in the pit and can not fight any longer against the rising flood of intelligence in this country.

Another difference is seen. During the war "party" was dropped—all parties stood together; since the war the Democrats claim everything; they wear all the plumes.

They claim the Republican Party, with its graft and stupidity and inefficiency, were incapable of carrying on war, and a merciful Almighty put the Democrats in control to save the country. Well, "God works in mysterious ways His wonders to perform" [applause], and maybe it is so, but Democrats forget that the Republican Party carried on a great war to a glorious conclusion in spite of all the Copperheads and obstruction that the Democratic Party could muster. They forget that this war was not a Democratic war. It was a people's war, and some of the Democrats in this House at heart were mighty lukewarm until overwhelmed by public opinion. They forget that at crucial moments the measures of a Democratic administration were enacted by Republican votes. They forget that the energies of the Government did not begin to function until big Republican business men were called in by the Government to furnish the ability and experience that the stupendous task required.

The Democrats have defiantly proclaimed that none of the numerous investigations will show a dollar of graft or that there was any stealing. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Pou] was very positive about that. But, bless his genial heart, there was no need for anybody to steal. All anybody needed to do was to get a contract from the War Department. [Applause.]

The American people won this war. Let us just assume that all loyal men, without distinction of party, did the best they knew how, and now that the war is over the American people demand of their Representatives in Congress, without distinction of party, that they do all in their power to bring the country back to normal conditions.

The initiative and responsibility is upon the Republican Party.

The railroad question, merchant marine, the labor question, rehabilitation of our soldiers, immigration, Army organization, the naval bill—all of these, for which the country is waiting for solution and looking to the Republican Party, are as yet without action.

It will not do for us to adjourn now. From a purely partisan standpoint, nothing would suit the Democratic Party better or load their mud batteries heavier than to be able to say that the Republicans adjourned Congress without even a discussion of these imperative questions. You can imagine what the Democratic orators would say next year. Could imagination soar to the flights the great Democratic leader from the "Tar-heel State" would make when with characteristic exuberance and liberality, not to say carelessness in his treatment of facts, his indignant soul would pillory the Republican Party for inefficiency and abandonment of duty. What answer could we make?

It will not do to say that the committees are holding hearings and considering what shall be presented to the House. The convention formulated the Constitution of the United States, a document pronounced by the greatest Anglo-Saxon minds as the most perfect document ever devised by the minds of men, within four months, or in less time than the committees have had to consider these bills.

Besides, all these bills will be fought out on the floor. No committee, wise as it may be, will be able to present a bill on any of these great matters that will get the approval of this House without full discussion.

Mr. Chairman, none of these bills are or ought to be partisan measures, but if they turn out well the Republican Party, which is responsible for them, will receive great credit. Of course, the Democrats will very properly scrutinize them with great jealousy. We should bring these bills out without delay.

I have offered a measure which historically is a nonpartisan measure. Whether it will ever see the light or whether it will be embalmed in the silent mold of a committee pigeonhole I do not know, but I take this opportunity to bring it to the attention of the House.

The purport of the bill is to relieve American shipping from the payment of tolls in the Panama Canal, in such a manner that even the greatest stickler for treaty engagements can not object.

The House will remember that when the Panama Canal was about finished, at a cost of $422,000,000 to the taxpayers, the Democrats, the Republicans, and the Progressives in their national platforms, and Mr. Wilson in his campaign for election in 1912, declared that the American coastwise shipping should pass through the canal free of tolls and the law was enacted.

But shortly after election the President demanded that Congress should repeal the act, because certain delicate questions had arisen that made the act embarrassing. What these reasons were have never been disclosed.

It has been suggested that the act was repealed in the interest of the great transcontinental American and Canadian railroad lines that desired to keep ocean freight rates with which they had to compete as high as possible, and it was said also that England insisted that the free-tolls act should be repealed as the price of her keeping Japan off our necks at that time. It was wildly argued that a delicate sense of honor required us to repeal the act because of the provisions in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The absurdity of that argument is revealed by a common-sense interpretation of the treaty, wherein it is prescribed in article 2 that the United States "shall have the exclusive right to provide for the regulation and management of the canal." Article 3 provides that the United States adopts the following rules: (1) "That the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality."

Now, of course, when the United States was making these rules how absurd it would be after building the canal that she had to include herself as one of the "all nations" in order to give herself use of the canal. If the United States is one of the "all nations" then she must charge her warships the same as warships of other nations, another absurdity of taking out of one pocket what she pays into the other.

Rule 2: "The canal is never to be blockaded nor act of hostility committed within it." Now, if the United States is one of the "all nations," how ridiculous that she should stipulate that she would not blockade nor commit hostility upon her own property. As well might she stipulate that she would not commit hostility within the city of New York.

Rule 3 prescribes that "vessels of war of belligerents shall not take any stores in the canal," so that if the United States is one of the "all nations," after having built the canal for the avowed purpose for securing a great strategical position, she has deliberately stipulated that if she should ever be engaged in war her enemy should have equal use of the canal. If Peru and England were at war each could pass through the canal on "terms of entire equality." But if Peru and the United States were at war Peru could not use the canal. Why? Because the United States owns the canal and is not one of the "all nations." When she gives the ships of all nations the use of New York Harbor on "terms of entire equality," she may give her own ships such terms as she chooses.

Rule 4 prescribes "no belligerents shall embark or disembark troops or munitions of war in the canal," and if the United States, who makes these rules, is one of the "all nations" and should become engaged in war she could not embark or disembark troops in the canal, and would not even have the right to embark her garrison there to fetch it away.

Rule 6 prescribes "that the plant shall be part of the canal and shall enjoy immunity from attack of the belligerents." Again, if the United States is one of the "all nations," we have the absurd situation that she solemnly declares she will not destroy her own property.

The only possible construction of the language of the treaty is that the United States has adopted rules for all "other" nations with respect to the use of the canal and covenanting to admit them to use her property on terms of entire equality as between them.

The Senate knew about the Hay-Pauncefote treaty; so did the House; so did Mr. Taft, who signed the tolls act; so did Mr. Wilson, who stumped the country for it.

It never entered the mind of any man, up to the time that Mr. Wilson discovered it, that England had any right to interfere in the method by which the United States shall treat her own citizens and handle her own property, except that the United States stipulated that she would treat all other nations alike.

Besides, neither Great Britain nor any other nation could be affected by American coastwise traffic going through the canal free of tolls, because no other nation is permitted to engage in American coastwise traffic, which was specifically conceded by the English Government. This seems to indicate clearly that the transcontinental railroad interests were the real parties insisting that the American coastwise traffic pay tolls. An English ship comes to the canal. The toll is so much. It is paid. An American ship goes through the canal. Must that vessel pay toll? Oh, yes; the stickler for treaty obligations says, "Yes; all nations must pay alike." Very well. He hands the canal master a check on the United States Treasury for the amount of the toll and the check is presented to the United States Treasury, and the United States Treasurer very solemnly pays it out of one pocket into the other pocket, and the stickler for treaty obligations, I suppose, is satisfied.

But, whatever gentlemen may think of my argument, the bill which I have presented avoids all objections on the score of treaty obligations. All the people in the country were in favor of freedom of tolls for American commerce. That is what the canal was built for.

All the political parties approved it in their national platforms. The President of the United States stumped the country in favor of it. Congress passed the bill, and then, for some mysterious reasons, we got very thin-skinned about treaty obligations and said, "Yes; we built the canal, but we really have no more right in that canal than any other nation, except that we have reserved the exclusive right to pay all the bills"; and so, to satisfy these finicky people, I have introduced this bill, which simply provides that if the ships of all nations must pay the same tolls, then after our American ship has paid its tolls a receipt is given by the canal master, and on the presentation of that receipt to the United States Treasury the money is refunded.

Oh, you say, that is a subsidy! Of course it is a subsidy! England now and always has subsidized her shipping. Germany did the same thing until she fell afoul of the Yankee boys.

There must be some substantial aid given to our merchant marine or we might just as well hang our harps upon the willow, so far as that industry is concerned. We are told that the American laws concerning the employment of sailors and the management of our ships are such that every other nation will be obliged to pay the same rates of wages and furnish the same kind of accommodations, but it is not so. They do not do it.

There is no country in the world where wages and the standards of living are as high as in America.

The glory of the country and the splendor of the country is that it is so, and we need never expect that the Jap or the Norwegian, the Italian, or even the English will ever pay the same scale of wages for her seaman that we do, and ought to, pay our seaman. The Norwegian is discarding the old style of boilers and engines and using internal-combustion engines for motive power, making an enormous gain in cargo space, in cost of fuel, in reduction of the number of men employed. We are puttering along building hundreds and thousands of ships on the old plan of burning coal under a boiler and running the engine by steam.

If we expect to cut any figure in ocean transportation, we have got to get a move on. We must protect American labor aboard ship just as we do in the factory, and you can call it protective tariff or you can call it a subsidy, or what you will, it must be done in practical man fashion. Free tolls in the canal will be a step in that direction, and a very helpful step for our trade with the west coast of South America and the Orient, and nobody in the world has a right to complain except ourselves, for if the United States Government after building the canal, treating every ship that goes through that canal without discrimination, shall give to the American shipmaster a receipt that he can cash at the United States Treasury, whose concern is it? What business is it of any other nation what the United States does with her own money amongst her own people?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That this act shall apply to the following vessels:

(a) Cargo-carrying vessels of 500 gross tons or over loading at any port or place within the United States or its possessions for a foreign voyage by sea.

(b) Cargo-carrying vessels of the United States of 500 gross tons or over loading at any foreign port or place for a voyage by sea.

(c) Other vessels loading at any port or place in the United States or its possessions, whenever, in the judgment of the Secretary of Commerce, the safety of such vessels and their crews requires the establishment of a legal load line.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit a unanimous-consent request. It will be observed in line 12 of the print from which the Clerk is reading, on page 1, is the word "vessel." It should be "vessels," and the last word in line 13, on page 1, is spelled "lin," whereas it should be spelled "line." I ask unanimous consent that those changes be made.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to change the word "vessel" to "vessels" in line 12, on page 1, and to correct the spelling of the word "line" in line 13.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, the print that I have is correct in both particulars.

Mr. SCOTT. I may say to the gentleman from Missouri that I have a copy of the bill which is being read by the Clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. These are evidently misprints, and without objection the Clerk will be authorized to correct them.

There was no objection.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to ask the gentleman in charge of the measure what the reason of the committee was for making it mandatory that the Secretary of Commerce should appoint the American Bureau of Shipping as the agency to make this survey and at the same time give the shipowners the right to ask that some other agency do the work, while it reposed in the Secretary of Commerce the discretion to appoint Lloyd's Bureau or the Bureau of Navigation or something else to do the work?

Mr. SCOTT. I think the gentleman's question is very pertinent, and I will endeavor to answer it if he will bear with me. In the first place, the designation, as the gentleman has noted, is not confined exclusively to the American Bureau of Shipping, but at the present time the American Bureau of Shipping is the only concern in the country which is qualified to do this character of work. I may say to the gentleman that the American Bureau of Shipping is a concern which makes no profit.

Mr. WALSH. I understand all about the American Bureau of Shipping and have looked into some of its activities, I would say, but not along this line—along other lines where it was required to do certain things under contracts entered into by the Shipping Board. What I am trying to ascertain is why, if you are going to give the shipowner the right to call for some other bureau to make the classification, you leave it discretionary with the Secretary of Commerce to appoint Lloyd's, or if he does not want to appoint Lloyd's, then the Bureau of Navigation?

Mr. SCOTT. If I understand the gentleman, the Department of Commerce has general supervision of the subject, and in the future if some other concern of repute should be created in the country which would do this work as well as Lloyd's or the American Bureau of Shipping or some other similar concern the Department of Commerce would have no reason to object to their being selected, and unquestionably would not object; but if provision is not made allowing the owner of the ships to suggest some other concern, then the American Bureau of Shipping naturally would be the only concern which could do this work.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman does not anticipate, after this law is passed and the American Bureau is designated as the one to make the classification, that any other bureau is ever going to be built up in this country to carry on this work, when this American Bureau has had the recognition of the Federal Government in this law?

Mr. SCOTT. Well, the gentleman's premise is not correct.

Mr. WALSH. Oh, well——

Mr. SCOTT. I know the gentleman thinks it is, but it is not. The American Bureau of Shipping is mentioned because it is the only one in the country now competent to do the work.

Mr. WALSH. Why mention them?

Mr. SCOTT. Well, for the same reason you might mention Webster's Dictionary—because it is a recognized authority.

Mr. WALSH. Why mention others?

Mr. SCOTT. Because there may be others created in the future equally qualified.

Mr. WALSH. But you make it mandatory to appoint the only bureau that exists and make it mandatory upon the Secretary of Commerce to designate a private corporation——

Mr. SCOTT. No; the gentleman is not correct.

Mr. WALSH. If the words "shall appoint" are not mandatory I would like to know how the use of language in the bill could be more so.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask for five minutes in opposition to the pro forma amendment. I yield to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I want to suggest in connection with the question asked by the gentleman from Massachusetts, as I understand it the Secretary is given authority to designate this American Bureau of Shipping or other corporations or associations, and my idea was that alternative was given to him because there are a great number of ships of which surveys must be made, and you might have a condition where if the authority were lodged exclusively in the American Bureau of Shipping a congestion might result if the American Bureau of Shipping were the only body authorized to do the work, and so the Secretary was given authority to designate other associations and other corporations in order that work might be done as expeditiously as possible. I understand that to be one of the considerations which moved the committee to give these alternative powers. Is that right?

Mr. SCOTT. That is right.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Now, the gentleman from Michigan, in response to the gentleman from Maine, has made it clear that it was not intended to make this mandatory. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman from Michigan if a shipowner comes in and says he would like to have this ship of his classified by Lloyd's, why you repose the discretion in the Secretary of Commerce to say, "Well, I will not designate Lloyd's to make this classification, but I will say the collector of customs or the collector of the port at New York shall make the classification"?

What benefit is that to the shipowner to give him the right to select some other agency and vest in the Secretary the discretion to say, "No; I will not appoint that agency, but I will appoint some Federal official or the Bureau of Navigation to do it"?

Mr. SCOTT. Nearly every law on the statute books could be improperly enforced.

Mr. WALSH. Well——

Mr. SCOTT. But now take the other illustration; the gentleman suggests they might want Lloyd's to do it. Suppose the man comes in and instead of suggesting that Lloyd's mark his ship he suggests some incompetent in his home town.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, if the committee is writing a law to take care of such a contingency as that, I would compliment the committee upon getting it within the scope of eight pages. But of course the gentleman can not be serious in such a contention as that. You are trying to give the shipowner the right to go to the Secretary of Commerce and say, "I prefer to have my ship classified by some corporation or association to the survey or registry of shipping."

Mr. SCOTT. I am serious. If he asks that any legitimate and qualified concern be permitted to mark his ship, unquestionably the Secretary of Commerce will grant it.

Mr. WALSH. Then, if I understand the gentleman, if he will yield——

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. The purpose of this language was to vest in the Secretary of Commerce the discretion of refusing to a shipowner the right to designate some association to survey his ship?

Mr. SCOTT. That is right.

Mr. WALSH. That is the purpose of this language. And the gentleman's contention is that the language is wise to carry out that purpose?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WALSH. I regret using so much of the gentleman's time.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words for the purpose of adding a suggestion in line with the last discussion. In the committee, one consideration which led to the approval of the provision in the bill which the gentleman from Massachusetts has been discussing with the gentleman from Michigan and with the gentleman from Maine was that if the shipowner should find himself with a vessel in a foreign port—for instance, in England or in any other foreign country—and should desire to have his ship surveyed in a foreign land and the load line established there instead of being required to return to America, then he might make application to the Secretary of Commerce for that permission.

And in order that the Secretary of Commerce should not be placed in a position to use arbitrary power, the provision was made that it should be such corporation or association for the survey or registry of shipping as the Secretary of Commerce might approve, it being assumed that the Secretary of Commerce would not fail to approve an organization or corporation which had a recognized standing in its own country. That was one of the principal considerations in the subcommittee for the adoption of this provision in section 3.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes, sir.

Mr. WALSH. Certainly this language does not confine it to instances such as that.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. It does not confine it; but it would not be necessary that it should confine it to that kind of a case. It leaves the power rather broad, it is true, but still leaves it within the discretion of the Secretary of Commerce, while subject to his approval of the association or corporation which makes the survey.

Mr. WALSH. Now, that is equivalent to letting the Secretary of Commerce say, "While you selected Lloyd's to do this classification, I do not approve it, and you have got to take it to the American Bureau," does it not? And if that is true, why is it necessary to give the Secretary of Commerce authority to appoint some other officer of the Government to do it?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I yield.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Section 2 provides that the Secretary of Commerce is authorized to establish by regulations from time to time the load water lines and marks thereof indicating the maximum depth to which such vessels may safely be loaded.

Now, under section 3 it says:

The Secretary of Commerce shall appoint the American Bureau of Shipping, or such other corporation or association for the survey or registry of shipping as may be selected by him, to determine whether the position and manner of marking on such vessels the load line or lines so established are in accordance with the provisions of this act and of the regulations established thereunder.

In other words, in accordance with the regulations of the Secretary of Commerce. Now, not only has the Secretary of Commerce the right to say that the American Bureau of Shipping or some other bureau, like Lloyd's, shall do this, but in the event that either one is not available he may select for that purpose any officer of the Government, who may perform such service directly for the Secretary of Commerce. In other words, they fix the mark on the vessel, but the regulations are made by the Secretary of Commerce.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM] has expired. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of Commerce is hereby authorized and directed in respect of the vessels defined in section 1 (a) and (b) of this act and is hereby authorized in respect of the vessels defined in section 13 (c) of this act to establish by regulations from time to time the load water lines and marks thereof indicating the maximum depth to which such vessels may safely be loaded. Such regulations shall have the force of law.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent, in line 4, to strike out the numeral "3," so that it will read: "In respect of the vessels defined in section 1 (c) of this act."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 4, strike out the figures "13" and insert in lieu thereof the figure "1."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word just for the purpose of getting a little additional information in reference to the matter which I attempted to discuss with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SCOTT] heretofore. Does not the gentleman think that the first proviso, "Provided, that, at the request of the shipowner, the Secretary of Commerce shall appoint, for the purpose aforesaid, any other corporation or association," makes it unnecessary for the Secretary to have additional discretion of appointing some bureau of the Government to perform these services? If he can withhold his approval of the agency which the shipping owner selects, why is it necessary to give him the additional authority to indicate some officer of the Government to do it when he has already appointed the American Bureau to do it?

Mr. SCOTT. In the instance of a ship in a foreign port he might authorize the United States consul to perform this particular duty.

Mr. WALSH. Well, then, if he is going to have that authority with reference to ships in foreign ports where the American Bureau might not have a representative, it would seem to me that in cases such as that the shipowner should be entitled to select the agency to make that classification according to the regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Commerce, and should not be compelled to accede to the determination which the representative of the Secretary makes.

Mr. SCOTT. I will say to the gentleman that the enforcement of this legislation is left in the hands of the Secretary of Commerce. Now, I do not believe that the gentleman will argue, even to himself, that the Secretary of Commerce would not exercise common sense and decent judgment in connection with the carrying out of its provisions. It is with that view the authority was reposed in him, and, of course, if the gentleman thinks that power should have been placed somewhere else, then his ideas as to the methods of carrying out the bill are different from those of the committee. That is all there is to that. We have simply given the power to the Secretary of Commerce, and I can very readily see that if he wants to be unjust or unfairly arbitrary in carrying out its provisions he can.

Mr. WALSH. I think perhaps that may be true, but I do not think we ought to write legislation that will seek to encourage or permit that, and I think that while it is a splendid idea to have these ships marked and to encourage having it done under our law, the American shipowners have a little right; and legislation ought to be so framed as to protect them in cases of attempted unjust and arbitrary action on the part of the Government officials.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. Let me say this to the gentleman—and I am sure his objection is an honest one; I have always found his criticism to be well directed—that in many States the requirement as to automobile licenses is left largely in the discretion of the secretary of state. In many States—in fact, in most of the States—the application of certain provisions of the game laws is left within the discretion of the State game warden, such as the time of the year when the provisions of the law shall be in force. That applies not only to State laws but to Federal laws.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. What has that to do with the question I raised?

Mr. SCOTT. It has this to do with it: In this bill the application of its provisions is left largely in the discretion of the Secretary of Commerce, and the gentleman's objection is directed to the fact that the Secretary of Commerce may unfairly and unjustly exercise that discretion.

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. SCOTT. And I am endeavoring to direct the gentleman's attention, by contrast, to a number of instances in Federal and State laws where Federal and State officers are permitted under provisions of law to apply the same character of discretion.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, supplementing the remarks that I made a little while ago, I wish to say that from the newspapers we have been led to believe that with the tremendous energies the Government has devoted to shipbuilding we need now only to rest easy on our oars, confident that America with her great fleet is going to do the carrying trade of the world, but from figures recently published the cold facts warrant no such assurance.

Vessels in foreign trade entering our ports in the year ending June 30, 1919, aggregated 93,000,000 net tons carrying $10,000,000,000 worth of goods.

Now, of the 93,000,000 net tons, about 41,000,000 were American ships. But of this 41,000,000 tons of American ships 33,500,000 tons were devoted to the North American trade, leaving only 7,500,000 of American tonnage devoted to the overseas traffic, which carried about $1,000,000,000 worth of traffic.

So that while we had seven and one-half million tonnage, carrying $1,000,000,000 worth of our foreign overseas trade, 52,000,000 tonnage of foreign vessels carried $7,000,000,000 worth of our overseas trade.

In other words, we are carrying only one-seventh of our overseas trade in our own ships and the stress of competition has not yet come, and if we are to deliver ourselves from paying enormous tribute to foreign ships our merchant marine must be supported and protected most jealously.

The loudly vaunted "freedom of the high seas" is as "idle as a painted ship upon a painted ocean," so far as America is concerned, if we shall supinely permit the foreigner to drive the American flag from the ocean.

And with these observations I submit to your candid judgment a measure I have proposed. It is a bold announcement that we are in the game to stay and that America is going after the proud place her merchant marine once had in the world's carrying trade. [Applause.]

I reserve the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the owner and of the master of every vessel subject to this act and to the regulations established thereunder to cause the load line or lines so established to be permanently and conspicuously marked upon the vessel in such manner as the Secretary of Commerce shall direct, and to keep the same so marked. The Secretary of Commerce shall appoint the American Bureau of Shipping, or such other corporation or association for the survey or registry of shipping as may be selected by him, to determine whether the position and manner of marking on such vessels the load line or lines so established are in accordance with the provisions of this act and of the regulations established thereunder: Provided, however, That, at the request of the shipowner, the Secretary of Commerce shall appoint, for the purpose aforesaid, any other corporation or association for the survey or registry of shipping which the shipowner may select and the Secretary of Commerce approve; or the Secretary of Commerce may appoint for said purpose any officer of the Government, who shall perform such services as may be directed by the Secretary of Commerce. The Secretary of Commerce may, in his discretion, revoke any appointment made pursuant to this section. Such corporation, association, or officer shall, upon approving the position and manner of marking such load line or lines, issue a certificate in a form to be prescribed by the Secretary of Commerce, that the same are in accordance with the provisions of this act and of the regulations established thereunder, and shall deliver a copy thereof to the master of the vessel. It shall be unlawful for any vessel subject to this act and to said regulations to depart from her loading port or place without bearing such mark or marks, approved and certified by such corporation, association, or officer, and without having on board a copy of said certificate.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment on page 2, line 23, to strike out the word "shall" and insert the word "may."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WHITE of Maine: Page 2, line 23, strike out the word "shall" and insert in lieu thereof the word "may."

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, with the general purposes of this bill I am in entire accord, but this section 3 has bothered me somewhat. If gentlemen will refer to the language, they will note that in the first instance the section places the duty on the owner of the vessel to cause the load line to be marked on the vessel. Then the next sentence provides that the Secretary of Commerce shall—it is mandatory—"shall appoint the American Bureau of Shipping or such other corporation or association for the survey or registry of shipping as may be selected by him, to determine whether the position and manner of marking on such vessel the load line or lines so established are in accordance with the provisions of this act." Then comes the proviso, "Provided, however, That at the request of the shipowner the Secretary of Commerce shall appoint, for the purpose aforesaid, any other corporation or association for the survey or registry of shipping which the shipowner may select," and so forth.

Now, it seems to me that that proviso, as it is reported from the committee, is mandatory. It provides that the Secretary of Commerce, at the request of the shipowner, "shall" appoint for the purposes of registry such persons or corporations as the shipowner may select. To my mind this nullifies altogether, if it is heeded at all, the main part of the section, which directs that the Secretary of Commerce shall appoint the Board of American Shipping or other corporations to do this work. The purpose of this proviso, in my view, is to grant to the Secretary an option to make certain concessions to the shipowner, and if that construction is correct, the language ought to be permissive and not mandatory. It ought to be "may" rather than "shall."

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. TILSON). Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Yes.

Mr. SCOTT. I think there was more question in connection with that paragraph, as was aptly said by the gentleman, than there was in regard to any other. But in connection with that statement I think it would be well to refer to the provision on the top of page 3, which reads, "Or the Secretary of Commerce may appoint for said purpose any officer of the Government, who shall perform such services as may be directed by the Secretary of Commerce." It seems to me that that particular phraseology saves the situation in so far as directing any particular concern to do the work or giving any concern a monopoly of it.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, if you provide in the body of the section that the Secretary of Commerce shall designate the agencies named in the section to perform this work, and then by a proviso you authorize the owner to select somebody to do the work, and direct that the Secretary shall designate the person selected by the owner, you have got confusing and conflicting provisions in the same section. It seems to me that you are granting here in this proviso an option to the Secretary of Commerce to grant this concession to the shipowner.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maine has expired.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized.

Mr. SCOTT. Permit me to say to the gentleman that, in so far as the phraseology is concerned, his suggestion is very good, and I intend, so far as the committee is concerned, to accept the suggestion. But may I say to the gentleman that as to the word "shall," in line 22, although under the usual interpretation the word is mandatory, it is an old axiom that the language shall be taken as a whole to determine its meaning, and the subsequent language would unquestionably indicate the interpretation of the word "shall" to be not mandatory, but permissive. I desire to say that, so far as the committee are concerned, we will accept the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. What the gentleman has said renders my question unnecessary. In my judgment, it is a proper amendment.

Mr. SCOTT. Yes; and I had supposed that the amendment had been made. The gentleman made the identical suggestion in the committee, and I had assumed that the amendment had been made.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Maine.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, in line 9, on page 3, I move to strike out the word "are" and insert the word "is." You will see that there is a singular subject and a plural verb.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The word refers to the regulations, does it not?

Mr. SCOTT. No; it refers to the certificate which shall issue.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. (a) That if the owner or master of any vessel subject to this act and to the regulations established thereunder shall permit her to depart from her loading port or place without having complied with the provisions of section 3 of this act, he shall for each offense be liable to the United States in a penalty of $500. If the owner or master of any vessel exempted pursuant to section 5 of this act shall permit her to depart from her loading port or place without having the load line or lines required by the laws and regulations of the country to which she belongs marked upon her as required by said laws and regulations, he shall for each offense be liable to the United States in a penalty of $500. The Secretary of Commerce may, in his discretion, remit or mitigate any penalty imposed under this paragraph.

(b) If the master of any vessel subject to this act and to the regulations established thereunder, or of any foreign vessel exempted pursuant to section 5 of this act, shall fail, before departing from her loading port or place, to enter in the official log book of such vessel (if any) the statement required by section 6 of this act, he shall for each offense be liable to the United States in a penalty of $100. The Secretary of Commerce may in his discretion remit or mitigate any penalty imposed under this paragraph.

(c) If any person shall knowingly permit or cause or attempt to cause any vessel subject to this act and to the regulations established thereunder to depart, or if, being the owner, manager, agent, or master of such vessel he shall fail to take reasonable care to prevent her from departing from her loading port or place when loaded in violation of section 4 of this act; or if any person shall knowingly permit or cause or attempt to cause a foreign vessel exempted pursuant to section 5 of this act to depart, or if, being the owner, manager, agent, or master of such vessel he shall fail to take reasonable care to prevent her from departing from her loading port or place when loaded more deeply than permitted by the laws and regulations of the country to which she belongs, he shall in respect of each offense be guilty of a misdemeanor, unless her going to sea in such a condition was, under the circumstances, reasonable and justifiable; and shall be punished by a fine not to exceed $1,000 or by imprisonment not to exceed one year, or both, at the discretion of the court.

(d) If the master of any vessel or any other person shall knowingly permit or cause or attempt to cause any vessel to depart from any port or place in the United States or its possessions in violation of any order of detention made pursuant to section 7 of this act, he shall in respect of each offense be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be punished by a fine not to exceed $500 or by imprisonment not to exceed three months, or both, at the discretion of the court.

(e) If any person shall conceal, remove, alter, deface, or obliterate, or shall suffer any person under his control to conceal, remove, alter, deface, or obliterate any mark or marks placed on a vessel pursuant to this act or to the regulations established thereunder, except in the event of lawful change of said marks, or to prevent capture by an enemy, he shall, in respect of each offense, be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be punished by a fine not to exceed $1,000, or by imprisonment not to exceed one year, or both, in the discretion of the court.

(f) Whenever the owner, manager, agent, or master of a vessel shall become subject to a fine or penalty by way of money payment pursuant to the provisions of this act, the vessel shall also be liable therefor, and may be seized and proceeded against in the district court of the United States in any district in which such vessel shall be found.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the words, on page 7, line 17, "at the discretion of the court"; and in line 1, on page 8, the words "at the discretion of the court"; and in line 11, on page 8, the words "in the discretion of the court."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALSH: Page 7, line 17, after the word "both," strike out the words "at the discretion of the court"; and on page 8, line 1, after the word "both," strike out the words "at the discretion of the court"; and on page 8, line 11, after the word "both," strike out the words "in the discretion of the court."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, just a word. Of course this language is not at all necessary in writing a statute, and it is not customary to include these words, which do not at all affect the power of the court to impose either sentence or both. I think inasmuch as this committee has written laws carrying penalties before, without this language, it ought not to be carried here.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I do not see any objection to the amendment.

Mr. SCOTT. I have no objection to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That this act shall take effect six months after the date of its approval or at such earlier time as the Secretary of Commerce may fix.

Mr. WALSH. I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of an inquiry. What was the idea of giving the Secretary of Commerce authority to say that this act shall go into effect earlier than six months after the date of its approval? That is a rather unusual authority to vest in an administrative officer—to say when a law shall go into effect.

Mr. SCOTT. I will say to the gentleman that its only purpose is this: We could not make it immediately effective, because if we did there would be so many cases of remittance of fines in consequence of noncompliance with the law that it would create a very chaotic condition. But if it should develop that all the ships coming under the provisions of this act could comply with the law within six months, then the committee felt that the law should become operative and that the Secretary of Commerce should have power to so determine.

Mr. WALSH. That is equivalent to saying to the Secretary of Commerce, "You can say when this act shall go into effect."

Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the words on page 8, line 20, "or at such earlier time as the Secretary of Commerce may fix."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALSH: Page 8, line 20, after the word "approval," insert a period and strike out the following words: "or at such earlier time as the Secretary of Commerce may fix."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment because I doubt if it is wise in writing a law of this importance to vest in the Secretary of Commerce the authority to say just when this law shall go into effect. I do not know that we have any Secretary of Commerce just now. I understand his resignation has been handed in; but, whether that is so or not, ordinarily if we do not state in a law when it goes into effect, it goes into effect when it is approved, or when it is passed over the veto of the President. We do say in this law that it shall take effect six months after the date of its approval. Having said that, I doubt whether we should vest in the Secretary of Commerce the authority to say, three months after the date of its approval, that this law is in effect.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I apprehend there is nothing in this provision except that the Secretary of Commerce may need some little preliminary preparation for putting this law into effect, which he would not be able to do right away. It was supposed that it might take him six months; but if he found sooner that he was able to put it into force, the committee wished the law to go into effect as soon as possible. If the Secretary of Commerce is able to enforce the law sooner than six months, he himself will know it.

Mr. WALSH. Then why did not the committee write the language so as to provide that the law shall take effect when the Secretary of Commerce says it shall? I do not believe this is a good way to write a statute under which criminal penalties may be imposed. The Secretary of Commerce has no particular way of notifying the people of the United States when this law takes effect. He is not authorized to issue a proclamation, the same as the Secretary of State would be.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. It seems to me we have incorporated the substance of what the gentleman last suggested. It will go into effect just as soon as the Secretary is able to put it into effect.

Mr. WALSH. He has no way of letting the people of the country know when the law shall take effect. If he decides to put the law into effect sooner than six months, how will he notify the people who are concerned?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. How does he let people know of the promulgation of any of the regulations provided for by the department?

Mr. WALSH. The Secretary of Commerce issues regulations, and they are sent out through the various bureaus.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Why can not he issue notice as to the law going into effect the same as the regulations?

Mr. WALSH. I think my friend from Texas will agree that that is not a good way to notify people or the vessel owners of the country that the Secretary of Commerce hereby notifies you that a certain statute shall now take effect.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I am sure the committee has no particular pride in the phraseology of this law. However, I hesitate to accept the last amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts. I am sure the House only desires to formulate a sensible law. Let me suggest this, that if you strike out the words "or such earlier time as the Secretary of Commerce may fix," the provision will leave the act so that it will take effect six months after the day of approval. What is the situation? Every shipowner will take his good time to comply with the provisions of the law, up to the very last minute. He will say, "I have six months, and there is no occasion to hurry; I can do it next month or the month after." The result will be that at the last minute, the last hour, you will find 1,500 or 2,000 ships, that have not complied with the law, appealing for remittal of penalty.

Mr. GARRETT. That will be the fault of the shipowner and not ours.

Mr. SCOTT. Yes; it will be his fault, but I may say to the gentleman that if you say to the shipowner the law shall become effective in six months——

Mr. GARRETT. Thereby putting him on notice.

Mr. SCOTT. He will figure that there may not be such a crowd of work and that he can get his ship in.

Mr. GARRETT. We can not help that.

Mr. SCOTT. My thought is that the Department of Commerce will simply be flooded at the end of the six months with plausible excuses from shipowners asking for a remitment of the fine.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The committee would have made the bill operative at once after its approval if it did not involve the formulation of rules and regulations by which load lines on vessels shall be fixed. For that reason we say that the act shall not go into effect until six months after its passage unless an earlier time is fixed by the Secretary of Commerce. In other words, before it can become operative these rules and regulations must be made. When they are formulated they will be promulgated in the usual way and shipowners will have notice and a reasonable time to comply with them. The shipowners have knowledge of this legislation, and everybody in interest, so far as I am advised, agrees that this is all right except the gentleman from Massachusetts——

Mr. GARRETT. I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I wish to suggest to the gentleman from Missouri that there are others who agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts that it is not proper legislation, and I am one. It seems to me that it is certainly very bad form to pass a law and then designate some one to put it into effect.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOWELL. Yes.

Mr. SCOTT. In the gentleman's State of Iowa at the present moment you have a game law which provides that the State game warden shall designate the particular periods each year when the law shall become operative.

Mr. DOWELL. That is an entirely different proposition from this. This applies to all vessels, and it says if six months is not a proper time, the Secretary shall fix the time when it shall go into effect. I am not in favor of allowing any administrative officer to say when a law shall go into effect.

Mr. WELLING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOWELL. Yes.

Mr. WELLING. The Secretary of Commerce is to establish and provide when the regulations shall go into effect. That is written all through the law, that certain regulations are to be made for the execution of this act.

Mr. DOWELL. Those are the regulations provided for in the law.

Mr. WELLING. Why, if he can designate the time that the regulations go into effect, can he not designate the time the law should go into effect?

Mr. DOWELL. We ought to say when it shall go into effect ourselves and not designate some officer to tell shipowners when it goes into effect.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I suppose if we pass this law we will say when it goes into effect, and that is six months after its approval, unless sooner designated by the Secretary of Commerce. Ordinarily it would go into effect at once. But it is not practical for it to go into effect at once, although it is very desirable that it should, because the rules must be formulated and published.

Mr. DOWELL. If the gentleman wants it to go into effect at once, it should so provide, and then provide for the regulations going into effect. I am not in favor of submitting to any officer of the Government the right to put a law into effect without any provision as to what notice shall be served, or whether anybody will ever have a notice or not. That would be very dangerous indeed. I am heartily in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts and hope it will be adopted.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, this whole question of the load line as administered by Great Britain was for a long time a matter for the board of trade regulations. Now, this law can not be administered in a day. The committee did not know how long it would be before the regulations could be made. Regulations have to be formulated and notice given to the shipowners. As stated by the gentleman from Michigan, there is no more reason against permitting him to provide when the law shall go into effect and become operative than there is against his saying when the regulations prescribed under it shall become operative.

That can only be done when he makes the regulations and notifies the party. The Board of Trade of Great Britain for a long time administered their load-line law by virtue of rules and regulations which they made and notified the shipowners of. It is simply impossible for the committee to tell just when this act should be complied with, and we want it complied with as soon as possible. Is not that the substance of the whole thing?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I would like to join my voice in protesting against this form of legislation. It is a pernicious form to say that a penal statute shall go into effect and become operative when some administrative officer says it may do so. The act provides a penalty. It is the duty of the committee to ascertain when the act ought to be made operative. If a reasonable time must be allowed, then make that the time in which it shall become operative, and let the legislative function be exercised by this body, and not delegated to an administrative officer. Every man in this House will understand that there is a marked distinction between making rules and regulations and saying when a criminal statute shall become operative. Rules and regulations apply only to the administration of the law, but the statute itself, which imposes the penalty, ought to be fixed as to time and made definite and certain.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SNELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 3621, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en grosse.

The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SCOTT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will continue the calling of the committees.

EXTENSION OF PASSPORT CONTROL.

The Clerk called the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I call up the bill (H. R. 9782) to regulate further the entry of aliens into the United States.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts, by direction of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, calls up the bill H. R. 9782, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar. Under the rule the House will automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for its consideration, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 9782, with Mr. FESS in the chair.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, shortly after the United States declared the existence of a state of war with Germany the officers of the Government who were charged with controlling seditious and unlawful practices in this country, especially by the declared enemies of the country, found themselves very much embarrassed by the absence of any law which enabled them to exercise the necessary control. By means of the existing regulations with reference to passports, they did what they could to exclude undesirable persons from overseas who sought entry into this country, and similarly to some extent to exert control over persons in this country who desired to go abroad for unlawful purposes. That control really began under Executive order in July, 1917. It was found exceedingly unsatisfactory and inadequate, and as the war progressed and as problems of this nature increased in number and in importance the officers of the Government found themselves continually handicapped and embarrassed in seeking to achieve the results necessary for the adequate protection of the United States.

Therefore, in the spring of 1918, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD], who was then the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, introduced a bill, H. R. 10264, for the establishment by law of a passport-control system. The Committee on Foreign Affairs held hearings upon that bill in February and in March, 1918. It was a noteworthy and an interesting fact, in the judgment of the committee, that at those hearings appeared the representatives of six of the executive branches of the Government, all calling the attention of the Congress to the emergency, and all asking that for the common welfare legislation of this kind should be enacted. Those departments which were directly concerned in securing legislation included the Department of State, the War Department, the Navy Department, the Department of Justice, the Treasury Department, and the Department of Labor. All joined in urgent representations as to the necessity for the legislation.

A bill was presented to the House as a result and was passed by the House and later enacted into law on the 22d of May, 1918. I think that in the main the workings of that law have been beneficent. Doubtless in times of stress like those of the last year and a half there have been individual cases of hardship, perhaps individual cases of injustice, which have resulted from the administration of the law. But on the whole, speaking very generally, I doubt if any Member of this House will question the extreme usefulness of that law during the days of war.

The law, however, by its terms, becomes inoperative with the promulgation of the treaty of peace. We hope that that day is not far distant. The question is whether Congress shall continue the law to a period beyond the promulgation of the treaty of peace or whether it shall allow the law to lapse and thus permit a return to previous conditions, during which there was no law whatever to control the movement of persons entering and leaving the United States. The Secretary of State and the President of the United States have both urged upon Congress that there should be a continuance of that law for a period of at least a year, in so far as persons coming to the United States are concerned. The old law—the existing law—provides a passport-control system, roughtly speaking, in the case of four different classes: First, outgoing Americans—that is, Americans leaving the United States; second, outgoing aliens; third, incoming Americans; and fourth, incoming aliens. The old law, as I say, covered the four classes. The recommendation of the State Department is that, in so far as the first two classes were concerned, namely, the outgoing travelers, whether alien or American, the law could safely be allowed to lapse; but the State Department recommends that the law be continued for one year in so far as persons coming into the United States are concerned, whether they be aliens or Americans. On that question the Committee on Foreign Affairs felt a good deal of doubt. There were undoubtedly administrative difficulties in the way of requiring passports of aliens entering the United States and of allowing to enter free of passports American citizens returning to the United States. But on the whole, and recognizing these difficulties, the committee felt that it was wiser to abrogate altogether when peace came any restriction over the movement of Americans who sought to leave the United States or who sought to enter the United States. The committee felt, in other words, that when the war came to an end it was important that we should get rid of all the vexatious, embarrassing, and technical requirements which it was possible to avoid. And we felt that if we adopted a restriction as to incoming aliens we were doing all that was necessary for the common safety.

It is probably true that for a long time to come American citizens who seek to travel in foreign countries will find it almost essential to supply themselves with passports before they leave, because, as the Secretary of State and others testified, the other nations of the world, and especially the great belligerent powers of Europe, will deem it necessary to continue a very strict supervision of tourists within their shores and will therefore require any American citizen who comes to visit them to equip himself with a passport. In other words, just as before the European war an American traveler going to Russia or Turkey found it necessary to have a passport or be refused admission to those countries altogether, so for the next year or two an American citizen who desires to go to Great Britain, or to France, or to Switzerland, or to Spain will probably find himself confronted with the requirements local to those countries which will make it essential that he should have an American passport in his possession in order to secure ingress and egress.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. In just one moment.

But admitting that situation, it seemed to the committee that as far as our law was concerned, it was better to free American travelers from that necessity. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I entirely agree with the gentleman though perhaps I would go further. I wanted to ask upon what the State Department based its conclusion that this passport regulation would still be in force after the conclusion of peace?

Mr. ROGERS. The Secretary of State asserted that conclusion as a result of his conference with the representatives of the other powers in Paris. He expressed his opinion as to which he said he could not make any positive prediction, that regulation of travel by foreign countries would continue in effect at least for two years after the treaty of peace.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is aware, of course, of how much time, restraint, and hindrance this puts upon the rapid transaction of business. The gentleman, I have no doubt, has had occasion to have passports attended to. Did the committee take that into consideration?

Mr. ROGERS. The committee took into consideration the inconvenience which has undoubtedly confronted American travelers in the past in seeking to get their passports and the delay that has been attendant upon the procuring of those passports. The gentleman should, I think, in that connection bear in mind this fact, that in the past, and especially during the period when we were actually at war, it has been necessary to scrutinize with very great care every application for a passport that was presented to the State Department. The necessary investigation frequently took a considerable period. But within the last few weeks, say within the last 60 or 90 days, the preliminary investigation required has been practically abrogated by the State Department. The Director of the Division of Passport Control of the Department, who testified before the committee in connection with this bill, said that at this time the department is issuing passports within a period of three days after the application is received. And I think the gentleman's experience, certainly my own experience, has been that when there was a real emergency and when a Member of Congress was consulted by a constituent, we could get action within three days. That was true even at a time when a longer period was normally necessary than we are informed is now requisite.

There is a typical class of travel which has been very seriously embarrassed by passport restrictions during the last year and a half or two years, and that is the travel to Cuba. Cuba in many respects is almost a part of the United States itself, and certainly the geographical nearness of Cuba is such as to make it desirable to have the utmost facility of travel.

If this law should be continued so to apply to American citizens, it would be necessary in the future—as far as the law went, at least—to exact a passport from every American leaving the United States for Cuba. Cuba, on the other hand, will not exact these strict passport requirements in the future, which, as I have said, will be characteristic of the European countries. And so by abrogating the provisions of the law, in so far as American citizens are concerned, we shall be able to restore the freest possible communication on the part of Americans desiring to go to Cuba and on the part of Cubans desiring to come to the United States. That reason, it seems to me, is an additional one for departing from the recommendation of the Department of State and for freeing all American citizens leaving or entering this country from the necessity of providing themselves with a passport.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Certainly.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I see from a press report—how true it is I do not know—that at as early a date as possible there are 10,000,000 German citizens who will make an effort to come to this country as quickly as they are permitted to come. Is there anything in this legislation by which our Government will have control over that situation and to deny to those people, if we decide we do not want them here at this time, the privilege of coming to this country and becoming citizens, or will we have to go through the Immigration Committee and pass additional immigration legislation?

Mr. ROGERS. This law will give the State Department power to exclude every one of those men.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I think that after the treaty of peace is signed this law will give the State Department the power to check and hold back, for the purpose of investigation, all those men. The real holding of them out of the country is under the immigration laws of the United States.

Mr. ROGERS. I said, in answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. YOUNG], "this law." I should have said "this bill," because the existing law completely lapses when the treaty of peace is proclaimed. But this bill requires that every alien who seeks to come to the United States shall do two things, at least. First, he shall supply himself with a passport from his own Government. That Government may grant it or withhold it, as it sees fit. Second, he must present that passport, after issuance, to the American consular officer at the port whence he seeks to depart for the United States. That American consular officer can grant a visé on that passport, and thereby give him permission to embark, or he may, at his pleasure, withhold that visé, and prevent him from departing. But if he gets the opportunity to start for the United States and crosses the ocean, then when he presents himself at our port of entry, New York, or Galveston, or Boston, or wherever it may be, he must then pass the usual exactions of the immigration law, just exactly as if this law had not been in effect. And in point of fact, in a great many cases during the existence of this law, the immigration authorities at our ports have turned back men who had been granted the visé by the American consular officers abroad. What this proposal does, in other words, is to apply two sieves to the alien who wants to come to the United States instead of one.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield for a further statement?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The question asked by the gentleman from Texas would indicate that 10,000,000 Germans were seeking to come to the United States. Perhaps certain printed reports have indicated that. I think it ought to be made clear in that regard that reports indicate that a great number of Germans desire to emigrate as soon as permitted to do so, the number being estimated at 10,000,000. They are seeking to come to the American Continent, including three South American countries and the United States.

Mr. ROGERS. The South American countries to which the Germans are said to want to come as soon as the opportunity presents itself are Peru, Chile, and Argentina.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; and both Peru and the Argentine Republic have established severe passport systems for incoming aliens.

Mr. EMERSON. I notice that this bill does not really legislate, but it gives the President authority to create rules. Why is it the committee could not have written some regulations in the bill?

Mr. ROGERS. The position of the committee was this: That this passport-control law had been in effect something over a year; it had depended, as the gentleman from Ohio suggests, upon administrative regulations to make it effective; that those administrative regulations had been applied and had proven effective; that the situation in the future, while it will be extremely important to control the class of people that shall be allowed to enter our country, necessarily will be less critical and crucial than in the war months that have already gone by; that the proper function of the Committee on Foreign Affairs was not to attempt to establish an immigration policy through the recommendations in this bill, but simply to tide over the existing law until such time as the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization of the House, which is already engaged upon this problem, should have an opportunity to report and present its recommendations to Congress.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. KING. Under the law suggested by the gentleman from Ohio, does not the gentleman think we are going somewhat afield in giving up our powers to legislate and passing them over to the Executive in this country, and was there not any way in which the committee could keep this matter within the control of Congress? I have just been reading a book by George Kennan on Siberia, and I find this bill is like a Russian bill. It used to be that if the Secretary of the Interior should find the public safety required, he should do so-and-so. It seems another brush being piled on the power of autocracy.

Mr. ROGERS. In answer to the gentleman from Illinois, I desire to point out that this is simply a makeshift, after all. It does not purport to be anything more. It extends a law that has worked well for a period of one year, unless Congress shall see fit to take action in the meantime.

I do not think that the gentleman need entertain any fear that this law will be applied too strictly by the Department of State. My own fear is that the law will not be applied strictly enough. [Applause.] I am very much more concerned with the apprehension that the department will let in people that they should not admit than that it will exclude people who ought to come in.

Mr. KING. I agree with the gentleman on that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Let me make a statement right there. I would like to make it very clear here that the emergency passport control extended for one year is not intended to actually supersede the immigration laws. The State Department desires to act in accord with these laws. I will make this still more clear by reading from the instructions of the State Department to its consuls. I read from paragraph 14:

(14) Aliens to be informed of regulations: In order to prevent or avoid, so far as possible, the hardships and dangers involved in deportation under present conditions, the diplomatic and consular officer to whom a passport is presented for visé shall ascertain to the fullest extent practicable whether the holder is a member of any one of the classes excluded from the United States by provisions of section 3 of the immigration act of February 5, 1917. If in the judgment of such official the alien is a member of such a class, he shall so advise the alien, informing him of the serious risk he is assuming in attempting to enter the United States; but if the alien, nevertheless, insists on proceeding, the officer shall visé the passport, if it is valid, and if there is no evidence that the alien is inimical to the United States, but shall place upon the alien's declaration the notation, "Advised that he will probably be rejected and deported." In such a case the consul making the notation shall write upon the declaration, to be sent to the proper immigration official in the United States, a statement of his reasons for making it.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I would like to ask the gentleman this question: During the period of the war the Secretary of Labor permitted certain aliens to come into the United States for purposes of agriculture.

Mr. ROGERS. Yes; "seasonal" immigrants.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Recently he permitted them to come in until the 1st of January, or until peace was declared. He permitted them to come into Texas and Arizona and New Mexico. What effect will this bill have on the order of the Secretary of Labor, or will he under his discretion permit aliens to come in from Mexico? I will ask the gentleman, Will that be left with the Secretary of Labor or with the Secretary of State?

Mr. ROGERS. The discretion under this bill will be exactly as it has been since May, 1918. In other words, this bill does very little more than reenact almost verbatim, and with certain exceptions which I will explain in a moment, the existing law.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will that permit the Secretary of State to allow aliens to come from Mexico into Texas and Arizona and New Mexico, not permanently, but for a short time?

Mr. ROGERS. I can only repeat that it will leave the situation exactly as it is now.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. What facilities have our diplomatic and consular representatives for ascertaining and finding out the qualifications and character of these people who apply for passports?

Mr. ROGERS. During the European war the so-called intelligence side of the Department of State was developed just as the intelligence side of the War Department was developed and that of the Navy Department. In other words, it has been the business of the Secretary of War and his subordinates and the business of the Secretary of the Navy and his subordinates, to acquaint themselves with intelligence matters, to procure information concerning the character of the people in this country and in other countries. Similarly, it has become a function of the State Department to supply itself with information concerning the character of persons living in or coming from other countries of the world and their danger to our institutions. The State Department has built up an elaborate intelligence organization. I may say to the gentleman that, in my judgment, that has been one of the great safeguards during the war which has enabled the department to withstand the applications of men who have sought to come to the United States but who were not worthy to come to the United States.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. According to the information we have, there is going to be a flood of applications for passage to America from probably every country in Europe, and especially from central Europe. Is it the opinion of the gentleman that they have sufficient force to get at the character of each immigrant as he applies for a passport?

Mr. ROGERS. They certainly have not a sufficient force at this time. That leads me to a point that I intended to discuss later, but which I will discuss now, and that is the importance of providing an adequate appropriation for carrying on this work. If we pass this law and do not give a sufficient fund for its administration, it would be better if we had not passed the law at all, because the law will simply be winked at and there will be no effective way to enforce it.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. It would be absolutely essential to make the law effective?

Mr. ROGERS. It certainly would be. The testimony before the committee is that it will cost something like $75,000 a month for the proper enforcement of this law all over the world, because, gentlemen, bear in mind that at every port from which men and women emigrate to the United States we must have this system of passport control. It has cost a great deal of money in the past, but it will cost more in the future, because immigration has very materially increased already and will increase still more. In the month of July, 1918, only 12,800 aliens entered our shores. In the month of August, 1919, which is the last month for which I have figures, 32,000 aliens arrived in the United States. That means something like 375,000 aliens in a year. We all know that before the European War began there were a million and a quarter immigrants coming annually to the United States. That condition, if it is not kept in check, will be repeated in the future.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. I will yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I want to ask the gentleman if this bill, when it becomes a law, will empower the Secretary of State to restrict in any way Americans who desire to leave the jurisdiction of the United States or prevent American citizens who happen to be in some other country from coming back to the United States?

Mr. ROGERS. This bill has nothing whatever to do with American citizens.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Another question: Will it empower the Secretary of State to restrict the emigration of aliens now in this country back to their home country?

Mr. ROGERS. This bill has nothing to do with the departure of anybody from the United States. It refers simply to incoming aliens.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Now, are there any other classes of people that the committee is after except dangerous propagandists and that class of people?

Mr. ROGERS. That is primarily the class at which this bill is aimed.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I am very much in favor of the purpose of this bill, but I want to get some information as to just how far the Secretary of State can go in giving our consular agents instructions to go into the record of passport applicants and passport holders.

Mr. ROGERS. The Secretary of State can give any kind of instructions he wants to give to our consular agents. He can refuse visés for any reason or for no reason. But in that connection I think it is important to notice what the policy of the Secretary of State will be, and I call attention to the testimony of the Secretary of State himself, which is reprinted on page 5 of the report:

The CHAIRMAN. * * * Assuming that this act is limited to incoming aliens, what would be the policy of the department, if you are prepared to indicate, as to dealing with immigrants who apply for visés from the various parts of Europe? Would you expect to grant a visé to everyone who could prove himself not dangerous to public morals or society, or what would be the scheme by which visés would be granted or withheld?

Secretary LANSING. Of course, so far as the Department of State is concerned, it would be, as far as could be determined, the character of the individual and whether he was a proper one to admit to entry into this country.

The CHAIRMAN. His political character or his personal character?

Secretary LANSING. Well, it might be both. For example, if I were considering an anarchist it would be his political character, or if I were considering the case of a criminal, that would be his personal character. So both enter into the problem.

The CHAIRMAN. And the State Department would deal with both?

Secretary LANSING. As far as possible. But, of course, the immigration authorities would have the ultimate say when he reached this country.

The CHAIRMAN. Would you attempt to exercise that control as part of a general policy indicating how much immigration should come to the United States?

Secretary LANSING. Not at all, unless we had a request from the immigration authorities. I assume, so far as that is concerned, we would adopt in general their rules.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, this law would give you the power to choke immigration off completely if you chose to exercise it?

Secretary LANSING. Of course; and that is the very thing I wanted to point out, that that is a matter for Congress and not a matter for the Department of State, and we would adopt very closely the immigration rules, I think.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, you would simply aim to exclude the unfit?

Secretary LANSING. Yes, sir; the unfit.

The CHAIRMAN. You will not try to regulate the rise and fall of the immigration tide through the medium of this act?

Secretary LANSING. Not at all.

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KELLER. I should like to ask if the gentleman has any information about the 32,000 who came in last month—from what country most of them came?

Mr. ROGERS. A very large part of them came from Canada. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON], who is going to address the committee later, has these figures more in detail than I have, and very likely he will give the gentleman the information he desires.

Mr. PARRISH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. PARRISH. Does the gentleman think it will be the policy of the State Department to prohibit immigration from the countries with which we have been at war during the period that this bill is effective?

Mr. ROGERS. I am voicing only my own opinion when I say that I think the Department of State will look askance at immigration coming from Germany for some time to come.

Mr. PARRISH. Does not the gentleman as a member of the committee think that immigration from Germany ought to be prohibited absolutely for a certain period of time?

Mr. ROGERS. Irrespective of what I think, the committee apprehended that this bill is not the place to do it. As I said a few minutes ago, the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization is preparing a general scheme of amendments to our immigration laws, and the Committee on Foreign Affairs thought that in that bill should be carried the legislation which the gentleman recommends.

Mr. PARRISH. Another question: Has the gentleman any information as to when that committee will give the House a chance to vote on a general bill that will control immigration?

Mr. ROGERS. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON], chairman of the committee, the author of the bill which originally brought this question to the attention of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, is to address the committee in a few moments, and I have no doubt he will be able to deal very satisfactorily with that point.

Mr. PARRISH. I thank the gentleman. As a Member of Congress I feel that we ought to take hold of this immigration question at once, especially of immigration from the enemy countries, and protect America while we have the opportunity to do so. [Applause.]

Mr. BOX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BOX. In answer to a question by my colleague [Mr. HUDSPETH], the gentleman said this act would leave the present law unchanged as to the right of the Secretary of Labor to admit Mexicans across the Texas border, or across other borders, for present industrial uses.

Mr. ROGERS. That is true.

Mr. BOX. The right to do that is exercised now under the claim of a war power. Are we to understand that this act will continue or extend that so-called war power, so that it can be done next year, for instance?

Mr. ROGERS. This bill extends the law so as to exclude incoming aliens, if in the discretion of the Secretary of State they ought to be kept out. The Secretary of State testified before the committee that the relations between the State Department and the Labor Department in enforcing this law had been of the friendliest possible character, and that they would doubtless work completely in harmony in the future. If the Secretary of Labor has in the past been willing to acquiesce in the gentleman's contention, I should suppose he would continue to do so in the future.

Mr. BOX. I am opposed to that action, and wanted to know that it was soon to be discontinued. The other gentleman from Texas takes the other view of it. But the question I wanted to have settled, if it could be settled, is whether or not this will continue in the Secretary of Labor the power to admit these aliens across the border as an exercise of the war power?

Mr. ROGERS. The right to keep out anyone is with the Secretary of State. The permission to admit anyone is also with the Secretary of State, both in the present act and in the proposed extension.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. LINTHICUM. A minute ago the gentleman said it had cost about $75,000 a month to enforce this law.

Mr. ROGERS. I said it was estimated that it would cost about $75,000 a month.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Does not the gentleman think he ought to state also that that amount will be fully covered by the fees collected under the law, so that it is actually no expense to the Government?

Mr. ROGERS. I am glad to have the gentleman make that statement. The fact is that this service is completely self-supporting. Every passport issued by the department costs the person obtaining it $2, including in the $2 the fee for the application and the fee for issuing the passport. Every visé that is granted on a passport of an alien brings in $2. The testimony is that for the last two years, even when the tide of immigration was very low, the total receipts from the passport service amounted to between $700,000 and $800,000. With a larger tide of immigration, of course, that amount will be very materially increased. In other words, the more money we expend wisely and reasonably under this legislation the more money we shall have returned in the form of fees for passports and visés.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. FLOOD. I am not.

The CHAIRMAN. If no one opposed to the bill wishes to speak the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me the law which we propose under bill H. R. 9782, a continuation of the existing law regarding the further entrance of aliens into the United States, is essential at this time, especially when we recognize the amount of anarchy and socialism and unrest throughout the countries of Europe, to say nothing of our own country. One can readily see how essential some law by which discretion can be exercised is to the peace and comfort of our people. The law which we have been acting under and which was passed in May of 1918 has worked exceedingly well. A splendid organization has grown up under that law, and many undesirable people have been kept from our shores. It is true that the immigration officials might have turned some of them back, but when you realize the cost of transportation, when you realize when a person once gets into the country the damage he can cause, even though he has not landed except at the immigration station, we can readily see that it is highly essential that he be not allowed to board the ship for America.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. What is the gentleman's opinion of making a provision like this permanent?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I do not see the necessity for a law of this kind being permanent. When we approach the termination of this law I think we can better decide whether we want to prolong it. The Secretary of State has certain discretionary power aside from this law now on the statute books which we propose to prolong for another year by this bill. I do not think Congress would be willing to put on the statute books a law of this nature for a longer period of time than one year. Congress can find out at the expiration of that time whether it is necessary to continue it longer. It is true that the Secretary of State is given wide discretion under this law, but we must also remember that the Secretary has had this wide discretion for the past year, during the war, and that he has exercised it wisely and well. I do not believe there has been complaint from anyone that the Secretary has excluded any person who should have been allowed to come to our country, and I am quite sure that there will not be during the coming year.

There has been some little change made in the law to which I do not think attention has been called. In section 2 we have reduced the fine from $10,000 to $5,000 and the imprisonment from 20 years to 5 years. The committee thought that was sufficient, now that we are not at war, and we thought the other rather heavy.

I want to say to the committee, in reference to allowing our people to come in without showing their passports, that I do not agree with some of the members of the committee upon that for several reasons. I believe it is not harmful to an American citizen to show his passport when he comes back to this country. When he goes to France he can not enter without a passport, and he can not go to England or Belgium or any other country without a passport. Therefore he must necessarily take a passport with him.

Then what is the trouble with showing his passport when he comes home? It is a heap easier and better, it seems to me, for him to show his passport than to be questioned as to whether he is an American citizen or how long he has been away or have any doubt cast upon his coming in. I think it would be better and easier and more comfortable and pleasant for him just simply to show his passport and pass on than perhaps for him to be under suspicion as to whether he is an American citizen or not.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I will.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Are not there citizens of the United States who have been in foreign countries, in South America, Canada, China, and European countries for years in business, without passports?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Absolutely so; those people are there without passports. I hope they have all conducted themselves well. I hope none of them have become socialists or anarchists or disturbers; and any man, if he wants it, can get a passport from the consul in those countries, and it will be no trouble to show it.

Mr. RAMSEYER. But if a citizen of the United States has gone wrong in a foreign country while living there, is it not our duty to take care of the American citizen who has gone wrong rather than to force him upon some friendly people to take care of him?

Mr. LINTHICUM. If he has gone wrong in another country, I think I would like for him to stay there in the country where he went wrong.

Mr. RAMSEYER. That country may not be responsible for his going wrong and——

Mr. LINTHICUM. Well, I think if the Secretary of State had to rule on a case of that kind, he would be treated right. However, the majority of the committee thought it would be a hardship upon many Americans who are abroad to compel them to show their passports and the committee adopted this bill, I believe, unanimously. There is one thing I want to speak of before I close, and that is the appropriation of $600,000.

The Secretary of State asked for $850,000, and the committee cut it down to $600,000. I do not know for what reason, except perhaps that they think these departments always ask for more than they expect, so that they will get what they need; perhaps that is the reason. However, I do want to say that the work which is required of this passport division in Paris and of the consuls in the other countries has become enormous. One can not realize what they are up against, as a fellow would say, unless he sees them. It was my pleasure to be in Paris this summer at the passport division in Paris. I went there one day to visit the director, Mr. Reed, and the stairway and the second floor were so crowded and the hallway leading to the stairway so crowded that it was a matter of absolute impossibility for me to reach him. I would not have reached him during the whole day had it not been for the janitor, who kindly took me to a back stairway and carried me through the janitor's kitchen to the corridor and finally landed me in Mr. Reed's office. That only goes to show what these men are doing in granting passports and viséing passports for people going to other parts of Europe and to return. It seems to me that an appropriation of $600,000 is certainly not too much, and I hope the committee has not made a mistake in making it too low, because we need more people; we need a larger force, longer office hours, and Congress should grant them some leeway in these matters. I have seen people come there for several days before they could finally reach the clerk to get a passport or have one viséed, and when you realize you can not go from one country to another without having a passport and having it viséed, and you can not come back to the country you left without having it viséed, you can readily see what these men have to do and how they have to work. They certainly need more clerks and need a larger force and need shifts. This is not a bad investment for the United States Government, because the fees which are derived from the viséing of passports more than cover the entire expense. I am told they more than covered it last year by something over $2,000,000, so that the sums collected from people who want to come to the United States and want to go abroad, and received from other bureaus of the department and other fees which are collected, more than pay the expenses. I think it is a very good bill, and I think it should be passed as quickly as possible to grant the relief which those people are crying for and which the State Department needs so badly. [Applause.]

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, early in September I introduced House joint resolution 205, to provide that the provisions of the act of Congress approved the 22d day of May, 1918, entitled "An act to prevent in time of war departure from and entry into the United States contrary to the public safety," are, so far as they relate to entry into the United States, continued for one year after peace has been concluded with the Central Powers of Europe.

The present bill from the Committee on Foreign Affairs is the development of that resolution, and I beg to say that the resolution itself was not introduced until after much inquiry.

When this session of Congress organized on the 19th day of May and I found myself honored with the chairmanship of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, I asked the State Department as to the necessity for the enactment of a law which would continue the present passport system in relation to incoming aliens. That resulted, commencing on June 6, in bringing reports from United States diplomatic and consular agents throughout the world to the Committee on Immigration.

These reports have been extremely interesting. You will find some of them in the report made accompanying this bill. But there is one report on the condition in Vienna, Austria, which clearly shows the situation in that country. Austria has been reduced in size and left with about 6,000,000 population, of which 2,400,000 are in Vienna. Chances for work there are greatly lessened. Military officers are without any kind of work, clerks without employment. Skilled workers in many lines of industry find no demand for their labor. Unrest is general. It is apparent that those will seek other homes. Some regard South America as promising, others look to the Near East, some will probably go to Czechoslovakia or to Jugoslavia, but the great bulk of this dissatisfied population looks toward the United States with hopefulness. The report says:

It is saddening to feel compelled in duty bound to call attention to this possible exodus, and to suggest that Congress should consider whether America is to be a place of refuge for thousands of war sufferers, technically still our enemies, or whether our own interests require us to prohibit such immigration. Much of the human material available for immigration is of the most promising kind, but some of it is permeated with Bolshevism, with radical revolutionary ideas that will not graft on American civilization, and some are otherwise unsuited to become settlers.

Reports from Germany coming out by way of Stockholm indicate that a great number of German citizens intend to emigrate as soon as permitted to do so. The best estimates place the number at 10,000,000. Reliable information indicates that the Swedish Legation in Berlin and the Swedish consulates in Hamburg and Lubeck together recently refused to file 60,000 applications to visé passports in one month. These 60,000 applications were made by heads of families and included whole families. The Swedish Government has perfected a plan of restriction, which, while applying generally to all foreign nationalities, has been devised with the purpose of controlling the forthcoming exodus from Germany.

It is stated that the requests in Berlin for permission to leave indicate a desire to go to Argentine, Chile, and Peru, and to the United States. I have reports which show that Peru and the Argentine have recently passed laws requiring passports to be held by all who come in, and designed to check immigration.

Of course, it is not possible for any considerable proportion of the estimated 10,000,000 emigrants from Germany to get out in one year or even two years. Steamship accommodations are not available. Nor is it likely that the bulk of that number could reach the United States.

However, it is interesting to note that so many applications by Italians are on hand for passports from Italian ports and other parts of the world, including the United States, that all ships available will be used by Italy and that German emigration will most of it go out via Holland.

Reports from London indicate that Bolshevik authorities in Russia are acquiring genuine American passports, intending to use them to send their agents to the United States and elsewhere. British authorities will retain certain control over persons leaving England.

The minister to The Hague believes that agitators—Bolsheviks and propagandists—will continue actively at work. It is likely that other countries will try to get rid of these persons and that the worst of them will go to the country to which the entry is easiest and where there is the least to explain. Still another report says that hundreds of soldiers from enemy countries, especially those of the reserve who were called into the war from civil life and whose previous occupations are lost by the war, will if permitted to do so emigrate to America and avail themselves of the opportunity denied to them in their own country.

The United States may be said to have suffered less economically and her labor less disturbed by the war than any other country. She has in part retained her status quo ante.

Consequently, unless the countries of Europe prohibit the emigration or unless the United States prohibit the immigration, we may expect a large influx of aliens who should be provided with passports with their photographs attached thereto as now and the continuation of the viséing by a United States diplomatic officer at the country where issued, also at the port of embarkation, in order to enable the Government to be sure that the alien seeking admission is the person he represents himself to be.

The return to the United States of enemy aliens or those who have been forced to leave the United States since the beginning of the war is undersirable. Hundreds of these men are known to our secret service and to the military and naval intelligence bureaus. Many of them are under assumed names.

A report from Tokyo, in part, is as follows:

Labor conditions in America, together with financial prosperity, are attracting large number of alien workers, political theorists, and undesirables which in various warring countries will undoubtedly increase upon demobilization.

I have received some reports from Yokohama which indicate that several thousand aliens from all parts of the world are there awaiting the signing of the peace treaty so that they can make their way to the United States.

Many of these aliens in Yokohama and elsewhere are Russians and a considerable number are evaders of military service, both in their own country and in the United States, who have lived in the United States for varying terms of years without attempting to become citizens. Those people most certainly should not be allowed to return to the United States after deserting it in time of war. [Applause.]

A further report says Japan is being used as the center for spreading Bolshevism and Bolshevik propaganda. Russian musical artists are among those used as agents. The number of refugees reaching Japan is increasing rapidly, and a great influx of aliens from Siberia is expected as conditions there become worse.

Most of the above who have sufficient money are trying in every way possible to reach the United States, and as many of them are politically active and are dissatisfied with any form of organized government it would be disastrous to allow them to gain admission to the United States. It is further reported that the Japanese Government is much concerned over the situation.

And here is one report which I think should be printed in every newspaper of the land for the benefit of certain people who have been giving ear to the vicious doctrine that individual opportunity is lost in the United States. The American ambassador at Madrid reports under date of June 7:

There are many Bolsheviks, other agitators, Germans, and other undesirables in Spain who can best be prevented by control at point of departure from going to what is generally considered the land of opportunity.

Oh, my friends, they know, just as we know, that the United States is the land of opportunity. Why these agitators want to come here from all the disturbed countries of Europe and help destroy us is more than I can say. But I do know why it is that when they once get here and we try to deport them they resist to the last going out, because they know that this is the land of the greatest opportunity in all the world. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In one minute; after I get through with one more report. Dispatches from the American Legation in Switzerland make the following recommendation and say that the supervision of passports for aliens is vitally necessary. This legation adds:

The ease with which aliens from the Central Powers and elsewhere may become naturalized in Switzerland and the danger that they are seeking to go to the United States render restrictions in the United States necessary for a long time to come.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield now for a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. For just a brief one.

Mr. COOPER. Can the gentleman tell the House why it is that some of these alien agitators who are here now, like Emma Goldman and her stripe, are not deported by this country?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The authorities have been trying for many years to deport Emma Goldman. Actual proceedings are now pending.

House joint resolution No. 205, to extend war passport provisions for one year, did not go to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, but because the previous war act had been passed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs it went there. The present bill went to that committee also, although its title would indicate that it was a bill for the Committee on Immigration. But no matter. The Department of Labor is in full accord with this proposed act, and the regulations which are issued for the incoming of aliens under passports are issued jointly by the State Department and the Department of Labor.

With regard to forthcoming immigration legislation, I am asked every day by Members when we can expect some kind of restrictive legislation. I would like to say that the committee is working hard on matters of both immigration and naturalization, and that the bills which have been introduced carry many varying ideas and refer to many difficult problems. Amendments are necessary to the present naturalization laws. In the last Congress, Members will remember, Representative Burnett, then chairman of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, reported out a bill providing for the suspension of immigration for four years, and it was thought then if it could be reached on the Calendar it would be passed without great opposition. That was the feeling then. But an analysis of that bill disclosed that the exempted classes were so many that we might go through the form of making a suspension of immigration for four years, and that after we had admitted all of the exempted classes, including relatives of those now here, we would have suspended only a limited number. I introduced at the beginning of this session a bill suspending immigration for two years, and found it subject to the same objections.

Now, then, since Judge Burnett reported to the Sixty-fifth Congress the four-year suspension act nearly one year of the four-year period has passed into history. Since I introduced the two-year suspension bill six months have rolled by. The present war passport extension act which we are passing will be in effect for one year following the treaty of peace, or, in other words, for probably about two years from the signing of the armistice, thus we hope bridging the critical period. At any rate, we will have a reasonable period of time for the consideration of sane and practical additions to our present immigration legislation.

I believe that this war passport extension to be but the forerunner of a permanent passport plan for the admission of aliens into the United States. I think that the House Immigration and Naturalization Committee can perfect and present to the House a bill which the Members will be glad to support—a bill to admit the present exempted classes only with passports from their countries, with visés from our consular agents as to business and length of stay in the United States, and that we can develop a plan by which all others who come shall come only on probation and remain only on a system of registration. [Applause.]

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and Mr. ROGERS and Mr. LINTHICUM took their places as tellers.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 5, noes 75.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum is not present. The Clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Thereupon the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FESS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9782) to regulate further the entry of aliens into the United States, had found itself without a quorum, whereupon he had caused the roll to be called, when 246 Members, a quorum, had answered to their names, and under the rule he reported the names of the absentees to be recorded in the Journal.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present, and the names of the absentees will be recorded. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] will resume the chair.

The committee resumed its sitting.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] desire to use some time?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this bill, as those who were here prior to the roll call know, is a bill to extend the present law on the question of passport control for another year, with the exception that that portion placing restrictions upon the issuance of passports to American citizens is eliminated.

There seems to have arisen some confusion over this measure, in the thought that it is a limitation or modification of the immigration law. Such is not the case. This measure will in no wise interfere with the present immigration laws, nor will it in anywise preclude the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization from bringing in and reporting to this House any measure that it may see fit to introduce still further limiting and restricting immigration to this country. This bill gives to the State Department the right to keep a double check on people desiring to enter the United States. As has already been pointed out by some gentlemen on the floor, immigrants who are aliens desiring to come to the United States under the present immigration laws, unless this measure is adopted, can only be held and examined at ports of entry. Those to whom admission is refused must then be retransported to Europe or to the point of origin by the steamship companies. But this bill will empower the Secretary of State, through his agencies in the various countries of Europe, to conduct examinations and investigations regarding aliens who are seeking passage to the United States before they embark, thus keeping out in a great measure the many thousands, and perhaps millions, of aliens who may be found to be undesirable and who are waiting in various ports of Europe now, hoping for passport regulation and the embargo on immigration to be lifted in order that they may emigrate to the United States.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes.

Mr. GALLAGHER. What redress has a man here who wants to get friends in here who have been prevented from coming by the State Department?

Mr. CONNALLY. If he is an alien he has no way of getting into the United States under this bill, providing the Secretary of State, after making an examination in the country of his residence, declines to visé a passport issued by a foreign Government.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Then it is wholly optional with the representative of the State Department abroad?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes. In reply to the gentleman from Illinois I will say that his conclusion is exactly right, provided the person is an alien. The bill as originally introduced contained a provision continuing the control by the Secretary of State of passports to American citizens. But the committee took the view that, so far as American citizens are concerned, whether they are now abroad and desire to return to the United States or are in this country and desire to travel in foreign countries, they should have the unrestricted right to do so without the requirement of passports. While it would be much more convenient to American citizens who may travel in Europe to possess passports, there is no requirement under this bill which will force American citizens to procure passports.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, there was evidence before the Committee on Foreign Affairs that succeeding the war many millions of aliens throughout Europe are awaiting the moment when they may emigrate to the United States. Necessarily a great horde of those immigrants will prove to be undesirable immigrants under our laws and according to the views of this Congress on the subject of immigration. In this period of world-wide unrest, in this period of confusion, in this period when it seems that the world is being made over again and shaken from center to circumference, I take it that the American Congress should place additional restrictions to those now provided by law upon the immigration to the United States of those aliens who seek to enter the United States, and I for one, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, trust that the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization will at a very early date report into this House some measure placing still further restrictions upon immigration to the United States. [Applause.]

The Committee on Immigration informs me that testimony adduced before that committee discloses that there are thousands and perhaps millions of aliens residing in the United States who have made no effort to become citizens and who are ignorant of our form of government, our institutions, and our language.

So I take it, with the great mass of aliens already residing in the United States, many of whom know nothing of our institutions, many of whom are ignorant of our laws and do not desire citizenship, and many of whom come here purely for the purpose of obtaining a competence and then returning to the land of their birth, it behooves the American Congress to give serious consideration to the question raised by foreign immigration. It is the duty of the Congress of the United States to see that those who come to the United States are of that timber and of that quality out of which American citizens can be made; and it is its duty to see that they do not bring with them the seeds of anarchy and Bolshevism, and to see to it that while they have their feet on American soil their hearts are not in a foreign land. [Applause.]

I believe that no Member of this House who will study this measure can with reason oppose its provisions. It simply empowers the Secretary of State, through our consuls and our embassies in foreign countries, before viséing passports to aliens allowing them to travel to the United States, to compel them to bring themselves within the immigration laws of the United States, and to convince the authorities that they are of that character and that type that when they reach America they can be assimilated into our civilization and can adjust themselves to our laws and our regulations, and that they can breed within themselves an admiration for and an adherence to the institutions and laws of the United States of America. [Applause.] We should neither desire nor permit other kinds of immigration.

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. EMERSON. Does not the gentleman think that after the alien has arrived in this country it is the duty of the people of this country to see that he is assimilated? Have we not been a little negligent ourselves about that?

Mr. CONNALLY. The gentleman from Ohio propounds the question as to whether the people of this country have been negligent in not assimilating aliens and if it has not been the fault of the people of the United States. That question is rather a broad one and brings into it many considerations; but I would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that the United States has given to aliens the advantages of our public-school system. It has given them practically every benefit and every right vouchsafed to the people of the United States under the Constitution and laws; and if by giving to aliens these rights and privileges they do not learn to respect and admire our institutions, I can hardly conceive of a course that would lead them to do so.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois for a question.

Mr. CANNON. In most of the States, so far as I know, children get a common-school education, which is compulsory, whether they are the sons and daughters of aliens or citizens.

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes.

Mr. EMERSON. But nothing is done about the education of the grown-up alien.

Mr. CONNALLY. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] that I am sure a great many of the States have systems of compulsory education open to aliens and citizens alike. I know that the State of Texas has such a compulsory system of education, which includes everyone, regardless of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. COOPER. Does not the gentleman believe that if our Government had taken the precautions against aliens years ago that we have provided for in this bill our country to-day would not be overrun with a lot of anarchists and Bolsheviks, preaching the doctrines of hate and the overthrow of our Government by force?

Mr. CONNALLY. I will say, in reply to the gentleman from Ohio, that it is doubtless true that a very large percentage of those who are advocating anarchy and Bolshevism in the United States are aliens. As to what might have been had the Government of the United States imposed regulations of that kind heretofore I hardly feel called upon to make answer. [Applause.] I may say to the gentleman that this bill is temporary and to permanently reach the situation the Immigration Committee must report amendments to the present law on immigration.

Aliens who are intelligent and are of good character, who come to America with a sincere desire to become citizens, who come here because they admire this Government and seek its protection, and who forsake their allegiance to foreign Governments and kings and emperors and potentates, who come with respect for and obedience to our laws in their hearts, and who qualify under the present immigration laws, will not be injured by this legislation; but the aliens who seek to come here breathing defiance to ordered government and law, or who come saturated with thought and purpose hostile to the forms of constitutional institutions which we hold dear, or who come merely to compete with our own citizens in the opportunities to make money which America offers, and then intend to return to foreign lands to enjoy their savings, or who are content to remain foreign to all that America symbolizes and typifies, or who come to destroy and tear down—as to such as these, by the enactment of this legislation the Congress of the United States gives to our consuls and ambassadors in foreign lands the solemn injunction, "They shall not pass."

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it has occurred to me during this discussion that if this act which we are about to pass continuing the war-time passport control for one year after the conclusion of peace works well it should be made permanent, and that we should continue the double check for which it provides as to the political and personal character of immigrants seeking our shores, and that our diplomatic and consular offices in foreign countries should have the means and facilities to cooperate with the Department of Labor in this country for that purpose.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] has just said that our present immigration laws are altogether ample and sufficient to take care of this problem and to keep out of this country undesirable and dangerous aliens. It may be that the provisions of our immigration laws are ample, but I respectfully submit that they have not been effective. I believe there are more Bolsheviki, more anarchists, more I. W. W.'s, more wavers of the red flag among the immigrants, among the foreigners who come into this country, now than ever before. At least they are more evident, more active, and bolder in their plans and propaganda for the undermining and destruction of our institutions.

It is estimated that there are now in this country 250,000 agitators who term themselves either Bolsheviki, I. W. W., or radical socialists, and who seek to tear down our present form of constitutional government, with its guaranty of personal and property rights and privileges, and set up in its stead a soviet government such as now exists in Russia, where anarchy, lawlessness, and red terror prevail, and loot and murder is the order of the day. These forces, which formerly worked in secret, are now in many places working openly. There are also 500 papers and magazines published in foreign languages, all devoted to this revolutionary propaganda. It is getting high time that we were bringing everything down to the basis of the Stars and Stripes and the English language or in the words of Col. Roosevelt:

"One flag, the American flag; one language, the language of the Declaration of Independence; one loyalty, loyalty to the American people."

It is now well known that a majority of those who are carrying on the soviet government in Russia were foreigners in this country and went from the United States to Russia after the outbreak of the war. It is also well known that these parties and those who cooperate with them, both here and abroad, have a well-formed plan for dumping into this country on the conclusion of peace, or at the first opportunity, a vaste horde of the most undesirable element of foreign countries. It has been stated on the best of authority and reported to us that there is a flood of immigration from Germany and Austria, as well as South Europe, seeking entrance to this country as soon as the doors are opened.

During this discussion the chief thought that seems to have developed in the minds of Members here in reference to this matter is what the Committee on Immigration is going to do in relation to this question and when it is going to act. Just before the close of the last Congress a bill was brought in from that committee which, as its chairman has just told you, prohibited all immigration to the United States for four years. This bill was never considered by the House. Since the special session has been called the Immigration Committee has prepared and the House has passed a bill providing for the deportation of all undesirable interned aliens now in this country. That bill has not been considered by the Senate, and, of course, I can not give any information as to when it will be considered. We now have pending before the Committee on Immigration a great many measures, one of which absolutely prohibits immigration into this country for a number of years. In my judgment, until we can get our industries properly adjusted and get back to a normal business basis, and our returned service men placed in good employment, such a measure ought to be passed and made effective. It is stated on good authority that at least 10,000,000 are seeking our shores from the Central Powers, our former and present enemies. We know from past experience that these will be of the most undesirable and dangerous element from those countries, and absolute prohibition is the only way that the matter can be effectively controlled. We have bills pending before the Committee on Immigration to deport aliens who withdrew their first papers in order to avoid military service. I am heartily in favor of that measure. We also have a bill before the committee to delay for five years all proceedings looking toward the naturalization of those aliens who claimed exemption from military duty on account of their alienage. The American Legion, an organization of our discharged soldiers, which at every turn has displayed a very fine quality of Americanism, has advocated the passage of these measures, and in my judgment they should be passed. The United States district court for the eastern district of Louisiana has held that an alien who withdrew his first papers in order to avoid military service under the draft is forever barred from becoming an American citizen, and this construction of the law, which meets the approval of every American citizen, certainly strengthens the position of the American Legion asking for their deportation.

Mr. ALMON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I will.

Mr. ALMON. Can the gentleman give us any intimation as to when the Committee on Immigration will report a bill?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Of course I can not. The committee is conducting hearings every day. If I had control of the matter I might give gentlemen a positive answer. I believe it is the disposition of the committee to act as early as possible.

Mr. ALMON. Can the gentleman give his individual opinion as to the time, whether two years or four years?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman from Louisiana permit the statement that it is hoped to consolidate a number of the bills pertaining to immigration and naturalization and bring out an omnibus bill?

Mr. ALMON. Can the gentleman tell us when we can expect a report on that bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If the extraordinary session of Congress adjourns in season I think the committee will ask to sit during the recess and have the bill ready at the beginning of the next session.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I think the House is fortunate in having an opportunity to pass this bill in order to bridge over the time until the Immigration Committee can act. Because in my judgment it is going to be necessary to strengthen our immigration laws in every respect, and it is absolutely necessary that we have a system by which we can keep the undersirable element in Europe from coming into the United States. We have not been able to assimilate those that are already here, many of whom should be sent back.

There are now 10,000,000 aliens in this country who have never made any attempt whatever to become American citizens. They have never even expressed any desire to become American citizens. They are here with our population, and if you have read the reports of the various strikes going on in the country you can see that this element has been the chief cause in many cases of the disturbances that have come about in our industrial life.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I would suggest to the gentleman that there are about 4,000,000 of that 10,000,000 who can not speak the English language.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I thank the gentleman for that information. The majority of the 10.000,000 have been over here for a number of years. The present bill under consideration from the Committee on Foreign Affairs will enable the State Department to effectively control the admission of aliens to the United States for a period of one year after final conclusion of peace. During this period a most solemn duty rests upon Congress to enact legislation for the protection of the American people and for the security of American ideals and American institutions. Our immigration laws should be framed so as to exclude the dangerous element of all classes. The literacy test in the Burnett bill has to a great extent proved effective against the illiterate, but our experience during the war has made it very clear to us that the educated alien may be more dangerous. Leon Trotski, the soviet and anarchist leader in Russia, was a teacher and an editor in this country before the outbreak of the war. Ninety per cent of the I. W. W., an organization that teaches and advocates the destruction of our Government, are aliens, and many of its leaders have sufficient education to influence the unthinking mass in such a way as to make it a very dangerous force. In this period of unrest and discontent throughout the world, when those forces that are opposed to all forms of lawfully established government are at work in every land, it is our duty to see that the American people are protected, and that our institutions are made safe against the attacks of enemies both from without and from within. One of the greatest problems in this country to-day is that of law and order, respect for and obedience to legally constituted authority. Upon this our Government must depend for its life and continued existence, and we should here and now avoid the danger of adding to the already too great number of those who are opposed to our form and plan of government.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, how much did the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] desire?

The CHAIRMAN. Two or three minutes.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for this bill. I heartily approve it. Yet when I say that, I want to say one other thing. The trouble is not alone among the ignorant who come from abroad or among the ignorant who are good American citizens in the United States to-day. The trouble lies with many of the most highly cultured people, who have influence from their positions and who hold positions in our colleges, in our universities as instructors, and in some of our high schools also. [Applause.] I read an account, and I believe it to be true, of an individual whose name now escapes me, but whose name no doubt the presiding chairman of this committee would know, who, on a Chautauqua circuit while lecturing—a professor in a university founded by Rockefeller, and from there graduated to Harvard, a German by birth, though I presume naturalized—advocated, in closing his address, trial marriage. I have great respect for the German people who are honest and patriotic, who are willing to live in the sweat of their faces, who are law-abiding and patient and desire to become good American citizens. We have had much of good from that kind of immigration, as we have had from Ireland, and Sweden, and Norway, and England, and France, Germany, Denmark, and many other countries. I shall vote for this bill, because, under existing conditions, it gives the Secretary of State power to make full investigation before any alien can enter the United States, and gives him that power for a year. That is time for the other legislation to mature and be provided for.

Mr. DAVEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. DAVEY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois what he proposes to do with the Bolshevists who are in our colleges and universities.

Mr. CANNON Oh, God knows; I do not. Many of these are citizens and instructors of the youth of the country, and they constitute a very dangerous element. Carl Marx was a very great man, as I am informed and believe, but he and his kind have spread the doctrines that they taught and they have made much of the trouble in Germany and much of the trouble all over this world in civilized countries to-day. [Applause.]

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PELL].

Mr. PELL. Mr. Chairman, the conditions abroad to-day are extremely bad. Every country in Europe is now loaded down with taxes. The business conditions there are almost hopeless, and it will be the desire of practically every man in Europe who possibly can get out of the country to do so. The most obvious goal for them to make for is the United States. There will be millions of all sorts who will want to come to this country, especially from the more undesirable parts of Europe, from the parts that have suffered the greatest losses, where at the present moment starvation is almost universal. These men will want to come here in great numbers. It has been the theory in the past that this country should be the haven of the oppressed of all nations. We need not continue that policy if it should appear unwise to do so.

It seems to me that the provisions of this bill which would make it necessary for the would-be immigrant to prove affirmatively that he is a fit person to remain in this country is a very excellent principle for the United States to inaugurate. In the past it has been up to us to prove that the man should not be admitted. According to this law, it will be necessary for the man himself to prove that he is fit to be admitted into this country.

Now, in the very near future American conditions are going to be bad. We are going to see hard times in this country. It is ridiculous to think that poverty throughout the world can be accompanied by prosperity here. It seems to me that we have got enough Bolshevists in this country at the present moment. We are going to face a serious situation that is being caused to a great extent by the almost numberless ignorant foreigners who are here to-day, who do not know anything of the structure of the American Government, who do not care anything for our institutions, who are here for their immediate profit without any permanent interest in the country, for whom those great principles for which our ancestors fought and for which we have worked mean nothing. Now, it seems to me that our first duty is not to any would-be laborer in this country, but to ourselves, to those institutions which we have inherited. This country has been preserved by great effort and by great danger, and it seems to me we should protect ourselves here. This law will be no bar to decent men who will make good citizens, but it will be and it should be a bar to him who will be a drag on our civilization. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida makes the point of order there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and seven gentlemen are present, a quorum.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GALLAGHER].

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Chairman, this bill "to regulate further the entry of aliens into the United States" is the most drastic measure for restricting immigration that was ever suggested. I have listened to a number of speeches here to-day in favor of this bill; they have the same old ring and sound like the old, old cry of "America for Americans." [Applause.] It is not a new cry; we have had it with us one time or another ever since the foundation of the Republic. The Know-Nothing Party, in its most prosperous days, never dreamed of suggesting such a restrictive measure.

What is proposed by this bill is to eventually make permanent law the war-emergency act, passed to prevent in time of war departure from and entry into the United States, contrary to the public's safety. It can be called an act to assist other Governments to keep their people at home. It is not necessary to compel all who seek entry into this country to obtain the consent of their home Government, because a few undesirables have come here, thereby imposing hardship on all because of the faults of the few. In this law you propose to compel a man to secure a passport from his home Government, a requirement that was never thought of before the war, and such passport be viséed by our consular representative in such country before he can come here. From statements that have been made in this debate it appears that it would be optional with our consular representative whether he would visé the passport or not, and there is no provision in this bill granting an appeal from such arbitrary power, and right of appeal to the United States Commissioner of Immigration here should be provided.

It will deny political refugees the right of asylum, and in a country where men are thrown into prison for political offenses on all manner of trumped-up charges they would be denied the opportunity to escape bondage and oppression on the flimsiest kind of a charge. If this law is passed, good-by immigration, good-by land of the Pilgrims' pride. I am not in favor of any such legislation under present conditions, and I am opposed to the arguments made here in favor of it.

Undesirable and dangerous radicals and agitators can now be kept out and put out of the country, under the general laws now in force, and it is unfair for honest and deserving aliens, anxious for opportunity and liberty, to suffer for the faults of a few wild dreamers. This may be another plan—growing out of the late war—of the restrictionists to control and shut off immigration, but the point to which I wish to call your attention is this: I asked the gentleman from Texas, when he was speaking, a question, and he said that it was optional with our consular representative to say whether or not an immigrant should be admitted into this country. Now, there ought to be——

Mr. CONNALLY. I beg the gentleman's pardon, I said it was optional with the Secretary of State whether he would have a passport issued to him.

Mr. GALLAGHER. I understood the gentleman to say that a man over there could be deprived of an opportunity of coming here; that it was optional with our consular representative whether he would visé a passport or not.

Mr. CONNALLY. That he could deprive him of a passport.

Mr. GALLAGHER. That would shut him out.

Mr. KNUTSON. If the gentleman will pardon me, the State Department does not issue passports to immigrants; they merely visé passports.

Mr. GALLAGHER. And if they refuse to visé passports, or the country they desire to leave refuses a passport, they can not come in; that is what I object to. This is absolute prohibition. There should be a right of appeal from the decision of our consular representatives. Expert and experienced immigration inspectors stationed at ports of embarkation could better keep out the undesirables and easily look up suspected radicals and stop them from coming here. There are thousands of people in this country who have friends and relatives in the old country whom they would like to bring over here, and they will be deprived of the opportunity to do so if this bill is made a law.

Now, then, to listen to the speeches that have been made here to-day one would think that conditions were terrible in this country and that the immigrants or foreigners were responsible for it. The fact is that many of the men who have spoken in favor of this bill to-day have very few foreigners in their districts. I represent a district that is made up of foreigners and the children of foreigners, and there are very few in the district who could be called Americans. Our public schools are crowded with pupils, and there are many private and parochial schools giving education to the youth of the district without any cost to the Government. Our night schools are continually filled with men and women far beyond the school age, anxious to learn our language, and when you talk about immigrants being ignorant and claim that all the unrest and dissatisfaction in certain sections is caused by anarchists, Bolsheviki, and undesirable immigration you are doing an injustice to the great majority of honest and worthy immigrants who are industrious, hard-working, law-abiding people. If it were not for the immigrant, the West would still be a wilderness. Through their efforts the deserts have blossomed out, our granaries have been filled, and largely by their labor food was provided for the Army and Europe kept from starving. They have bought our bonds and contributed their share to the success of the war, and if there are anarchists and Bolshevists here or other aliens who are disturbing conditions, they can now be deported under present laws, and the sooner they are the better.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JUUL. I ask that the gentleman have three additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not in control; it depends on the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. GALLAGHER. In the present crisis, with changing conditions, let us go slow and be sure that we are not interfering with existing treaties while passing new immigration laws. We are striving now for peace with all nations and to make the world a better place to live in, and it seems unfair to abuse and injure those who are anxious to help us in this great work. Let us remember that over 4,000,000 men were taken from their usual occupations during the war, and as they are now returning, let us not forget there is a noticeable shortage of labor at present in this country. It is stated by reliable authority that emigration from New York already exceeds 1,000 daily and that nearly 1,500,000 immigrant aliens are now planning to leave the United States, and no one can tell how many more are to go. [Applause.]

Mr. FLOOD. I yield the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BOX] five minutes.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I think we have had a very emphatic expression of the attitude of the House as to the admission of aliens who are not and can not become Americans. I think that rule should apply as against every interest. I think that when the farmers of Texas want illiterate Mexicans admitted across the border they ought to be denied that right. [Applause.] I think that when the Japanese come across the Pacific and try to root out Americans in California they ought to be denied that privilege. [Applause.] I think that when foreigners come to take the place of men in the factories of the North and East who have borne the brunt of battle in Europe, and when they return find their places occupied by others, they ought to be denied that privilege. [Applause.]

I have the honor of being a member of the Committee on Immigration, but when we prepare and have for consideration a bill restricting immigration I want to support that kind of a measure which applies to me and my section as well as it does to the other fellow and his section. [Applause.]

Mr. GALLAGHER, Mr. BOX, and Mr. PELL were granted unanimous consent to revise and extend their remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the subject matter of this bill which we are now considering constitutes, to my mind, probably the most important question that has come before this Congress. At this time we know a feeling of unrest is sweeping through our country. We can not pick up a paper but what we see that the Bolshevists and reds are trying to overthrow this Government by force. I live in one of those great industrial districts that are now suffering from the steel strike, and I have on my desk sworn affidavits to some of the statements that have been made to the workmen by these Bolshevists and agitators that have been permitted to come into our country, in which they threaten American citizens if they go to work. These agitators are not citizens of the United States, but they come here with the spirit of Bolshevism imbued in their hearts and minds, and to-day they are appearing and preaching their doctrine to the American workmen.

The time has come when every American has got to speak out for American institutions. The time has come when we have got to call a halt on the Bolshevist and agitator. We must call a halt upon this hellish doctrine that is being preached in our country by the followers of Lenin and Trotski, and I know of no better way to stop it than to prohibit these men from coming into our land. And I am glad that the Committee on Foreign Affairs has brought in this bill, for I believe it will be a step in that direction and that it will stop these agitators and Bolshevists from coming to our country and preaching their doctrine to the American workingman.

I trust the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization will bring in a bill in the near future which will prohibit for a certain length of time immigration into our land. The American workingman to-day is suffering from the influence of agitators. Have we come to that stage in our national life when an American citizen who loves his country, a man who has been a valuable asset to the community in which he lives, has built himself a little house, and is trying to educate his children along the line of true American principles, and he wants to go to work, but when he attempts to go to his employment to provide for his family one of these aliens can come up and stick a knife or a gun under his nose and say, "I will kill you if you go to work"? Where does the protection come under the Constitution of the United States? It is time we were taking some action along this line. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HUDSPETH].

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I shall vote for this bill. If it comes to a question, gentlemen, of expediency—if in procuring Mexican laborers, although they were only asked to be brought across for a few months and returned, they are a menace to America, I am for America first. But I want to say this to my colleague from Texas: If you were so much opposed to bringing Mexican labor across to harvest the crops you should not have loaned yourself to the committee and the Texas delegation that went down and interceded with the Secretary of Labor——

Mr. BOX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDSPETH. No; I will not. To bring them across——

Mr. BOX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDSPETH. The gentleman ought not to have been present if he was so much opposed to bringing Mexican labor for a few short months to harvest the crops in Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. The gentleman does not refer to me?

Mr. HUDSPETH. No; I am referring to the gentleman who is opposed to having Mexicans sent across, but who went with the Texas delegation to ask the Secretary of Labor to lift the ban until the 1st of January.

Mr. CONNALLY. Will the gentleman make it clear that I did not go?

Mr. HUDSPETH. I am not referring to you.

Mr. CONNALLY. You said the Texas delegation.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I said a part of it. You do not compose the whole delegation, do you? Several gentlemen from Texas—and the gentleman who is so much opposed now to bringing a few Mexicans across, that were to be returned in a few months [Mr. Box], was a part of that delegation—went with the delegation from south Texas and interceded with the Secretary of Labor to bring laborers across for a few months to harvest the crops in Texas. That is the gentleman who is so much opposed now to allowing a few Mexicans to come across to save the cotton crop of Texas. [Applause.] The Texas farmer and cotton raiser is patriotic. If he believes that the Mexican laborer would be a menace to the safety of our Government he would let his crop rot before he would advise bringing him across.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BEE. Is there any possibility of this "gentleman from Texas" being allowed any time to pour oil on the troubled waters? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman may be able to get some time from the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD].

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DAVEY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. DAVEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, my chief purpose in appearing before this committee now is in answer to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GALLAGHER], who referred to those speakers favoring this bill as coming from districts where there are no foreigners.

I represent a district that has a very large percentage of foreigners. The largest city of my district registered in the two draft registrations over 20,000 foreigners between the ages of 18 and 45; I mean foreigners who are aliens, outside of the naturalized foreigners, and not including women and children and alien men over 45 years of age. There are undoubtedly 50,000 aliens in this one community, including women and children but not including naturalized foreigners.

I think the time has come when we must cease pandering to these foreigners [applause] who have not assimilated the ideas of America; and I want it distinctly understood, both here and in my district, that I stand for America first. [Applause.]

If there is a man or woman of foreign extraction in my district who has a relative or a friend abroad, and that relative or friend can not pass the test that this committee shall lay down for his admittance, then I choose between my country and that foreigner in my district. Neither I nor any other American who loves his country has the slightest feeling against a foreigner as such. We welcome with outstretched arms every right-thinking, liberty-loving man who comes from other shores to this land of freedom and opportunity. No foreigner who is worthy of America will be kept out by this law. Those who can not pass the requirements ought to be kept out, whether they have friends here or not, and there are many here who ought to be sent out right quick.

The time has come, gentlemen, when we must move along a course designed to make America safe for Americans. We must choose a definite, concerted line of action, and I hope that both the great parties will look with scorn on the idea of temporizing with these dangerous elements in our midst, and that we shall seek to serve America first, last, and all the time. [Applause.]

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, this measure before us provides that those who desire to come to this country must secure a passport, properly viséed by an American representative, before embarking from their native land.

This is desirable from every standpoint. It means that the applicant for admission will have to prove that he is a desirable newcomer to this country. His record can be secured in his own land and necessary action can be taken without difficulty. Under the old system the burden of proof rested with the immigration authorities, and many undesirables have been admitted simply because it was impossible to secure the facts of their careers abroad.

I am heartily in favor of this measure and hope that it will be enacted speedily. However, it deals with only one phase of making America the heritage of real Americans.

There are elements already in America which are viciously un-American and their presence constitutes a menace to free institutions. They are not affected by these passport regulations; the stern remedy of deportation will alone meet their case.

Mr. Chairman, there are thousands of aliens in this country who withdrew their declaration of intention to become American citizens in order to evade military service.

There are other thousands who had made their home here for years without seeking American citizenship and who demanded exemption on that account when America called for soldiers to fight in her defense.

These aliens declared that they were outsiders. I am in favor of taking them at their word and putting them outside the confines of the country they refused to serve.

Mr. Chairman, the alien slacker was a shadow Hun. He drove a dagger into America from behind. He struck a vicious blow at American morale. He promoted opposition to the war and resistance to the selective draft. He did his best to make good the Kaiser's boast that our population was a medley of conflicting groups which would not fight in a common cause. He belonged to the most-favored class, free from military service and all obligations connected with the World War. He must pay the price now for his safety then. The alien slacker must go!

The alien slacker was a sneering ingrate. He was a gloating spectator while American lads marched forth to war. He seized the jobs left vacant by the red-blooded young manhood of America. He fattened on war conditions and thrived on war necessities. He grabbed with greedy hands at rich rewards, while the land he left was ravaged and the land he adopted was pouring out its blood and treasure. He found a safe haven under the wings of Columbia and cravenly refused to come to her defense. He lusted for American money while he despised American institutions and scorned the American flag. He was a bird of ill omen then. He must become a bird of passage now. The alien slacker must go!

The alien slacker was a parasite. He fastened upon the body and sucked the blood of America and gave nothing in return. He was a cootie on our citizenship, and requires the delousing process of deportation. He was arsenic in the body politic. He was a cancer which must be removed. He was an infected spot in a virile, sane, and sound people. He was rust on our sword, a blemish in our unity, a palsy on our purpose, a brake on our progress, a stint in our strength. He remained behind, making no sacrifice for the common welfare. His room is more valuable than his presence. The alien slacker must go!

The alien slacker was ally of the Hun, the Goth, the Vandal, and the Turk, where ruthless heels were crushing Europe and threatening the New World. He demanded that Americans fight for him in the battle line of freedom. He placed his own rightful burden on the shoulders of American patriots, who were compelled to carry a double load. He undermined the value of every citizenship paper issued by America. He flaunted his shameful escape from obligation in the face of fellow countrymen who had assumed the duties of citizenship. He was a stigma on the glory of every alien who gladly served under the Stars and Stripes. He was slag in the melting pot, and refused to fuse into the steel ingot of American purpose. He branded himself unfit for any place save the scrap heap outside the gates of America. The alien slacker must go!

The alien slacker was a sinister sign to every mother who bade her boy "good-by" with tears. He set on fire the indignation of every father who bravely told his own lad to fight for the old flag. He was drawing inflated pay while American boys fell dying in Belleau Wood. He was basking in comfort while American boys faced the hell of Chateau-Thierry. He was safely sheltered while American boys endured the agonies of the Argonne. He knew nothing of the glad meaning of the joy bells of November 11. He has no place in the new United States, reborn in the greatest war in history. The alien slacker must go!

The alien slacker deliberately chose to remain outside the American family and household in time of storm. He has no right now, in time of sunshine, to claim equality with the sons and daughters of the Republic. He seized the benefits of a free land and paid for them with brazen violation of the first principles of the return due to hospitality. His very presence now is evidence that America is not one nation with one people and one flag. He is the menace of the Black Hander, the anarchist, and the dynamiter in one, for he assails the foundations of Americanism. He can not be assimilated. He must be eliminated. He evaded service "over here." He dodged duty "over there." His journey overseas now will be hailed with delight by every red-blooded American between the Atlantic and the Pacific. The alien slacker must go!

Still, Mr. Chairman, more is necessary than the deportation of those who treacherously failed America in her hour of need. We must make sure that there will never again be built up a permanent alien class in America to sow distrust, danger, and disunion. It is high time to stop making America a collection of nationalities, each with its own ideals, standards, habits of thought, customs, and speech. America must be made a united nation, with the realization on the part of everyone that U. S. spells "us."

The World War threw a searchlight on this Nation, and we found groups which had deliberately excluded everything American and cherished everything foreign.

There is a deadly danger in such a situation. America must insist that every alien admitted to the United States for permanent residence shall not only become an American citizen but shall also become Americanized. That means knowledge of our institutions and our language. We want no man here whose love for his native land is greater than his love for the country of his own adoption. No one should be allowed to come here for any other reason than this country's good.

Mr. Chairman, no man can develop an American soul nor real regard for American institutions unless he understands the language of America. Yet there are millions of foreign-born persons in this country to-day who have not the slightest knowledge of our national language. By their very dependence upon an interpreter they become the victims of unscrupulous apostles of violence and frightfulness.

To beat back the red tide of anarchy will require constructive measures. Every alien already here should be Americanized if he desires it; and if he does not desire it he should be deported. The Nation is not entirely blameless, for the attempts to solve this great problem have been by piecemeal and in fractions. It is not a problem for groups, but for the Nation. The worthy aliens should be given the sense of membership and made to feel that Americanism is not measured by length of residence but by devotion to American ideals.

I have introduced in this House a measure dealing with certain phases of this great problem. It provides that every alien who renounced his declaration of intention to become a citizen of the United States in order to escape military service shall be immediately deported. It provides further that in the future every alien who enters this country for permanent residence must come with the purpose of becoming an American citizen. He must make sworn affidavit to that effect when he arrives. He must learn our language and study our institutions. He must register once each year with the clerk of the county in which he resides. If he fails in any of these solemn promises through which he gained admission, he shall be deported to the land from which he came.

Mr. Chairman, that measure has been widely discussed. In my district, one of the greatest industrial districts in the world, where a large percentage of the immigrants to this country have settled, there has been universal approval. The Pittsburgh newspapers have enthusiastically supported the provisions of the bill and called for its passage.

Here are sentences quoted from the large number of letters and telegrams I have received from individuals and organizations. Every one I am quoting came from the Pittsburgh district, with its great number of persons of foreign birth:

"Every alien who dodged service forfeited his right to live on American soil." "Every red-blooded American in this district wishes your bill God speed." "This country has stood for such treachery long enough. Now is the time to act." "As a soldier with a year's service overseas, I stand for America first. The alien slacker must go." "The plan to admit only aliens who desire to become citizens is heartily approved." "Your deportation bill for aliens suits every American here." "As an ex-soldier, I stand for withdrawing protection from those who deserted us in time of need." "We stand shoulder to shoulder with you for Americanism as defined in your bill." "We need Americans far more than laborers." "As a naturalized citizen proud of my country, I indorse your bill." "We unanimously indorse your bill and stand ready to help secure its passage." "Every ex-soldier in Allegheny County indorses the deportation of these alien slackers and the establishment of new rules to prevent their stripe from ever coming in in the future." "This land of the free needs men who accept obligations as well as claim privileges." "We believe this measure to be the most important before Congress."

Mr. Chairman, I could go on indefinitely giving such messages, but I do not need to add proof that the districts which know this problem best are alive to the vital necessity of making America a Nation in fact as well as in name. I am convinced that there should be no further delay. The American people are determined that in future-testing times there shall be no alien slacker class to stab America in the back.

By unanimous consent Mr. DAVEY, Mr. COOPER, and Mr. FLOOD were given leave to revise and extend their remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That if the President shall find that the public safety requires that restrictions and prohibitions in addition to those provided otherwise than by this act be imposed upon the entry of aliens into the United States, and shall make public proclamation thereof, it shall, until otherwise ordered by the President or Congress, be unlawful—

(a) For any alien to enter or attempt to enter the United States except under such reasonable rules, regulations, and orders, and subject to such passport, visé, or other limitations and exceptions as the President shall prescribe;

(b) For any person to transport or attempt to transport into the United States another person with knowledge or reasonable cause to believe that the entry of such other person is forbidden by this act;

(c) For any person knowingly to make any false statement in an application for a passport or other permission to enter the United States with intent to induce or secure the granting of such permission, either for himself or for another;

(d) For any person knowingly to furnish or attempt to furnish or assist in furnishing to another a viséed passport or other permit or evidence of permission to enter, not issued and designed for such other person's use;

(e) For any person knowingly to use or attempt to use any viséed passport or other permit or evidence of permission to enter not issued and designed for his use;

(f) For any person to forge, counterfeit, mutilate, or alter, or cause or procure to be forged, counterfeited, mutilated, or altered, any passport, visé, or other permit or evidence of permission to enter the United States;

(g) For any person knowingly to use or attempt to use or furnish to another for use any false, forged, counterfeited, mutilated, or altered passport, permit, or evidence of permission, or any passport, permit, or evidence of permission which, though originally valid, has become or been made void or invalid.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. EMERSON: Page 1, line 7, after the word "thereof" insert "which restrictions shall provide that no Bolshevist, anarchist, or I. W. W. sympathizer shall be allowed to enter the United States."

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts reserves a point of order.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not think this amendment is subject to a point of order. This bill practically provides that the President shall do all the legislating, and we place a penalty on it. We provide that if he finds it necessary to make these restrictions he may do so. If that is true, I can not see why this Congress, which has the power to originate this legislation, can not also state what the restrictions shall contain.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Would the gentleman be willing to include monarchists, and those who preach absolute government and autocracy also?

Mr. EMERSON. Absolutely.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. We seem to be applying our "un-American" epithets against Bolshevists. I am just as much against Czarites and those who believe in absolute government.

Mr. EMERSON. So am I.

Mr. RAKER. Would not the gentleman's amendment restrict the President to excluding only those named, when as a matter of fact under this legislation the President can not only exclude those named by the gentleman from Ohio but also those named by the gentleman from Alabama and all other undesirables? Instead of complicating the bill by any specifications, the way it stands now it is open for the President to exclude all of them.

Mr. EMERSON. That may be true, but we leave it discretionary with the President. I think Congress should speak loudly on this subject, and should express to the President the idea that we think these persons should be prevented from landing here. [Applause.]

Mr. GALLAGHER. Is it not a fact that under the immigration law an undesirable immigrant can now be deported?

Mr. EMERSON. Then what is the use of passing this bill?

Mr. GALLAGHER. There is no use in passing it.

Mr. EMERSON. This bill provides a double safety.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. If the gentleman will refer to lines 4 and 5, on page 1, he will find that it reads:

In addition to those provided otherwise than by this act.

Now, it is my understanding of the immigration act that the persons mentioned in the gentleman's amendment are included in the prohibitions under existing law.

Mr. EMERSON. I know; but this is not an immigration act. This is an act to provide that our representatives in other countries shall visé passports given to some alien to come to this country. It is a double protection, if I understand it correctly.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes; but in viséing the passports they visé no passports where the applicants would come under the prohibitions of the present immigration act.

Mr. EMERSON. They might do it.

Mr. KNUTSON. If the gentleman will yield, I do not think they would.

Mr. EMERSON. It might be done. I can see no harm in this amendment.

Mr. KNUTSON. Any mistake may be made; but the intention of the State Department is not to allow any of its representatives abroad to visé the passports of undesirables.

Mr. EMERSON. That may be true; but we are going to provide that those holding these views shall not have their passports viséed. That is all we provide for.

Mr. KNUTSON. I ask that the amendment be read again.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment that it goes outside of the provisions of the bill in dealing with particular classes, whereas the language of the bill is general.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio wish to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. EMERSON. My contention is that the bill provides that the President, if he deems it necessary, may make rules, and may make the very rule for which my amendment provides. The Congress of the United States, that creates the law, creates the authority in him to make the restrictions—by my amendment notifies him that among the restrictions he shall make are those provided for in the amendment. If we have the right to give the President authority to make restrictions, we have a right to make the restrictions themselves.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The bill is designed to prevent the admission of aliens. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio adds to it other classes which may not be admitted, anarchists, I. W. W.'s, Bolshevists, and so on. The rule is clear that where a bill is limited to one class you can not by amendment add several other classes, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I shall with much earnestness support this measure. It is pleasing to note the attitude of the Members of this House upon this bill. It authorizes the President to do that which could not be done under the present law. There is no provision in the law to-day whereby you can exclude professors, doctors, artists, travelers, and others who desire to come to this country. They are permitted to enter. It is demonstrated by the report made to the War Department on the selective draft that some of these are the ones that ought to be excluded. There ought to be restrictions in the immigration laws not only prohibiting those who are in the other class of laborers who do not come within the purview, and there should be no wide-open provision as it now stands admitting those simply designated as doctors, lawyers, artists, and travelers to enter this country. There should be proper restrictions.

The provisions of this bill authorize the President for a year, until legislation is enacted, to exclude Bolshevists, anarchists, and all other undesirables, and that is what ought to be done. They are coming to this country. They are here now, some highly educated, who come here as lecturers to preach and promulgate their propaganda. Something has been said about the Immigration Committee making a report on this subject. A bill was reported out last year, and we hope within a short time that another bill will be reported out to this Congress that will not only make provision whereby the laboring men who do not come within the general law and proper rules and regulations—that there will be restrictions placed upon those now in the exempted class.

There is no need of our overlooking the fact, as has been said by the gentleman from Illinois, that in our universities—and the names have been given of men who preach against the principles of this Government. It is time that they should be stopped. It is time that we should enact legislation that will prohibit it. As has been said, irrespective of where the men come from, these undesirables should be excluded.

Those admitted from Mexico should not have been admitted. There were those from California and Texas and New Mexico who wanted them to be admitted because they did not want to pay the going price for laboring men, and they wanted cheap labor. That is the crux of the whole thing. The Secretary of Labor ought not to have been given the power to admit them, and it is the same with reference to the Japanese and the Chinese. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. RAKER had leave to extend his remarks.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. Mr. Chairman, my friend Mr. HUDSPETH referred to my attitude with reference to the legislation excluding aliens. The House heard my statement as to my position that I am opposed to the admission of aliens, Mexicans and others, who can not become American citizens. That was the position I took before the House.

With reference to the admission of Mexicans as a war measure to meet certain industrial needs, I took no action. I was present as a friendly spectator when a delegation from my State, none of them my constituents, asked for the admission of these people in that emergency. I say with reference to that class of people that they ought not to be admitted, and I am opposed to their admission. [Applause.]

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. ROGERS (interrupting the count). Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise, and I hope that gentlemen in favor of this bill will vote against the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, on that I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. SEARS and Mr. ROGERS to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 2, noes 68.

So the committee refused to rise.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that motion has just been made and decided in the negative, and that the motion of the gentleman from Missouri is therefore dilatory.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion of the gentleman from Missouri following immediately the report of the tellers on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts that the committee rise the Chair would think must be regarded as dilatory, and therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, for the sake of information, I would like to inquire what we are going to do—stay here and go around in a circle?

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, if the leader of the minority will restrain gentlemen on his side who are filibustering, there will be no difficulty about passing this bill and getting away.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I have nothing to do with the conduct of gentlemen on this side.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, everybody is in favor of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Evidently there is not a quorum present. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

While the Members in front of the Clerk's desk were being permitted to be recorded as present,

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, has the roll been called a second time?

The CHAIRMAN. It does not have to be called a second time. That is not the rule of the House.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the rules of the House specifically provide——

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is out of order.

Mr. WINGO. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed.

The Clerk proceeded and finished calling the names.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order growing out of the roll call——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman might state his point of order.

Mr. WINGO. The Chair, as I understand it, permitted the Clerk to call the names of the Members only once. I would like to be heard upon that proposition. The rules of the House require that they be called twice.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not care to hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. WINGO. I make the point of order that the rules of the House were specifically amended to meet just such a decision made by a former Chairman in 1894. Of course, if the Chair does not care to hear the rules of the House discussed and wishes arbitrarily to set aside the rules of the House, he has that power.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not care to hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. WINGO. That is the decision of a man who is arbitrary and has no respect for the rules, and I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. The Chair has not made a decision.

Mr. WINGO. Yes; the Chair has made a decision.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will overrule the point of order.

Mr. WINGO. The point of order is that the rules of the House require specifically the roll to be called a second time. The rules further provide that the rules of the House shall govern proceedings in the committee except where otherwise specifically provided. In 1894 the Speaker held—and the gentleman will find it in the Precedents, and I am familiar with the Precedents——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is out of order; he can not discuss a point of order during a roll call.

Mr. WINGO. The point of order grows out of the roll call, and that is the only time a Member can make it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will make his point in the House and not in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. WINGO. I appeal from the decision of the Chair just made. The committee is the only place to make it.

The committee rose; the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FESS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 9782, finding itself without a quorum, under the rule he caused the roll to be called, whereupon 214 Members answered to their names, a quorum, and he presented the list of the absentees to be entered on the Journal.

Mr. WINGO. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. Is it proper——

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

Mr. WINGO. It is growing out of the present situation.

Mr. MAPES. A point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is out of order; only one point of order can be entertained at a time.

Mr. MAPES. But the gentleman is not making a point of order.

The SPEAKER. He is making a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MAPES. I am making a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan is out of order.

Mr. WINGO. I do not know whether the point of order is well taken or not, so I desired to make the parliamentary inquiry. Is it in order to raise in the House the question that the rules of the House requiring the second call of the roll were not carried out in the Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. It formerly was the practice, but Speaker CLARK ruled last session when the committee rose simply to establish a quorum, in order to prevent filibuster, for which the rule was provided—and it seems to apply to the present case—that it was not in order to make any motion to adjourn or raise a point of order, but that the House automatically resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. WINGO. In other words, the point of order can only be made in committee. I think the Speaker is right in that. The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole [Mr. FESS] ruled otherwise.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. MAPES. It is too late to do any good on this particular occasion, but I do not think it ought to be allowed to pass without calling the Speaker's attention to the fact that the ruling of Speaker CLARK in the last Congress on a similar occasion was that the Speaker would not recognize anyone for any purpose, but that the House immediately went back into committee.

Mr. WINGO. I think that is a correct ruling. I think the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole should have recognized the point of order at the time. I think the Speaker is right.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio will resume the chair.

The committee resumed its session, with Mr. FESS in the chair.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on section 1 and amendments thereto be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. McKEOWN. I object.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the debate on the section and amendments be now closed.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WINGO. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 97, noes 50.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may revise and extend my remarks.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I demand tellers on the vote.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection, the request will be granted.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I was on my feet before the Chair made the announcement.

The CHAIRMAN. It is too late. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That any person who shall willfully violate any of the provisions of this act, or of any order or proclamation of the President promulgated, or of any permit, rule, or regulation issued thereunder, shall, upon conviction, be fined not more than $10,000, or, if a natural person, imprisoned for not more than 20 years, or both; and the officer, director, or agent of any corporation who knowingly participates in such violation shall be punished by like fine or imprisonment, or both; and any vehicle or any vessel, together with its or her appurtenances, equipment, tackle, apparel, and furniture, concerned in any such violation, shall be forfeited to the United States.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Page 3, line 7, strike out "$10,000" and insert "$5,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Page 3, line 8, strike out the word "twenty" and insert the word "five."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That the term "United States" as used in this act includes the Canal Zone and all territory and waters, continental or insular, subject to the jurisdiction of the United States.

The word "person" as used herein shall be deemed to mean any individual, partnership, association, company, or other unincorporated body of individuals, or corporation, or body politic.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is entitled to five minutes.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts was kind enough to state in the RECORD that I was opposed to the bill. I do not think it is necessary for me to deny the accusation, in view of the fact that I am not opposed to the bill. The gentleman also accuses me of filibustering. It may be news to the chairman of this committee that there are 238 Republican Members of this House, and that at least 100 of them could answer "present." It might be news to him also to know that this afternoon, when the point of no quorum was raised, there were more Democrats on the floor than Republicans in order to make a count of 107 Members. I do not think it is fair for the chairman of the committee to accuse another of being opposed to a bill simply because he exercises his right under the rules, and makes the point of no quorum. It is a right a man has. There is no need of haste. We all recognize the fact that months ago we repealed——

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order the gentleman is not discussing the amendment.

Mr. SEARS. What is the "last word"?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will please proceed in order. The word is "politic."

Mr. SEARS. I had forgotten the last word, and therefore will call his attention to it. This is a beautiful word.

Mr. DYER. I have been here all day——

Mr. SEARS. The gentleman has been here all day, and we did not meet until noon, and again I apologize to the gentleman, because he got here before I did.

This word was used by a gentleman well versed in the English language and is at the end of the paragraph. I did not intend by my motion seriously to strike the word out, because if you did it would not be a well-rounded sentence. I want to congratulate this committee on adding the word to the sentence. I know of no other word that could be used where it appears at the end of the sentence. I only trust that when this bill is passed by the House that it will not receive the same fate as did the bill repealing the tax on cold drinks. Now, if we had had this last word at the end of the bill repealing the luxury tax on Coco-Cola no doubt it would have been passed by the Republican majority in the Senate long ago, and I would not be receiving letters criticizing me for not working in Congress and stating that the House was doing nothing.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEARS. I yield to my good friend from New York if he has something to say about the last word, but I would not have the distinguished educator and my friend violate the rules of the House by departing from that last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed. Is there objection?

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. ROGERS. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move that the debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves that the debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The debate on the section is closed, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That in order to carry out the purposes and provisions of this act the sum of $600,000 is hereby appropriated.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I was wondering whether $600,000 is a sufficient amount of money to carry this law into execution. Yet I doubt whether I ought to raise the question of its sufficiency. I move that all debate on this section be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves that all debate on this section be now closed. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, a division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is called for. Those who desire a division on this vote will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] On this vote the ayes are 87 and the noes 16.

Mr. SEARS. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Tellers are requested. Those who are in favor of taking the vote by tellers will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Not a sufficient number.

So the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That this act shall take effect upon the date when the provisions of the act of Congress approved the 22d day of May, 1918, entitled "An act to prevent in time of war departure from and entry into the United States, contrary to the public safety," shall cease to be operative, and shall continue in force and effect for a period of one year thereafter.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, section 5 of this bill simply provides that when the present act ceases to be operative the bill now under consideration shall take effect and continue for one year from that time. It is the opinion of the State Department and of those who have studied the subject that at the end of the year conditions will have sufficiently clarified in Europe so that it is quite likely that we can return to the normal mode of administering our inward tide of immigration.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section be now closed. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman object to my proceeding for five minutes out of order? I am in favor of the bill, but I want to discuss another matter.

Mr. CANNON. Many of us have other engagements.

Mr. WINGO. Yes; I appreciate that, but we could have gotten through.

Mr. MADDEN. I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, but I will have to object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask that my request be put.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the debate be closed on this section and all amendments thereto. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill favorably to the House with two amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves that the committee do now rise and report the bill favorably to the House with two amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FESS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9782) to regulate further the entry of aliens into the United States, had instructed him to report the same back to the House with two amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege of the whole House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. Awhile ago, in Committee of the Whole, when the committee found itself without a quorum, the Chairman ordered the roll to be called under the rules of the House. When the roll had been called once, he ruled that it could not be called the second time. When a point of order was attempted to be made, he declined to entertain a point of order. I then made a point of order against the Chair's action, whereupon the Chair ruled that the point of order could not be made in the committee, but must be made in the House. From this decision I appealed, but the Chair ignored my appeal. The Speaker took the chair, and the Chairman reported, whereupon I raised the point of order on the action of the Chairman, and the Speaker properly ruled the committee automatically resumed its sitting. Now, the House is interested in maintaining its rules governing its procedure when it is sitting in the Committee of the Whole, and I would like to read to the Speaker the rules on that point.

The first rule to which I wish to direct the attention of the Speaker is the last paragraph of Rule XXIII:

The rules of proceeding in the House shall be observed in Committees of the Whole House so far as they may be applicable.

Now, the rule of the House on the question of roll calls—Rule XV—is as follows:

Upon every roll call the names of the Members shall be called alphabetically by surname, except when two or more have the same surname, in which case the name of the State shall be added; and if there be two such Members from the same State the whole name shall be called, and after the roll has been once called, the Clerk shall call in their alphabetical order the names of those not voting; and thereafter the Speaker shall not entertain a request to record a vote or announce a pair unless the Member's name has been noted under clause 3 of this rule.

Now, clause 2 of Rule XXIII reads as follows:

Whenever a Committee of the Whole House or of the Whole House on the state of the Union finds itself without a quorum, which shall consist of 100 Members, the Chairman shall cause the roll to be called, and thereupon the committee shall rise, and the Chairman shall report the names of the absentees to the House, which shall be entered on the Journal; but if on such a call a quorum shall appear the committee shall thereupon resume its sitting without further order of the House.

Now, it does not say there in what particular manner the roll shall be called, but paragraph 8 of Rule XXIII specifically provides that—

The rules of proceeding in the House shall be observed in Committees of the Whole House so far as they may be applicable.

The rule of the House specifically requires the roll to be called a second time, for the purpose of recording the names of those not voting on the first call, and the rule governing the question of no quorum in Committee of the Whole provides specifically that the roll shall be called. Then how shall it be called? It shall be called in the only manner that the rules have provided for anywhere in the Manual, and that is to call it twice.

Now, I understand that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], who was acting as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole today, made this same decision once before and based his ruling on a decision of a Speaker made on March 19, 1894, which held that in the Committee of the Whole when the roll is called on a point of no quorum the rule requires the roll to be called but once. That decision is in Fourth Hinds' Precedents. There was a subsequent decision, and in Fifth Hinds' Precedents you will find that Mr. Hinds sets out the rule:

SEC. 6046. On a roll call for a vote or a call of the House the names of the Members are called alphabetically, by surname.

After the roll has been called through once, the names of those not responding are called again.

After the roll call is completed the Speaker is forbidden to entertain a request to record a vote unless in a case where a Member's presence has been noted in ascertaining a quorum.

The Speaker is forbidden to entertain a request for the announcement of a pair at a time other than that in which such announcements are in order.

By practice founded on a former rule the names of those not voting on a roll call are recorded in the RECORD.

Then it goes on and undertakes to give the history of the rule.

Now, here is the proposition I want to submit to the Chair: There is nowhere a single decision, except the one referred to in 1894, in Fourth Hinds' Precedents, which is prior to Fifth Hinds' Precedents, which I have read, governing the number of times that the roll shall be called in the committee, but the rules of the House specifically provide that those rules shall control the procedure in the Committee of the Whole wherever applicable. It is certainly applicable, for there is the same reason why the roll should be called twice in the committee as in the House. What is the reason? It grows out of the experience of the House. If the Speaker has examined the history of this rule—and I am sure he has—he knows that it arose because of the fact that, as we saw it a few moments ago, the roll having been called only once, the pit of the House was filled with Members who had not answered upon the first roll call, and the Clerk, amidst the confusion, undertook to notice and call the names of the different Members who were standing in the pit of the House. The history of the rule and the discussion of it—what little discussion can be found in the RECORD—shows that that very condition arising was the occasion for the rule requiring the second calling of the roll, because it expedited the business of the House and was more satisfactory and was more accurate.

I submit to the Chair that the House is interested in maintaining orderly procedure and its own rules governing the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. WINGO. How much time does the gentleman want?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio can be recognized in his own right.

Mr. WINGO. I rose to a question of privilege of the whole House, and I am entitled to an hour. I am perfectly willing to yield any time that the gentleman from Ohio wants.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has some question whether this is a question of privilege of the whole House, but he knows that the gentleman from Arkansas would not abuse the privilege. The Chair thinks that the gentleman from Ohio would have the same right.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, has the Chair any knowledge of what happened in the Committee of the Whole House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Arkansas did not bring it up as a question for the Chair to rule upon.

Mr. WINGO. Yes, Mr. Speaker; and I will explain why. The procedure does not affect me so much, as I am always here at all roll calls, but it is a dangerous precedent to establish, because it is contrary to the experience of the House. The Chairman having refused to entertain the point of order, the Speaker having properly ruled that he could not pass upon it when the Chairman reported to the House, the only way the House can enforce its rules on the Committee of the Whole, where its Chairman acted as in this instance, is for the House to act, as a violation of its rule is a breach of the privileges of the House. I ask for a ruling on it, and I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is a doubtful question of privilege, but the Chair is inclined to think that it is a question of privilege of the House, and the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the House that this matter had been looked up some months ago when I was in the chair and when frequent points of no quorum were made consuming much time in calling the roll. I did not decide it offhand. The Speaker will recollect that I called him to the desk at one time and told him that I would so rule in the interest of conserving time, and I notified the committee and the House that I would rule that one roll call in Committee of the Whole is the rule, and that the second roll call is simply a permission allowed in the practice in recent years, but not recognized by the rules at all.

The precedent to which the gentleman from Arkansas refers covers proceedings in the House. Of course, two calls of the roll are required by the rule in the House, but not in the committee. However, the gathering at the well of the House, either in the House or the Committee of the Whole, is not in the rule. That is a bad practice which has grown out of the fact that since the House Office Building has been erected Members remain in their offices except when the House or committee is dividing, and are not so apt to be on the floor of the House as they used to be before that building was erected. Therefore this practice of gathering in the well to be counted was entered into without any recognition in the rules merely for the convenience of Members. So far as the gentleman's statement is concerned, that can easily be cured if the House thinks it wise to do so, because it is a practice which is not recognized except by mere permission of the House itself.

Section 841 of the Manual states specifically that in Committee of the Whole the roll is called but once, and it refers to the ruling of Speaker Crisp, in 1894, on this specific question, where a Member demanded his name be recorded because the roll had not been called twice. Hinds' Precedents, to which the gentleman refers, is the only precedent, so far as I know, on the calling of the roll in Committee of the Whole. It specifically limits it to one call, while the other precedent to which the gentleman referred, quoted as a later decision, has to do with proceedings in the House. It says that on "the call of the House," and the gentleman knows that the call of the House is never made in committee. That is made in the House. Therefore the citation which he claims is the more recent one, and which he erroneously asserts nullifies the Crisp decision, refers to a roll call in the House, while the one upon which I made the decision refers to the roll call in committee. While we have been calling the roll the second time in committee, it is a practice of comparatively recent years that all Members know is a mere permission for the convenience of Members, as has been admitted and frequently stated by different Members on the floor. The House can decide whether it will continue the practice or follow the rule. I have decided on the basis of the rule.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman, I am sure, understands that this is a matter of some practical interest to all Members, and he also understands the practice which is not in the rule, but is universally observed, that the bell shall ring and notify Members on a roll call.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. CRAMTON. It is the universal practice that there shall be a ring of three bells for any roll call.

Mr. BLANTON. This is a matter which can be settled to-morrow, and I move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not interrupt the debate.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, is not a motion to adjourn in order at any time?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. CRAMTON. If the gentleman will permit, the gentleman from Ohio understands that it is customary to ring three bells to notify Members of a roll call——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present. I think we can settle this question in the morning.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to make the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. BLANTON. This discussion could be prolonged for two or three hours.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman wait for a moment until I complete my question?

Mr. BLANTON. This is a discussion that could be carried on for two or three hours.

Mr. CRAMTON. I just want half a minute in which to complete my question.

Mr. ROGERS (interrupting the count). Mr. Speaker, I want to prefer a request for unanimous consent, if the gentleman will withhold his point of no quorum for a moment.

Mr. BLANTON. Why, the previous question has been ordered, and this bill will come up for a vote the first thing in the morning.

Mr. ROGERS. But the previous question has not been ordered.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, let me suggest that we lay aside this matter until the House can vote on the previous question.

Mr. BLANTON. Very well, I withdraw my point of no quorum for the present.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that further discussion of this parliamentary point be postponed until the morning, and that the gentlemen be recognized at that time for the purpose of continuing it.

Mr. WINGO. Why, let the Chair put the question on the previous question, and then the gentleman can move to adjourn.

Mr. ROGERS. I am perfectly satisfied with that.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 43 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, October 16, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. HAUGEN, from the Committee on Agriculture, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 230) authorizing and directing the Secretary of Agriculture to prepare and issue a supplementary report on the condition of the cotton crop, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 384), which said joint resolution and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. HULL of Iowa, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 8314) to provide for the training of officers of the Army in aeronautic engineering and the issue of equipment and materials therefor, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 385), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of the following bills, which were referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9520) granting a pension to Euphrates Huff; Committee on Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 2468) granting a pension to S. P. Battle; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. TOWNER: A bill (H. R. 9944) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to accept on behalf of the United States the donation by Sedgwick Post, No. 10, Grand Army of the Republic, of its memorial hall property in Bedford, Taylor County, Iowa, for Federal building purposes; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. JUUL: A bill (H. R. 9945) to provide for reduced railway fares for discharged soldiers, sailors, marines, and nurses who served in the war with Germany while traveling to seek or accept employment; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota: A bill (H. R. 9946) to provide revenue for the Government and to maintain in the United States the production of wheat and its products; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. STEVENSON: A bill (H. R. 9947) to authorize J. L. Anderson and H. M. Duvall to construct a bridge across Great Pee Dee River near the town of Cheraw, S. C.; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. MOORE of Virginia: A bill (H. R. 9948) to amend sections 878b and 878c of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. JOHNSON of Washington: A bill (H. R. 9949) to amend sections 4 and 10 of the act of June 29, 1906, as amended, relating to naturalization, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. BLAND of Virginia: A bill (H. R. 9950) to provide for an examination and survey of the channels in Hampton Roads, Va., and James River, Va., leading to Camp Eustis, Va., with a view to increasing the width and depth of the channels of Hampton Roads and James River, Va.; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9951) to provide for an examination and survey of the channel of Little Wicomico River, Northumberland County, Va., and of the channel connecting the said river with Chesapeake Bay; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. BROWNE: A bill (H. R. 9952) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to build an addition to the present postoffice building at Wausau, Wis.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. HAYDEN: A bill (H. R. 9971) to repeal that part of the Indian appropriation act approved April 24, 1904, which authorizes the exchange of public lands for private lands included within Indian reservations; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. DALLINGER: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 232) to authorize leave of absence for employees of the Postal Service in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts who are members of the Massachusetts State Guard; to the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BROWNE: A bill (H. R. 9953) granting a pension to Almera Norton; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. COADY: A bill (H. R. 9954) granting a pension to Zora Schenkelberger; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri: A bill (H. R. 9955) granting an increase of pension to Daniel Brummett; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FERRIS: A bill (H. R. 9956) granting a pension to Venus B. King; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. HAYS: A bill (H. R. 9957) granting a pension to John M. Riddick; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. JOHNSON of Washington: A bill (H. R. 9958) for the relief of Joe F. Jenkins; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. JONES of Pennsylvania: A bill (H. R. 9959) granting an increase of pension to James Hunt; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas: A bill (H. R. 9969) granting a pension to Charles W. Anderson; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WINGO: A bill (H. R. 9970) granting a pension to Frank F. Pittman; to the Committee on Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By the SPEAKER (by request): Petition of General Synod of the Reformed Church in America, protesting against the repeal of the war-time prohibition act; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BRIGGS: Petition of Southern Pine Association, opposing Government ownership of railroads; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania: Petition of certain citizens of Mount Oliver and St. Clair boroughs, Pittsburgh, Pa., opposing adoption of the Smith-Towner educational bill, House bill 7; to the Committee on Education.

By Mr. DYER: Petition of John M. Malang, State highway superintendent of the State of Missouri, favoring the passage of the bill now pending in Congress, giving to the State further Federal aid; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, petition of Ralston Purina Co., of St. Louis, Mo., protesting against the passage of the Vestal bill, House bill 9755; to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

By Mr. JOHNSON of Washington: Petition of the Industrial Welfare Commission of the State of Washington, urging Federal regulation of the hours of labor and minimum wages for women in industry; to the Committee on Labor.

By Mr. RAKER: Telegram from the wholesale grocers of northern California, favoring the passage of House bill 7482; to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

Also, petition of Charles D. Stark, mining engineer, of Johnsville, Plumas County, Calif., protesting against Senate bill 2896, providing for the sale and use of explosives; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. REED of West Virginia: Resolutions of the Nathan Goff Camp, Sons of Veterans, Clarksburg, W. Va., condemning lawlessness and urging measures to promote patriotism and encourage loyalty to American institutions; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. YATES: Petition of the Griswald Manufacturing Co., Erie, Pa., protesting against the giving of additional power to the Federal Trade Commission; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, petition of Industrial Management, New York, suggesting to the President's industrial conference: (1) Eliminate all unfair privilege of employer or employee, and make business and industry fulfill their responsibilities to the community; (2) free all industries producing socially necessary commodities or supplying public service from selfish or incompetent autocratic control; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, petition of Princeton Post, No. 125, Illinois Branch of the American Legion, protesting against any effort being made to mitigate the punishment meted out to conscientious objectors by courts-martial, which they are now serving in penal institutions; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, petition of Princeton Post, No. 125, Illinois Branch of the American Legion, urging the passage of bill now pending providing for six months' pay to all honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, petition of the American Legion of Illinois, Washington Post, No. 100, Washington, Ill., protesting against the lessening of terms now being served by conscientious objectors; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, petition of Elgin Motor Car Corporation, Argo, Ill., favoring the open shop and insisting that stoppage of industrial processes by labor will prove harmful in the long run to the interests of organized labor; to the Committee on Labor.

Also, petition of Mathias Klein & Co., Sterne & Klein Co., the Seng Co., Pheoll Manufacturing Co., and L. W. Meckstroth, president Woodstock Typewriter Co., all of Chicago, Ill.; Rowe Manufacturing Co. and Shaw, Welsh & Co., of Galesburg, Ill.; the Williams Sealing Corporation, Decatur, Ill.; J. D. Tower & Sons Co., Mendota, Ill.; and U. O. Colson Co., Paris, Ill., protesting against the closed shop; to the Committee on Labor.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, October 16, 1919.

(Legislative day of Tuesday, Oct. 14, 1919.)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Hale	McKellar	Shields
Bankhead	Harding	McNary	Smith, Ariz.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to announce the absence of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], who is engaged in a committee hearing.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] are detained by illness in their families.

Mr. PHELAN. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] are absent on official business.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] are necessarily detained in the Committee on Education and Labor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

AUTOMATIC TRAIN PIPE CONNECTOR.

The VICE PRESIDENT. As in legislative session, the Chair submits a communication from the Interstate Commerce Commission, transmitting a report of the Chief of the Bureau of Safety relative to tests of the railway safety device submitted by the American Automatic Connector Co., Cleveland, Ohio, which will be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, without printing.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House agrees to the concurrent resolution of the Senate authorizing the Clerk of the House in the enrollment of the bill (H. R. 8624) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," approved August 10, 1917, and to regulate rents in the District of Columbia, to make certain corrections, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 3621) to establish load lines for certain vessels; and

A joint resolution (H. J. Res. 230) authorizing and directing the Secretary of Agriculture to prepare and issue a supplementary report on the condition of the cotton crop.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

H. R. 1429. An act adding certain lands to the Idaho National Forest and the Payette National Forest, in the State of Idaho; and

H. R. 9203. An act to punish the transportation of stolen motor vehicles in interstate or foreign commerce.

HOUSE BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

H. R. 3621. An act to establish load lines for certain vessels, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

H. J. Res. 230. Joint resolution authorizing and directing the Secretary of Agriculture to prepare and issue a supplementary report on the condition of the cotton crop, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. LODGE presented a memorial of John McBride Branch, Friends of Irish Freedom, of Lawrence, Mass., and a memorial of sundry citizens of Latimer County, Okla., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Baptist Association of Worcester, Mass., praying that aid be extended to Armenia, and for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. NEWBERRY presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Coldwater, Mich., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of Hiram Lodge, No. 1, Free and Accepted Masons, of Detroit, Mich., and a petition of Bersheba Chapter, No. 9, Order of the Eastern Star, of Detroit, Mich., praying for an investigation into the recent race riots and mob violence, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. PENROSE:

A bill (S. 3235) fixing the compensation of United States inspectors of customs; to the Committee on Finance.

A bill (S. 3236) granting an increase of pension to Emma Taylor; and

A bill (S. 3237) granting a pension to James Donnelly; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WADSWORTH:

A bill (S. 3238) relating to detached service of officers of the Regular Army; and

A bill (S. 3239) to amend the Army appropriation act for 1920 so as to authorize travel allowances to persons discharged from disciplinary barracks and other places of confinement other than honorably, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. NELSON:

A bill (S. 3240) for the relief of the heirs of Edward H. Ozmun, deceased; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 3241) to authorize the incorporated town of Ketchikan, Alaska, to issue bonds for the construction and equipment of schools therein, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Territories.

By Mr. NEWBERRY:

A bill (S. 3242) granting an increase of pension to John W. La Rue; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. KING:

A bill (S. 3243) to reduce the tariff duties on the importation of manufactures of wool; to the Committee on Finance.

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 115) to lay an embargo on the importation of raw wool into the United States until the Government stores of raw wool are disposed of; to the Committee on Finance.

AMENDMENT TO DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SMOOT submitted an amendment authorizing the Bureau of Efficiency to investigate the methods of business of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance and to report to Congress, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the first deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

RECEPTION TO THE KING OF THE BELGIANS.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I send to the desk the following order, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The order was read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That on Tuesday, October 28, 1919, at 1 o'clock p. m., the Senate will take a recess until 1.30 o'clock p. m., that it may receive His Majesty the King of the Belgians.

PROMOTION OF THE PUBLIC HEALTH.

Mr. FRANCE submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 13), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That a joint committee be, and is hereby, created, consisting of three Members of the United States Senate and three Members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House, respectively, to make a survey of and report on those activities of the several departments, divisions, bureaus, offices, and agencies of the Government of the United States which relate to the protection and promotion of the public health, sanitation, care of the sick and injured, and the collection and dissemination of information relating thereto: Provided, That the Medical Department of the United States Army and the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery of the United States Navy shall not be included within the scope of this survey.

SEC. 2. That such committee is directed and empowered to report to the Congress not later than March 1, 1920:

(a) The statutory powers and duties conferred by the Congress on any department, division, bureau, office, or agency of the United States Government to carry on any work pertaining to the conservation and improvement of the public health, together with any rules and regulations authorized or promulgated thereunder.

(b) The organizations now existing in the Federal Government for the purpose of carrying out these powers and duties, together with the personnel of, appropriations for and expenditures by each department, division, bureau, office, and agency during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919.

(c) The coordination now existing between said departments, divisions, bureaus, offices, and agencies, together with any conflicts, overlapping or duplication of powers, duties, functions, organization, and activities.

(d) The cooperation and coordination now existing between the Government of the United States and the government of the several States or extragovernmental agencies for the conservation or improvement of the public health.

(e) Such further information as such committee may deem proper.

(f) Such recommendations as such committee may deem advisable to offer for the improvement of the public health work of the United States Government.

SEC. 3. That such committee be, and hereby is, authorized during the Sixty-sixth Congress to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ experts deemed necessary by such committee, a clerk and a stenographer to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be before such committee, such stenographer's service to be rendered at a cost not exceeding $1 per printed page; the expenses involved in carrying out the provisions of this resolution one half to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate and the other half out of the contingent fund of the House; and that such committee may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Congress.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I ask the indulgence of the Senate for a very few moments while I state my position upon the Shantung amendment.

I shall not attempt to relate the history of the Shantung matter. It has already been described with a particularity of detail and wealth of invective and eloquence. Certain facts, however, do not seem to be disputed, namely, that 20 years ago Germany, using as an excuse the murder of two German missionaries, demanded of China certain concessions in Shantung, including a lease for 99 years of the Bay of Kiaochow, involving certain administrative rights and privileges; that she took undue advantage of the weakness of China to exploit her appears to be obvious; that a wrong was thus committed which history can not countenance seems conclusive; and that for 20 years the United States and the principal civilized nations of the world have acquiesced, entering no protest. No Senator, to my knowledge, has ever denounced the transaction in this Chamber, and, so far as I know, our Government has never objected.

I do not claim, Mr. President, that this vindicated Germany's aggression any more than our failure to act when Germany, in her brutal course, overran Belgium with destruction, death, and waste condoned that crime. Even then we did not act, and, moreover, we were parties to a treaty providing at least for the neutrality of Belgium. Thank God, we finally entered the war when it seemed uncertain whether democratic government should survive in Europe.

But, returning to Shantung, I repeat that for 20 years we did not intervene or protest. What was the situation when the war broke out? Germany was in possession of a naval base on the Pacific Ocean, where she could have threatened the transportation of troops and supplies from Australia and New Zealand, and when we entered the war she could have imperiled our commerce upon the Pacific. The Allies were struggling against the might of Germany; the issue was unsettled. It was absolutely necessary that Germany be driven out of China and her naval base destroyed. I do not say that it could not have been accomplished by China, with the cooperation of the Allies, nor do I know that it could have been.

The Allies, however, called upon Japan, which nation was very instrumental in relieving the Pacific of this menace to the commerce of the Allies and in ending Germany's dominion in China. I do not contend that Japan was justified in her demand that she succeed to the German rights acquired in China. It is undoubtedly true that, in 1915, China agreed to Japan's succession to the rights acquired by Germany in the Province of Shantung. It is quite likely that Japan, adopting German tactics, employed duress, China's position being such that she could not resist. The United States is not associated in any way with those proceedings, nor did it participate in the secret treaties by which certain allied powers conceded the claims of Japan to whatever rights Germany may have acquired in China. I think those treaties should have been made public. I have upon this floor denounced, as have other Senators, the negotiation of secret treaties, and, in my opinion, the United States should have been informed of such treaties when she entered the war. The United States certainly would have discountenanced them and avoided embarrassment in negotiating the peace treaty. I wish to dissent from the principles of those treaties, and I wish the United States, through its Senate, to dissent, and to refuse to be bound by that secret agreement between Japan, England, and France.

Mr. President, I concur in the remarks of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], stated on the 27th day of August, 1919. He was asked this question:

> Suppose we put it in the treaty that China is given the rights that Germany formerly owned in China, and it is agreed to by the other nations except Japan, what method does the Senator suggest by which we can enforce an agreement like that?
> Mr. BORAH. "The Senator from Idaho" is not seeking for any method by which to enforce the treaty. "The Senator from Idaho" is desirous of relieving the United States as a Government from the burden or obligation of undertaking to maintain that which he conceives to be founded in immorality.

I indorse every word of that statement. We should seek to relieve the United States Government from the burden or obligation of undertaking to maintain that which we conceive to be founded in immorality, and I am willing to adopt the course suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] yesterday when he read to the Senate a proposed reservation refusing to ratify the Shantung provisions of the treaty. That places the United States squarely upon the proper ground. I would go further and readily vote for a resolution which, I understand, was suggested by ex-Secretary Root, of New York, which reads as follows:

> In ratifying the said treaty the United States reserves and declines to become a party to the agreements contained in articles 156, 157, and 158 thereof relating to Shantung, or to recognize the validity of any rights, titles, or interests which Germany purports by the said articles to renounce in favor of Japan.

Such a reservation would certainly place this country in the position of refusing to ratify the bargain which has been denounced here as immoral and in violation of the principles for which we stand. That seems to me to be exactly the position this country ought to take. It would accomplish what would have been accomplished had our commissioners in Paris declined absolutely to enter into this arrangement. I shall not take the time of the Senate to discuss that question at length, but let me make one further suggestion: Can we accomplish more simply by changing the terms of the treaty? Let us see how article 156 reads. As amended it would read:

> Germany renounces, in favor of China, all her rights, title, and privileges—particularly those concerning the territory of Kiaochow, railways—

And so forth.

Germany has not done anything of the kind. She has said she renounced in favor of Japan. We say we will not be bound by that bargain; we utterly repudiate it. Of course, if we write a new treaty we can not take that position; but we are morally bound to see that it is carried out; and how shall we accomplish it? Shall we negotiate again with Germany and insist on the treaty in this respect being rewritten, assuming the obligation ourselves to decide whatever the rights of Japan in China may be?

I think that Japan should not control any part of China, but Japan undoubtedly has a just claim for compensation on account of the war, which, I believe, everyone recognizes and which, I am told, China recognizes. We propose to decide it regardless of this consideration and compel Germany to make a new treaty, and insist that England and France and Italy, upon whose shoulders rests the responsibility of those secret treaties, shall write a new treaty. I do not believe we could accomplish it; I do not believe it is a position that we could honorably take.

I have heard a great deal said in this Chamber about entangling alliances in European affairs, and I sympathize with the desire to avoid them. For one, I desire the United States so far as possible to be free from the jealousies and entanglements that are prevalent in Europe, but the pending proposal certainly is not consistent with that desire. We are here directly taking upon ourselves for the first time in 20 years the responsibility of correcting this wrong.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] last evening was perfectly frank about this matter. He certainly has been perfectly frank and open in his discussion and opposition to this treaty, and I respect him for it. Everybody knows just where he stands. He certainly is not assuming to be in favor of the German treaty and at the same time trying to kill it with an amendment. His statement is as follows:

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, before the Senator from Massachusetts moves to take a recess, in reply to the able Senator from Wisconsin as to the apparent inconsistency of our voting for this amendment and then voting to defeat the entire treaty, I desire to say to him that in my humble way every possible vote that I can cast anywhere along the line in the hope of defeating it I am going to cast.

Undoubtedly the distinguished Senator when charged with being inconsistent can say he has never been, and he may console himself with the reflection which Gladstone made in the later years of his life, "Thank God, I have never been consistent."

It does seem to me that the only honorable course the United States can pursue is to declare its disapproval of these articles, refuse to be bound thereby, and reserve complete freedom of action respecting this matter. We will then occupy an honorable and an advantageous position.

I have no quarrel with the Senators who disagree with me. I may be wrong. I have been a good many times. I respect their judgment. They should respect mine. The motives of Senators who believe that this country should dissent from those provisions, refuse to ratify the treaty, reserve full liberty of action, and leave to England and France the entire burden, if they wish to assume it, of carrying out their secret treaties, should not be impugned.

Mr. President, I simply approach this subject from another point of view than the Senator from Idaho. I want to accomplish what I believe to be the same object in a way that I think would be consistent with the honor and the dignity of this Nation. I desire that the treaty with Germany be ratified, with such reservations as will absolutely protect the United States. I shall not vote to give any nation or any power or any council or any assembly the authority to regulate the political, domestic, and internal questions of this country, and I can not understand the position of men who would allow any foreign country to dictate or have a voice in those questions which must shape the destiny of this Nation. I do not believe in internationalism. I believe in nationalism; and I am going to vote for every reservation which preserves the absolute freedom and independence of this Nation in effecting the greatest nationalism, because I believe that the hope of the world depends upon the honor and the enlightenment and the progress of this Nation.

I can not understand the sentiment of any man who would bind this country to engage in war without the action of the constitutionally constituted authorities of the Nation; and I am not going to vote to imperil the Monroe doctrine, which for nearly 100 years has been a weapon of safety in the hands of the American people. Nor am I going to vote to place the seal of approval of this Nation upon any dishonorable bargain made at Versailles, but I am going to take that course which appeals to my judgment as being the most honorable and the most effective in ratifying this treaty.

I have no sympathy whatever with those who think the provisions of the treaty are too harsh upon Germany. If a swashbuckling criminal goes up and down your streets murdering the inhabitants, you punish him with death.

As Lloyd-George said, is the swashbuckler of Europe to be free to go up and down the streets of Europe spreading devastation and ruin and committing crimes unspeakable and not be punished? The German people must be made to feel down in their hearts that they have committed the greatest crime ever known against the civilization of the world. I wish to join in enforcing against Germany to the bitter end a punishment that will deter any civilized nation in the future from making such a war, and I wish to do it at the earliest date possible.

I can not understand many provisions that were agreed to in this treaty. It is weak where it ought to be strong, and it is strong in some places where it ought to be weak; but I shall not stop to discuss it in detail. I can not understand why the labor provisions should have been included—why one class of people should have been allowed such recognition when the great farming class of the world, producing wealth and food, are utterly ignored. We should encourage the farmers of the world more than any other class. Show me a nation whose people are independent proprietors of the soil, rich in agriculture, and I will show you a great civilization. Show me one where agriculture is decaying and I will show you a moribund nation. It was the destruction of the yeomanry, the hardy farmers of Italy, that caused the destruction of the Roman Empire; and so here why should not this treaty have included agriculture and the farmer?

The treaty is before us. I have no sympathy with those who say, "Oh, we should accept it just as it is," and abrogate our functions. That is an absurd position. But we should accept the major part of the treaty, preserve the sound and proper provisions as far as possible, ratify the treaty, and end the war. I believe that is for the best interests of the people of this country. I believe it is for the best interests of the disorganized and unhappy peoples of Europe. It is not perfect. No treaty or outcome after the destruction of practically all the governments of middle Europe could be perfect; but out of it, I hope, will come the nucleus of a peace which may redound to the benefit of mankind.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I voted against the Fall amendments last week. I shall vote against the Shantung amendment to-day; and while I am on the subject I may as well say that I expect to vote against the Johnson amendment to the provision giving Great Britain and her colonies six representatives in the assembly of the league of nations to our one when that amendment comes before the Senate for action. I also expect to vote against any other amendments that have been or may be proposed to the treaty. I fully believe that the treaty, as far as we are concerned, must be changed, but I believe that the changes may be brought about through reservations instead of through amendments. Long since I made up my mind to follow this plan, and I see no reason to change it.

In the case of Shantung I do not in any way approve of the provisions of the treaty, but I do not want to have this country left out of the treaty on its account, and I shall be satisfied at the present time with a reservation which will make it clear to the world that we are no party to the wrongful transfer of Shantung to Japan.

The idea that Great Britain or any other country will have a greater representation than ourselves in the assembly or council of the league of nations is repugnant and abhorrent to me. It is an outrage on the American people and is intolerable, but I am very certain that a reservation can be substituted for the amendment which will be equally strong if not stronger in protecting our American rights. Unless such reservation shall be adopted I have no hesitation in saying that I shall vote against the ratification of the treaty. Long since I made up my mind to stand for strong reservations instead of for amendments, with the full belief that with such reservations this treaty can, with our interests safeguarded and without sacrificing our American traditions can be ratified.

If we can not get such reservations I do not want to see the treaty ratified, but I am morally certain that we can get them. I can see nothing in the adoption of any of these amendments which can in any way aid in the adoption of the reservations that I want to see adopted. On the contrary, it seems to me that the adoption of any one amendment nullifies the benefit that we shall get from the reservation plan and may jeopardize the ratification of the treaty, and I do not want to see it so jeopardized.

On July 10 the President laid the treaty before the Senate. On September 10 the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] reported the treaty from the Committee on Foreign Relations. Since that time the treaty has been under discussion in the Senate. I think that everybody in the Senate and in the country is sick and tired of the whole debate. All of us know exactly how we are going to vote. We have reached the stage of recrimination. Each faction accuses every other faction of ulterior motives, of playing politics, of being pro-German or pro-English, of wanting to defeat the ratification of the treaty altogether, of being weak-kneed. This is a body of honorable, patriotic Americans, all working, I firmly believe, for what they consider the best interests of their country as they see those interests. The last two accusations I have mentioned are the only ones worthy of notice.

That certain Members of this body do want to defeat the ratification of this treaty is perfectly true. They admit it openly, and they have a perfect right to take that stand; but by taking that stand I claim that they forfeit all right to lead us Senators who do not want to defeat the ratification of the treaty and to say what measures we shall or shall not adopt in bringing about such ratification.

And as to the accusation that some Senators are weak-kneed, let me say that no Senator is weak-kneed who has honestly worked out in his mind a plan, of whatever sort it may be, which in his heart of hearts he believes to be for the best interests of his country and who follows that plan through to the end. The weak-kneed ones are those—and I hope there are none in this Chamber—who, because of popular clamor or the fear of a misunderstanding as to their reasons for voting for or against certain measures, do not vote as their conscience directs them.

Mr. President, let me say in closing, I have the highest regard for the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. I have nothing but admiration for the patience and consideration and skill which he has shown in handling this treaty in the Senate. I do not in any way question his leadership, but let me venture my humble opinion that if we really want to dispose of this treaty, the way to do it is to hold this body to night sessions and force the matter to a conclusion. The country wants action; the Senate, or the great majority of it, wants action; and, however necessary the delays in the past may have been, I believe the time has come when we can and should take action.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, on account of the fact that the Pacific coast is deeply interested in the settlement of this question, I desire to suggest a new line of thought, in part, which may be of interest to the Senate. Our familiarity with the Japanese in California entitles us, I venture to say, to express an informed opinion, and in approaching this question I am sure the people of California will divest themselves of any prejudice, if they see a larger advantage to their country in taking their stand in this crisis side by side with the treaty of peace with Germany and the Covenant of the league to enforce it.

When Commodore Perry opened Japan he did not know what was in it. Ever since it has been a Pandora's box of trouble; but we, having brought this oriental problem on ourselves, are now obliged to find a remedy or a way out.

It is not the concern of China alone, but of the United States as well. The world itself is a party at the bar. We are talking of the political and economic policy of Japan. We are discussing her paramount position in Asia. If not restrained, sir, she will reduce all Asia. She has come into the Pacific. She has crossed the Pacific. Several administrations have had so much respect for her prowess at arms that they have offered no effective resistance to her peaceful penetration of America! At this very hour the Pacific coast is invaded, and the Territory of Hawaii, "the key of the Pacific," is in her hands. She has there an army of occupation. Her reservists are in possession. Twelve thousand Americans face 112,000 Japanese in the naval base of our Pacific Fleet! She is there about ready to take peaceful and legal control of the civil government. Yesterday I read this Associated Press report in a Washington newspaper:

HONOLULU, HAWAII, October 3.

Within 14 years Hawaiian-born Japanese will hold the political control of this Territory, according to the Rev. Dmetaro Okumura, a prominent Japanese clergyman, speaking at a church convention here. To prepare for the inevitable, declared the Rev. Mr. Okumura, it is essential that greater efforts be made to Americanize the younger Japanese who are growing into the franchise.

Born on the soil, they are still ineradicably Japanese. These people do not amalgamate with our own. They are permanently foreign, nonassimilable, and ineligible to citizenship, and owe allegiance to Japan. In California alone 100,000 Japanese, constantly increasing by law evasion, surreptitious entry, and by a phenomenal birth rate, are repeating the story of Hawaii, with the added peril of extensive land ownership and control. The best agricultural lands of the State are falling into their hands. The movement, I believe, is directed from Tokyo. Although not accompanied yet by the tramp of marching troops and the salvos of naval guns, it is none the less a real conquest. The Caucasian flees before the advancing Coolie. It is time to sound our trumpets and hold our ground!

You will understand, then, in approaching a discussion of this question raised by the Shantung amendment, I am not ignorant of the dangers that lurk in Japanese dominancy in the Pacific. I would, by any legitimate means, check her advance or turn her armies. Turn them where? Why, back upon Asia, where they belong. "The Lord made all men of one blood, but determined the bounds of their habitation." My answer therefore is that the remedy must be found either in the covenant of the league of nations or in the increase of our naval armament; and I am in favor of trying the league first. I see in the Shantung amendment the seeds of treaty disaster, and therefore I shall oppose it. Let us analyze the situation.

The award by the peace conference of Shantung to Japan, as embodied in the treaty of peace with Germany, articles 156, 157, and 158, reads as follows:

Germany renounces in favor of Japan all her rights, title, and privileges, particularly those concerning the territory of Kiaochow, railways, mines, and submarine cables which she acquired by virtue of the treaty concluded by her with China on March 6, 1898, and of all other arrangements relative to the Province of Shantung.

Other paragraphs specify details. Twenty-one years ago Germany acquired, by treaty, from China, without protest from the United States, the rights herein enumerated for a period of 99 years. The methods by which this was obtained may be open to question just as the methods by which the other countries, including our own, have acquired territory. Soon after the war was declared in 1914 Japan entered the conflict by declaring war against Germany; and later entered into secret agreements with England and France, Italy and Russia, by which she was to acquire the German concession—doubtless as a reward for her participation in the war. Subsequently the United States entered the war, and at the Versailles conference learned for the first time of the bargain which Japan had made. By treaty China herself has since confirmed the German rights to Japan. That is the law of the case. What service did Japan render? What was the consideration? Before the secret treaty was negotiated she sent her armies against Germany and drove that power out of Asia by taking, by force of arms, Germany's holdings in the Shantung Peninsula; and the treaty of peace with Germany seeks to confirm Japan's succession to German rights. Japan also expects to be awarded the mandatory of the German islands north of the Equator.

As an ally, Japan protected the Pacific against the enemy, and by reason of her alliance with the Entente Powers the United States was free to send her Army and Navy abroad, which resulted in the winning of the war. If Japan had allied herself with Germany—and there was always a fear of this—the United States could not have afforded to have left unguarded her Pacific possessions, which would have kept her troops and ships at home. So, as it turned out, the services of Japan were of real value, although she did not send her armies to the front and was very chary with respect to the disposition of her ships.

Because the United States asked nothing for her services, we are disposed to look upon the other nations as international profiteers, and this has biased our minds against the countries which have sought and secured their own aggrandizement. One of the German islands, the island of Yap, is desired by the United States for radio and cable purposes, and it is yet a question whether the award shall be made. That it should be made there is no reasonable question, because the only object is to improve our international communications, which should be of benefit to the eastern world. Unless we are prepared to deny Great Britain, France, and Italy the spoils of war, we can not with entire consistency in the circumstances exclude Japan. It offends, I will, however, admit, one's sense of justice to see a country peopled by the Chinese taken over by either the Germans or the Japanese, the English or the French, who do not claim to have any considerable number of their nationals in the territory, but who take it for purposes of expansion or trade exploitation.

The Japanese are a very prolific people, and have been constantly seeking more territory for their excess population, and have in turn taken Formosa and Korea, neighboring States. They had beaten China in war in 1894, and had taken a part of Manchuria. They had, in 1904, beaten Russia, taken Port Arthur, and established their position as a world power. The Chinese Republic, so called, with a population of 400,000,000, is so badly organized that it can not defend itself against vastly inferior numbers, and has been and is exposed to the predatory territorial and trade designs of other countries as well as Japan. All America has a genuine sympathy for unfortunate China; but how far should America go in this case, and how far to save China from further absorption by Japan? In this case Japan had not wantonly attacked China, but had attacked Germany and taken away German rights which were conceded by treaty to Germany by the Chinese, who later by treaty confirmed them to Japan.

Hereafter, under the constitution of the league of nations, Japan can not commit an act of aggression against China without incurring the prescribed penalties. In other words, the league is China's future protection; and if an attempt is now made to disturb Japan's title to rights in Shantung without her consent it is probable that Japan would withdraw from the league; and she is quite equal to making alliances with other countries, such as Russia and Germany, as soon as they are rehabilitated. The question, therefore, is one not for the expression of our sympthy or resentment or for the reconquest of Shantung against Japan, but to see how far the success of the league and the peace of the world are served by our noninterference at this time. Japan has promised to restore Shantung to China, but asks to be allowed to do it in her own way; but the league can, if so disposed, hold her to it.

Let me repeat, the nationals of Japan are swarming the Pacific, and have made very serious inroads upon the Pacific coast of the United States and the Hawaiian Islands. Two hundred and fifty thousand Japanese, it is estimated, are in the United States and our Territory of Hawaii, and constantly increasing. In California they are absorbing the best agricultural lands and driving the white men from the country in a fierce competitive struggle. It is only a matter of a short time, unless interrupted, when Japan will be master of agricultural California. The "gentlemen's agreement" has broken down; and I have recently introduced a bill in the Senate which, if enacted into law, will exclude Japanese just as the Chinese are excluded now.

It is our stern duty to consider the interests of our own country before the interests of any other land; and not only are our own interests embraced in the preservation of peace but in ridding America of the Japanese incubus. If Japan must expand, then her expansion in Shantung, by agreement with China, and in Siberia is more acceptable to us than her expansion in America, both North and South. She has inaugurated a steamship service which dominates the Pacific, and is landing her nationals upon North and South American shores. If we exclude Japan from America as a wise national policy, then we should not be unduly alarmed about Asia. But we need go no further than Shantung in the acceptance of this idea. What she now holds in Asia is an ample field. The league of nations will prevent her forcible expansion in the future, and Japan is a member of the league of nations. For this purpose we must keep her there.

The President, at the peace conference, reluctantly consented to this arrangement, doubtless for these reasons: Because he could not mend the past; because he could not repudiate—not having the power—the treaties entered into by England and France, Italy and Russia, with Japan. He made the best of the situation by consenting to the granting of the German lease to Japan, having exacted a promise that she would return the territory to China, and he has since requested an expression from Japan as to her present intentions as to the date of the transfer. That was as far as he saw fit, thinking principally of his own country, to go. As to China, a decrepit nation, taught nonresistance by Confucius, without apparently the means of defending her own territory, the league of nations, with Japan included, certainly seems to be for her a great and permanent boon. Does China want us to abandon the league or leave Japan out of it? No one will blame China for making her protest; and she ultimately may attain a position of power by which, like France and Italy, she may be able to win back her lost Provinces and measure her strength with the "Huns of the East." "Hereditary bondsmen know ye not who would be free, themselves must strike the blow."

Japan, German trained, is, in all respects, like the defunct German Empire, seeking power and territory, and, if not arrested by the league of nations, will ultimately be the cause of another and more serious war. And the United States is deeply concerned in checking the unholy ambition of Japan just as she did check the ambition of Germany, and it is by force of the league of nations that this may be done, possibly without involving a clash of arms, but simply by the moral weight of the associated nations and their power to exert economic pressure. Germany was allowed to progress too far. Japan is yet in the infancy of her budding dream of empire. So the task is not difficult to check her without humiliating her nor offending what has become peculiarly Japanesque—national sensibilities. Let us see whether she will keep her promise to China before we post her as a "welcher" and bar her from the society of nations.

When the Philippine commission was in Washington last summer, its members testified before the Joint Committee on the Philippines and prayed for independence. They admitted that by the guiding hand of the United States, over a period of 20 years, they were fitted to assume control of their own government. At that hearing was this colloquy, taken from the record:

Senator PHELAN. I would like to ask, Mr. Quezon, if, after you were assured of independence, would it be the intention of your government to apply to the league of nations, if it exists at that time, for membership, and would you regard that as a sufficient protection against outside aggression?

Mr. QUEZON. Yes, sir; I think so.

Senator PHELAN. And your desire is to have your independence within a reasonable time in order that you might make that application for membership in the league of nations?

Mr. QUEZON. Yes, sir.

And then he went on to testify that, in case the Philippines did not join the league of nations, the United States would, he thought, resent any attempt by Japan to attack the Philippines after their independence had been granted by the United States—that is to say, the people of the Philippines look first to the league of nations, and, failing in membership, look to the United States, on account of the special obligation we have toward that country.

But by joining the league of nations they will save themselves from aggression and at the same time save the United States from engaging in a war with Japan. This shows very clearly not only the security which China will also enjoy against future aggression, but it also shows how the league tends to avert war and to preserve the peace of the Pacific and of the world.

While I am frank to say that I would go far to cripple the present and potential menace of Japan in the Pacific, I do not see how that purpose can be served by dividing the league of nations and seeking vainly, with the aid of the other powers, to deny her the German rights in Shantung. On account of the treaty obligations, England, France, and Italy are in no position to join with us in any such revision of the treaty even if they were well disposed; and any upset on this question at this time might result in the isolation of the United States, and, certainly, the disruption of the league. Furthermore, does not Japan's own promise to China, the President, and the conference relieve us of the necessity of action at this time?

But let China know that the league, for the first time, sets up a tribunal to which she can make appeal and seek a settlement; or, at the worst, at the expiration of the lease, the league, if it endures, can enforce the terms of the treaty of peace with Germany granting only a lease, and to save her sovereignty.

But, Mr. President, why, therefore, should Senators express such hysterical concern? Remember collaterally that Japan and China, if united and organized, would be a great menace to America and Europe. And would it not be a real diplomatic achievement to keep Japan and China apart, which, while it is far from our purpose, is at this time actually accomplished by the irritation growing out of the Shantung incident. Japan is disposed to yield, in some partiulars, to placate China, because it is her imperial policy to use China in the fulfillment of her ambitious designs. The nations of the world, for their own interests, are opposed to the further dismemberment of China, and it is not improbable that article 10 was set up, among other reasons, as a bulwark against Japanese aggression. China, if no other recourse was left her, could well afford to pay with the temporary Shantung lease for this protection.

So, from whatever angle you look upon it, in the light of American interests, it seems to be a situation to leave severely alone; and, beyond all question of doubt, there is nothing in the compulsory solution of it at this time favorable to China which would offset the grave danger to the peace of the world by the otherwise probable disruption of the league of nations.

But a false issue has been interjected into the debate. Japan's invasion of America has suggested a punitive expedition into Asia, and here, it is said, is our opportunity.

I do not see how the question of Japanese immigration and naturalization is involved in this matter at all.

We will not consent to "race equality," which involves immigration, naturalization, the elective franchise, land ownership, and intermarriage. It was rejected at Paris. These are domestic questions with which the legue has no concern, and, lest there be a doubt under article 11 as to the power of the league to take jurisdiction, I am in favor of an explicit interpretative reservation on the subject.

For the reasons stated, which seem to me conclusive, I will vote against the Shantung amendment. I am dispassionate. I am calmly considering American interests. I am not indulging in hatred of Japan nor seeking to injure her, actuated by either fear or resentment. Neither am I sentimental. I have asked myself, "What is best for the United States in this crisis? What is best for China and the world?"

If an uncompromising attitude on our part should alienate Great Britain and France and Italy and force them to stand for Japan, pursuant to their treaty obligations, it might jeopardize the success of the league of nations itself and the treaty of peace with Germany, which embody the fruits of victory. The world hangs upon our decision.

We should, in the spirit of a watchful, benign, and unselfish Republic, remain in the league, and, by disinterested counsel and the moral power of our exalted position, guide its deliberations aright.

We acted with magnanimity in the war; we shall not assume a mean and pusillanimous part in the constructive work of peace.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I do not hope to add anything to the information which has already been submitted to the Senate after a debate which it seems to me has already been too greatly prolonged. I do feel, however, that it is proper for me at this time to express very briefly my views on this particular amendment.

I regret exceedingly that so many harsh things have been said relative to Japan. Very much intemperate criticism has been indulged that might better have been omitted at this time, a time when we are seeking to compose the great troubles of the world. Japan was our ally. She was in the war before the United States entered it. She rendered invaluable service against Germany and the United States should be the very last to condemn her improperly.

There are two sides to the question in spite of all that Senators may say. Japan has more than a color of title to the Shantung territory. She holds it by a treaty with China. She holds it by conquest. She holds it by a later treaty with the Allies. Whether her treaty with China is a conscionable one or not is, of course, debatable. Germany's title, obtained in 1898, was of doubtful equity, but prima facie Japan's title is good.

Now, the treaty that is before us has been enacted, so far as this territory given to Japan is concerned. The Allies have agreed to its provisions. Whatever we do will not change the situation. We can not, if we would, turn Shantung over to China. I do not like it. I like it as well, however, as I do other provisions of the treaty.

We had one representative, and practically only one representative, at the peace table, and he was much less concerned about the treaty of peace, for which he was supposed to go to Europe, than he was in the league covenant. He evidently consented to things which he now admits were not wise or just. But I think I am perfectly fair to the President when I say that he apparently had little concern in the treaty and great concern in the league. That treaty distributes the spoils of war among the Allies. The United States gets nothing; it wants nothing. It seemed necessary that it should join in the treaty, which is already effective so far as the Shantung territory is concerned without the signature of the United States.

The principal question with us is, Shall we join in this treaty or shall we make a new one, a separate treaty, with Germany? I think the wiser course is for us to join in this one. But made, as it was, without due consideration for the responsibilities and embarrassment of the United States in the matter, and it now being before the Senate for its consent, it seems to me not only wise but entirely patriotic for the United States to declare in the articles of ratification just what our position and understandings are.

Our position is, and it is the only defensible position for us to occupy, that this treaty was arranged and agreed to by the Allies for their own selfish benefit, the United States being a party only nominally, and that those concerns belong to the Old World countries and not to ours. I am in favor of reservations in reference to this matter which shall make this point clear.

I am unalterably opposed to section 10 of the league covenant as it was presented to the Senate, and which, improperly in my judgment, involves us in the troubles of the Old World, and which requires that we shall carry out the provisions of the treaty as to the distribution of territory among the Allies; in other words, it binds us to maintain existing boundaries, boundaries such as are involved in the Shantung incident. I am opposed to that, and propose to so reserve it, as to make it clear that we assume no such obligation whatever. That is a constitutional question; that is a question that can only be solved when it arises by the United States Congress. I want to attach to the resolution of ratification such a reservation in reference to Shantung as will show that we do not approve of its transfer to Germany in 1898, and that we insist that Japan must transfer that territory to China. I want to make clear that the United States is not responsible for this treaty provision. I am willing to wait the future to determine whether or not Japan is going to carry out what is practically a promise by her to return this territory to China at the close of the war or when peace is established.

I do not want to change this treaty as proposed by the wording of this amendment substituting China for Japan; for, by so doing, the United States becomes responsible for a distribution of the spoils in Europe. That is what I am protesting against. I want to keep out of the map-making business for the Old World. This amendment if adopted becomes our proposition, and we must defend it. I want to wash my hands of the whole matter so far as that is concerned; and it can be done by proper reservations.

As I said a few weeks ago, unless not "mild reservations" but strong, meaningful reservations are attached to the resolution of ratification, I shall feel it my duty, without a question, to vote against the whole treaty. My duty is clear to me. I have doubt about some matters in the treaty which have been intentionally complicated. When the President went to Europe, I repeat, he was interested in a league of nations and regardless of the treaty, and he carried out his threat to so complicate the league with the treaty as to make it difficult, if not impossible, for the Senate to perform its full duty.

But, Mr. President, it is a condition that confronts us now. Here is a treaty agreed to for the benefit of the Allies in Europe. I want them to assume the responsibility; and I want to say in the resolution of ratification that we are not responsible. I want to define just exactly what our attitude is. Then, I want this treaty consummated, for we have already indulged in debating this matter long enough. Now, we ought to act upon it. I think every Senator is prepared to vote and act according to his conscientious convictions of duty.

I shall not criticize Senators who vote against me on this proposition; I am going to accord to them the same honesty of purpose that I demand for myself; but it has been embarrassed by prejudices, by propaganda from every source, and it has, indeed, been difficult for Senators to conclude what is best for our country under all the circumstances. Many of its provisions are clouded in mystery. No man can truthfully say that he clearly understands it. On this amendment, however, I am clear and I shall vote against it, believing confidently that we shall have an opportunity to vote for a declaration of the United States Government as to what our attitude is in reference to this whole matter. I am willing to leave the matter where it belongs—with the Allies, with the Old World countries, who are responsible for this treaty. They have already settled it.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I read from the concluding paragraphs of the pending treaty, as follows:

A first procès-verbal of the deposit of ratifications will be drawn up as soon as the treaty has been ratified by Germany on the one hand and by three of the principal allied and associated powers on the other hand.

From the date of this first procès-verbal the treaty will come into force between the high contracting parties who have ratified it. For the determination of all periods of time provided for in the present treaty this date will be the date of the coming into force of the treaty.

It would appear, Mr. President, that this treaty, then, is already in force, so far as Great Britain, France, Italy, and Germany are concerned; and, if not in force, so far as Japan is concerned, it is a foregone conclusion, I think, that it will be in force at an early date. Accordingly, so far as the relation of the powers named to Shantung is concerned, this treaty is an accomplished fact.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. STERLING. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. Did the Senator from South Dakota see in the morning papers the dispatch in reference to the treaty going into effect?

Mr. STERLING. I did not.

Mr. LODGE. That dispatch reads as follows:

PEACE IS POSTPONED NOW INDEFINITELY.

PARIS, October 15.

Formal ratification of the peace treaty with Germany, making it effective, which was expected this week, has been indefinitely postponed, the American delegation to the conference announced to-night.

The decision not to complete the formal ratification this week was due chiefly to the inability of the three ratifying powers upon the Entente side to make the necessary preparations to carry out provisions of the treaty which must be attended to within a brief time after the actual ratification.

Earlier in the day it was supposed that on Friday or Saturday representatives of Great Britain, Italy, and France would exchange ratifications with Baron von Lersner, the present head of the German mission.

Pierpont B. Noyes, American member of the interallied Rhineland commission, conferred to-day with Frank L. Polk, head of the American delegation to the peace conference, regarding the status of the occupied area of Germany, which may be left without either civil or military government when the formal completion of the Versailles treaty, without American participation, brings the armistice agreement to a conclusion. The Rhineland convention, which creates a civil commission with British, French, American, and Belgian members, stipulates that all four Nations must designate their members before the commission can function.

Military government over the territory must end with the armistice, and the peace conference is having difficulty in devising an interim government pending American ratification.

Mr. STERLING. By whom, may I ask, is the ratification postponed?

Mr. LODGE. By the three powers that have ratified the treaty.

Mr. STERLING. They have indefinitely postponed the going into effect of the treaty?

Mr. LODGE. The dispatch reads:

The decision not to complete the formal ratification this week—

Which can only be completed by the deposit of ratifications—was due chiefly to the inability of the three ratifying powers upon the Entente side to make the necessary preparations to carry out the provisions of the treaty which must be attended to within a brief time after the actual ratification.

Mr. STERLING. I have not seen the dispatch to which the Senator calls attention.

Mr. LODGE. The result which the Senator has described will be the same.

Mr. STERLING. I think the result will be the same, and that the treaty will be ratified.

Mr. President, I have during the progress of this debate been somewhat interested in the very high moral ground taken by some Senators who are in favor of the pending amendments. It seems to me, at times, that it is late in the day to stand on such a high moral plane with reference to treaties between nations. There was no great protest at the time of the cession of Shantung to Germany.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, was there any protest at that time?

Mr. STERLING. I do not remember any protest. There is this to be remarked, however, concerning our policy, attributable to the great statesman and diplomat, John Hay. As Secretary of State he contended for the open door in China, and in that respect accomplished great things. But following the treaty between Germany and China under which Shantung was ceded to Germany we had this situation: Russia acquiring a lease of Port Arthur on the same terms under which Germany acquired Shantung; Great Britain, not to be outdone, immediately demands the cession of a port to her, and Wei-hai-wei is ceded or leased to Great Britain for a long term; France is not to be behind, and so she immediately proceeds to acquire concessions from China, and her dominion over Kwang-chau Wan is the result. Italy desired concessions, but at that point China refused further concessions, and Italy did not succeed in securing them.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Does the Senator know whether John Hay was Secretary of State at the time Germany obtained her so-called concessions from China?

Mr. STERLING. I am not quite certain, but I think not. I think he became Secretary of State just a little later than that—about 1900 or shortly prior to 1900.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The reason I asked the question was——

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, it was about the 1st of September, 1898, that John Hay became Secretary of State.

Mr. STERLING. Then, that was after the cession of Shantung.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To whom does the Senator from South Dakota yield?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The reason I asked the question was that I understood the Senator to comment upon the fact that the United States had made no protest at the time Germany acquired whatever she did acquire from China, and he referred in complimentary words to the policy, if not originated, insisted upon, by Secretary Hay as to the open door. I saw in the public prints the other day that Secretary Hay was not Secretary of State at the time the Germans obtained their concessions, and I am glad to hear it confirmed on the floor of the Senate; but I call the Senator's attention to the fact that we were not a party to the acquisition of whatever Germany obtained from China.

Mr. STERLING. I understand that perfectly, I will say to the Senator from Connecticut. We were not a party, but we did not protest in any way; there was no official protest, and, so far as I remember now, no general sentiment among the people of the United States against the acquisition by Germany of Shantung.

Mr. HITCHCOCK and Mr. McCUMBER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska, who rose first.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have before me the exact dates of the successorship to the office of Secretary of State, if the Senator would like to have them.

Mr. STERLING. I should be pleased to have the Senator read the dates.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. McKinley went into office on the 5th of March, 1897, and appointed John Sherman as Secretary of State. He was succeeded on April 26, 1898, by William R. Day, who was succeeded on September 20 of the same year by John Hay.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. To confirm what the Senator from South Dakota has said, I wish to call his attention to the fact that at the time the German treaty was made we not only did not protest, but we simply asked Germany if she would agree to maintain the "open-door" policy, and Germany replied that she would continue to maintain the "open-door" policy, and we replied simply thanking her for that assurance. That was almost equivalent to an agreement with her.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that during all of that time the War with Spain was either on or was threatening. The difficulty with Germany grew out of the fact that Admiral Diedrich, who was in command of several German battleships, went down to Manila Bay, as the Senator will remember and as other Senators will recall, and that Dewey had to threaten him on that occasion. Soon thereafter he joined Prince Henry at Tsingtau, where they captured that harbor and that fort, and took possession; and it will be recalled that at that time we were actually at war with Spain. I happened to be a Member of Congress at that time, and I recall that it was with fear that we read the paper every morning, lest we might be engaged in a controversy with Germany also; and while we were engaged in that one war, it would have been the sheerest folly for this country to have committed any act that would have compelled us to go to war with Germany, because the sound, sane policy of that administration, as always of any country at war, was "one war at a time."

That, in my judgment, is the reason why we did not protest. That was sufficient reason for not entering a single protest on that occasion.

Mr. STERLING. Let me ask the Senator from Indiana now if he really thinks that if we had not been at war with Spain at that time there would have been a protest on the part of the United States, or the Secretary of State of the United States, against the acquisition of Shantung? I doubt very much whether there would have been any such protest.

Mr. WATSON. My candid judgment is that there would have been. It was in exact line with the policy of that administration, and was certainly in harmony with the action of John Hay.

Mr. STERLING. Does the Senator recall having heard it discussed in official or diplomatic circles?

Mr. WATSON. I do not, for the very reason I have just mentioned—that we were at that time engaged in a war with Spain.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. The Senator might ask the distinguished Senator from Indiana whether there was any protest when Korea was absorbed by Japan. I do not recall that any warlike attitude on the part of any nation in the world deterred us then from raising our voice against what they denominate a great crime.

Mr. WATSON. There was not; but we had not then come to the John Hay policy in the Orient. Not only that, I will say to my friend from Utah, but two wrongs do not make a right. I have no apology to make for the action of our country with reference to Korea. I think it was absolutely wrong, and I believe that it would have been in keeping with the highest national morality if we had protested, even under the conditions that beset us, when Germany took possession of Shantung.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Dakota yield just one moment further?

Mr. STERLING. I yield.

Mr. KING. Under the treaty which we had with Korea there was a moral obligation resting upon this Government to intervene, or at least to make representations against the wrong which was being wrought against her sovereignty; and we were asked to do it by Korea, and we failed to respond.

Let me make just one further observation. I place against the patriotism and the statesmanship of John Hay the patriotism and the statesmanship of Theodore Roosevelt. Theodore Roosevelt was President, as I recall, when Korea was annexed. No; I am in error in respect to that.

Mr. WATSON. That was in 1910.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, the protectorate of Japan over Korea was in 1907. Korea was absorbed into the Empire of Japan in 1910.

Mr. KING. What I was about to observe was that, with respect to Germany's aggressions in the Orient, Mr. Roosevelt made no protest.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. Roosevelt was not President when the German aggression took place in 1898.

Mr. THOMAS. He was President in 1907, when the protectorate was declared.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; but while it is immaterial in one sense, because an equally strong man was President, yet, as a matter of fact, Roosevelt was not President in 1898. It was McKinley.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I call attention to these facts, not for the purpose of defending the acts of Germany or of Japan, but because of the high moral ground on which Senators supporting the amendment appear to stand. We did not, whatever the circumstances, protest against the acquisition of Shantung by Germany; nor did we protest against the acquisition of Port Arthur for a like term of years by Russia immediately following; nor did we protest against the acquisition of Weihai-wei by Great Britain; nor did we protest against the acquisition of Kwang-chau Wan by France. There were other events plainly involving moral questions as to which we have been silent, making no protest. I do not defend them. But, further, we did not protest the invasion of Belgium, great as that wrong was, but we were advised about that time to be neutral in thought as well as in word and in deed; and I may say that the people of the United States of America seemed for the time being to be in accord with the sentiment, although a tremendous moral issue was involved, when, under some kinds of leadership, the sentiment of the people of the United States would have been aroused on that great moral issue.

Mr. President, fault is found because the treaties made early in 1917 between Japan and Great Britain and France and Italy were secret treaties. I hail the coming time of open diplomacy. I believe in it; and, of course, in times of peace all diplomacy should be open; but how otherwise than by a secret treaty could they have acted at that time? Must they have published to the world, Germany and Austria included, the terms of the treaty between Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan? I think not; and it was not to be expected that the treaties would have been published to the world.

What, perhaps, were some of the motives for making such treaties at the time? Well, of course, there was Japan's part in the war. Under the Anglo-Japanese alliance, she came into the war in August, 1914. She did not render a part or a service in the war of which she particularly boasts, as I understand, but rendered valuable service. She rendered service, of course, in the capture of Kiao-chau; she rendered a great naval service; and she rendered a further service by supplying in the year 1915 alone $100,000,000 worth of munitions of war to Russia, including 750,000 rifles, or rifles enough to equip several divisions of Russian troops.

Recognition, then, on the part of these other powers, put to the stress that they were in this war, was one motive, undoubtedly, for the secret treaty with Japan. Japan, after the taking of Kiao-chau, had furnished a fleet that convoyed the British transports from Australia and New Zealand to the seat of war. She sent her flotilla of submarines to the Mediterranean Sea, a little later on, that kept the way clear from Gibraltar to Suez and from Marseilles to Alexandria. That was a part of the service that Japan rendered in the war.

So much, therefore, for the position of the Allies at that time. The war had been going on two and a half years and America had not yet gotten into the war when these secret treaties were made and the issue hung in the balance. I find no particular fault with the treaties made with our allies or our associated powers and Japan in that regard. I think it was such a treaty as probably might have been expected, for they said, "China has, by agreement with Germany, given a lease for 99 years on Shantung, and under the circumstances we are not taking anything away from China." It was but natural that under the stress of circumstances in which they were placed they should so reason.

Now, Mr. President, what is the situation? It has been argued here that we should make this amendment and have the treaty go back, with the hope that Great Britain and France and Italy might recede from the position they have taken in regard to Shantung and the transfer of it to Japan, and we would have our way; we would be able to carry out our idea of the moral question involved, and all would be well. But, Mr. President, is it believed by a Senator here that under the obligations they have assumed in the treaty with Japan that Great Britain or France or Italy are going to renounce that treaty and agree to our proposed amendments to articles 156, 157, and 158 of this treaty?

I do not for a moment believe they can, and, Mr. President, I could not have a very high opinion of them and of their sense of honor if they did. They are bound by every sense and sentiment of honor to stand by their treaty. They will do it, I believe, trusting that Japan will, in the course of time and in a reasonably short time, renounce her claims to Shantung.

So, Mr. President, with the treaty an accomplished fact, practically—though I qualify now the statement formerly made by what the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] read into the RECORD from a dispatch found in the papers this morning—yet I think for all practical purposes we can treat it as ratified as to these three powers and Japan, without any hope of alteration in respect to the Shantung provisions of the treaty.

But, Mr. President, there is the wrong, nevertheless. We can more than make protest against it and against the acquisition of territory by any nation under the circumstances, or in such circumstances as those under which either Germany or Japan acquired Shantung.

We can in unmistakable terms, as we should, have a reservation here, such as was foreshadowed in what the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] said last evening, a reservation withholding our assent from these three articles, and reserving the right of full liberty of action in any case or in any controversy arising under articles 156, 157, and 158 between China and Japan.

I think, Mr. President, in conclusion, that I simply voice the general sentiment of the people of the United States to-day, and I hope I am not presumptuous in saying so. Are they in favor of this treaty just as it is? No. The overwhelming sentiment of the people of the United States is against it. As an example of the sentiment of my own people I received but yesterday a communication from the registrar of a ministerial conference in the northern part of my State in which they asked for the ratification, but with "reservations"; and I think they know now, for the most part, what reservations should be adopted here in our resolution of ratification.

For my part I would not vote for an amendment that I believed would defeat the treaty, if at the same time we can protect American rights and interests by reservations. I believe we can. I have said enough, Mr. President, to indicate how I shall vote when it comes to voting on the Shantung amendments.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I desire to take only a minute or two in referring to the debate of yesterday and the day before. I think it very appropriate, while epithets of dishonor are being hurled against those who fought and bled and died for the cause in which we, as a great Nation, were engaged, that I should say one word in favor of our allies. I may need to apologize to the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL] and the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] if I draw certain conclusions from their own expressions which they might say would impugn the motives of a Senator.

Mr. President, I do not think that our allies in entering into the treaty with Japan were committing a henious offense. I do not think they were committing even a dishonorable act. I deny that they were taking the territory of one ally and delivering that territory to another ally, for the simple reason that they were taking nothing but what was held by Germany, our enemy, and at the time of the taking, the date of the treaty, China was not our ally at all, not having at that time made her paper declaration of war.

Mr. President, in 1915 Great Britain had but a little army in the field, but was attempting to form a great army to place upon the battle front. At that time her ships were going down at the rate of 10 a day, and some weeks more than 70 of her stately ships were being sent to the bottom of the ocean. France was being pressed to death. She was bled white along every line of battle. Italy was at that time scarcely in the field. They were dark and gloomy days not only for the Entente powers but for the civilization of the world. Japan had seized whatever rights Germany had in China. With these German leasehold interests in her possession, France, Great Britain, and Italy entered into an agreement with Japan that she might hold what she had thus taken, and that in the final treaty they would sustain her claim to hold what she had wrested from Germany.

China had not turned over her hand to wrest from Germany what Germany had taken from her in 1898. At that time she was not even protesting against it. At that time she was submitting to it in all humility. What offense, then, Mr. President, was committed by France and Great Britain and Italy in saying to Japan—possibly to keep her in the war; I can not say—"You may retain whatever rights you have taken from Germany"?

So far, Mr. President, I do not think that it is in the mouth of any American to condemn the action of our allies in making the treaty. The very lives of the nations of the Old World were in the balance when the treaty was made. It was no dishonorable act against China, because China was making no claim of repudiation at that time, either that she would make war against Germany or that she would resist the German rights. On the contrary, about that time she had agreed with Japan that the latter might hold what her armies had wrested from Germany.

Mr. President, referring to words that were used yesterday, and I approach them with some timidity and fear, lest some one will raise the objection that by quoting the words of a Senator I am imputing to him some wrongful motive, I find these declarations made by a Senator yesterday:

To fail to advise the United States of the terms and conditions of those treaties, * * * in view of the announced principles of the United States in the conduct of the war, amounted to bad faith upon the part of the countries which withheld the information, bad faith to such an extent as to relieve the United States from any moral obligation whatever of giving any consideration to the terms of those treaties.

Mr. President, it is not necessary that we should give any consideration to the terms of the treaties if we do not wish to do so, but that course can not be predicated upon the theory of any bad faith on the part of our allies.

Again quoting, with the permission of those Senators:

But when they concealed those treaties, their terms and obligations, from the people who were entering into the war upon a specified program and upon specified principles, they had no right thereafter at any time ever to ask the United States to give any consideration to their terms.

And again:

They not only concealed them, but, if I may be permitted to say so, they affirmatively misled the world in regard to the fact of their concealment, and particularly the United States.

Mr. President, Senators have gone further than that, and have asserted as a fact that when Joffre and Viviani and others were present here on the Senate floor, when we listened to their earnest declarations as representing countries that were bleeding to death in this struggle, when every sympathy of the heart of the great American people was responding to every word that they said, those men, Joffre and Viviani and Balfour, were deceiving the United States; that it was their duty to inform us then and there, in the Senate and by publication, just what agreements they had made with Japan upon the Shantung proposition.

Under what theory of ethics, Mr. President, were they compelled to tell us? At what time in the struggle, Mr. President, did the obligation to publish their treaties to the world occur? Before the United States declared war certainly no one will claim that there was any obligation resting upon them to publish to Germany or to the United States or to anyone else what their treaties were at that time. The moment the United States came into the war, upon what theory were they then compelled to give that information to the United States and to the world?

The theory was given by the Senator yesterday, when he said:

But when they concealed those treaties, their terms and obligations, from the people who were entering into the war upon a specified program and upon specified principles.

What were they? What were the specified principles upon which we entered into the war that required other cobelligerents to make known to us what treaties they had made prior to our entry into the war? What effect would the knowledge of these treaties have made upon our war program? Well, Mr. President, I suppose that our declaration of war gives us the real reason for which we entered into that war. I have never had much sympathy with these reiterated declarations that we went into the war to uphold some great principle. We did nothing of the kind. We went into the war because we declared that Germany had made war upon us, and we were defending ourselves. We never said a continental word about any other principle in that war. This is what we said:

That a state of war between the United States and the Imperial German Government, which has been thrust upon the United States, is hereby formally declared.

That was all the reason that we declared. War had been thrust upon us, and we defended ourselves.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Nothing was said about fighting for a world democracy or fighting for any principle. If we had been fighting for principle, if that was the reason for the war, then why did we not get into it when it was started, because we knew what the principle was then just as well as we knew three years after that? I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator is not in accord with the theory, then, that we went into the war to defend the principles embodied in the 14 points?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; I am not in accord with it at all. We went into the war because war was made upon us. When Germany said to this country, "You can paint one ship like a barber pole, and when you do that you may then cross the ocean once a week with it," we knew we should have to fight, and we did. That was all there was to it. We did fight. I admit that there was a great world principle at stake; but, Mr. President, that was not what brought us into the war.

I want now to say just one word to those Senators who are talking about pro-Germanism and saying if anybody disagrees with them that they must be pro-German in their sympathies. Mr. President, there were Senators in this body who voted against war at all, and they were just as patriotic as any Senator who voted for the war. I can recall the former Senator from Missouri, Mr. Stone, now passed to his long resting place. No braver, truer, better American citizen ever lived, and no more patriotic individual ever existed than former Senator Stone, and yet he was not in favor of entering into the war. So of many Senators, those who believed, like the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] that, in the beginning of the war, before we were driven into it, it would have been proper for us not to have sold munitions of war to either party. I do not challenge their Americanism because of these views, because the moment we got into the war I do not know a Senator who was not for its prosecution heart and soul.

Mr. President, I made a statement in the Senate the other day and was criticized for it. I think if the then occupant of the chair had given the point of order a little further consideration he would scarcely have ruled that a statement that we seemed in our earnestness to be more solicitous of the interests of Germany since the war has closed than we were for our allies, who helped to fight that war, was impugning the motive of any Senator.

Mr. President, I am solicitous to-day of the interests of Germany. She is a great nation, a powerful nation, a nation of intellectual genius in many respects, a progressive nation, a brave nation, and once she has repudiated her hellish doctrine that a State can do no wrong except to fail in her grabbing propensities, once she has repudiated the theory and philosophy taught in all of her schools that it is the duty of any State to take and hold whatever she has the power to hold, then I will welcome Germany into the league of nations. I know that she will be there, and in a very short time, if the league of nations is adopted; and when she is there I believe that she will be a force and a power for good, because she has capabilities if only the minds of her people shall be directed along humanitarian as well as intellectual lines.

So, Mr. President, I do not think that I was open to criticism when I stated that I thought that in our debates, on the part of those who are opposed to the treaty, that they have very often, in those debates, evidenced seemingly no interest in the Allies, but some solicitude for Germany. Let me call attention to the words, and if I draw an improper conclusion I may be criticized for my conclusion, but I will submit the words and see whether Senators would draw the same conclusion.

I find here in a speech made a short time ago by a Senator, after discussing the hardships that had been imposed upon Germany, these words:

For this territory—

Referring to the German territory that was separated from her—so ceded, nobody pays Germany anything, nor is any credit allowed Germany for it on her reparation account, to which I shall shortly refer.

Then, again, after referring to the many requirements for payment of indemnities, he said:

It is admitted that certain of these damage rules violate the principles of international law as hitherto recognized and observed by the family of nations. The reason why we as well as the enemy should discard such benign principles as have been worked out by the nations in the last centuries is not clear.

And again, condemning the treaty, this Senator said:

The more I consider this treaty the more I am convinced that the only safe way for us to deal with it is to decline to be a party to it at all. I think we should renounce in favor of Germany any and all claims for indemnity because of the war and see that she gets credit for what we renounce.

That sounds to me like some solicitude for Germany, and I am willing to stand upon my statement that it is a solicitude.

Again, from the same speech:

It is indeed a hard and cruel peace that this treaty stipulates, and I have no objection to its being so, but see no reason why we, who do not partake in its spoils, should become parties to its harshness and cruelty. I see no reason why we should be parties to imposing upon Germany a treaty whose terms, our negotiators say, she will not be able to meet.

It sounds to me a little bit as though he were solicitous of the financial interests of Germany.

But, Mr. President, if the Senator making that speech had turned to the treaty he would have found two provisions that govern indemnities and reparations all the way through—first, that Germany shall not pay any more than she is able to pay. What is the rule to determine that? Second, that Germany shall pay as high a tax to meet the indemnity to repair the wrong as the other nations have had to pay in order to prevent her committing a greater wrong. Is there any injustice in that against Germany? Can the German people complain that there is any wrong in it? No, Mr. President.

But there is another thing that I do not like in the speech to which I have referred, and that is the statement that America can do anything she sees fit with her dollars; that we have dollars in abundance; and that we should use those dollars to buy commercial friendship, and thereby secure an advantage over our allies. The testimony that was given before the committee in support of our renouncing whatever should come to us in reparation was that we could buy the German good will, their friendship, and thereby secure trade. No thought of our bleeding allies, no thought of the 1,500,000 noble French boys who were killed in France, no thought of the 900,000 sons of Britain and Canada and Australia whose graves billow the plains of that country.

We should, according to them, use our dollars to buy German trade away from our allies, who can not afford to do likewise. I do not agree with either the philosophy or morality of such a proposition.

Now, Mr. President, returning again to the matter of the good faith of our allies, or lack of good faith, in not publishing their treaty, when was it necessary to publish that treaty? I asked the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] whether he thought that it would have changed our position in the slightest degree in the matter of conducting this war if that treaty had been laid before us.

He replied, "I do not." Well, then, if the information would not have changed our course in the slightest degree, then how can it be claimed that it was a treacherous act, an act of gross deception? There was nothing that would have changed us in the slightest degree. Therefore, if there was nothing in the secret treaties which would have affected our prosecution of the war, I deny that it was incumbent upon anyone to publish those treaties, because if they published them to us they would also have published them to Germany and to the countries with which they were battling. The moment the war was closed we received everything to which we were entitled.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to say but one word about this matter of the German title not being transferable. Of course, the treaty between China and Germany provided that Germany could not transfer that title, but the treaty did not provide, and could not have provided, that China herself could not transfer it. That is just exactly what China did.

It is said that because China declared war she thereby repudiated the agreement with Germany and vitiated it, and that thereby Japan got no interest. That is a queer philosophy, it seems to me, Mr. President. If A makes a deed of land to B, for no consideration, we will say, and then afterwards deeds the same land to C, and then, after that, A gets into a quarrel with B and says he repudiates the conveyance to B, that it thereby vitiates the deed to C. That is all there is, Mr. President, in this Shantung nontransferable contention. A declaration of war by China against Germany does not affect an agreement made between China and Japan.

So we come down to the question of a reservation. I think that it is necessary to have a reservation. I have prepared two. I think we should hold Japan to her treaty with China, and in her treaty with China she agreed to return Shantung, leasehold and all, that she had received from Germany. I agree that we should hold her to her statement made in Paris that she would return it, which statement is among the minutes of the proceedings. The way, however, to do it, Mr. President, is first to assume that as a nation she will do it.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] asked, "If she intends to do it, why does she not do it to-day?" Put yourself in the position of Japan. Suppose by a solemn treaty we had agreed to return, whenever the treaty was signed, property which our armies had taken, and some other nation came to you and said, "We do not trust the United States; we have no confidence in them; they are tricky; they are dishonest; therefore, we will take it upon ourselves to make the transfer before we give them an opportunity to perform their agreement." What would the United States do? Do you think she would stand or surrender? She would say, "I have my treaty obligations; I will fulfill them of my own volition; and the whole world can not compel me to do it until I do it under the terms of my agreement; I will not be driven into it." Japan is in exactly the same position, Mr. President. Not only that, but the world would be in a position to bring the power of the entire world—and I am speaking now only of the persuasive power—to compel Japan to make good her treaty agreement. If she made at Paris an agreement that was still more favorable to China, she should keep that agreement. I think, Mr. President, that that is the only proper way to proceed in the premises. It is the fair way between nation and nation; and it being the fair way, and so long as Japan is a nation and is recognized as such, then, in Heaven's name, let us treat her as such.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I shall vote against the pending amendment, although I regret that our representatives at Paris consented to the disposition made of Shantung. I only wish to say that in voting against this amendment I shall do so because I consider a wiser way to handle the subject will be either by reservation or independent resolution clearly to define the attitude of the Senate with regard to it. When such a reservation or independent resolution shall be before the Senate, we shall have an opportunity of handling the question in a satisfactory manner, and I hope such a reservation or independent resolution may be adopted in language which I can support.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have taken no time of the Senate to discuss the pending peace treaty with Germany, nor do I expect to do so. I am ready to vote upon any reservation, any amendment, or upon the treaty itself, at any time without further discussion.

The pending amendment is the most difficult question affecting the treaty for me to decide. I want my action to show my unalterable opposition to the action taken at the Paris conference in giving Shantung to Japan. In the Shantung provision we are asked to defend injustice as well as economic slavery. That I can not do.

If the pending amendment were the only way in which the United States could refrain from indorsing the Shantung infamy, I should vote for it. A reservation can be made to reach the same end as far as the United States is concerned; and I intend to vote for a reservation, in substance, as follows:

The United States refrains from entering into any [illegible] part in reference to the matters contained in articles 156, 157, and 158, and reserves full liberty of action in respect to any controversy which may arise in relation thereto.

I think such a reservation covers the case just as thoroughly as an amendment would cover it. I shall vote against the amendment. Under no conditions would I vote for the treaty in its present form. Unless reservations are made to it, I shall vote against it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I do not put these amendments or our relations with the associated nations in this treaty on any moral ground. On the 17th day of July, 1919, I stated the grounds on which I objected to articles 156, 157, and 158 of the treaty. The first ground was the treaty of 1858 with China, which recites:

There shall be, as there have always been, peace and friendship between the United States of America and the Ta Tsing Empire and between their people, respectively. They shall not insult or oppress each other for any trifling cause so as to produce an estrangement between them, and if any other nation should act unjustly or oppressively the United States will exert their good offices, on being informed of the case, to bring about an amicable arrangement of the question, thus showing their friendly feeling.

That treaty is binding in good faith upon both nations at this time. If we are to show our friendly feelings toward China under that obligation it binds us to protest in every proper way against articles 156, 157, and 158. This may or may not according to the mental complexion be called a moral ground. I only refer to it as a treaty obligation. If we are to show a friendly disposition toward that power it is our duty now to begin to protest against what is admitted to be an injustice.

I have another reason, Mr. President, and it is not a moral reason; it is one purely prudential in character. I stated it on July 17 last. I had then the same motive and the same purposes in view that I have now. At that time I said:

"The United States Government must look well to its own defense and preservation. I regret not to be able to accept the splendid dreams generated by the league of nations. I believe our safety is not mere sentiment; it will rest in the strong arm and disciplined military forces of our people. We have denied Japan the right of immigration for her subjects. It has been repeatedly alluded to during the peace conference of Paris by representatives of that nation. The equality constantly proclaimed in the league logically directs Japan's thoughts to that denial. Its refusal has sunk deep into their sensibilities. It is a wound to their pride. We are vulnerable in the Philippines. Our great friend lies beyond in the people of the Chinese Republic. In our day of peril it must be remembered that the interests of Great Britain and Japan in the Orient are identical."

Mr. President, the British East Indies, together with protectorates lately assumed, constitute Great Britain's interest on the mainland of Asia. Some 300,000,000 Asiatic people live under her dominion. Her possessions give her a strong hold on the Asiatic continent, and are vitally important to her world-wide commerce. She has recently entered into arrangements with Afghanistan; there is, it is understood—and it is but ill concealed—an arrangement that amounts to a protectorate over the newly created State of Hejaz. In addition to that, the protectorate over Egypt, referred to by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] on yesterday, is an accomplished fact. England will no more relinquish her hold on Egypt than Japan will relinquish her hold on Korea or Manchuria. These, therefore, constitute the reasons why England and Japan have an identical interest in Asia. They will not be found hostile to each other in the years to come. We must look out for ourselves.

I have no desire to hold the Philippines, except as a war result. I never would have voted, if I had been in this body at the time, to acquire the Philippine Islands; and at the first favorable opportunity I would either give them their independence or I would transfer, with their consent, to some Asiatic power the entire group of islands and relinquish our interest in them forever. I regard them as a governmental liability, that there is in it no profit to us, no honor, and nothing but a source of continual expense.

Therefore, in the day when trouble occurs the United States will not find in those two powers a friendly alliance. The trouble is more likely to come, as intimated on the floor, from Japan; and in that time our great friend will be China, if we treat her justly and in keeping with the treaty of 1858. Therefore the wise course for us to follow, as well as the duty we owe to China as an equally faithful ally if not more useful than Japan, is to keep faith with her, so that in the future she may be our friend.

Our greatest friend may then be the Chinese people, whom to-day we are asked to humiliate and dismember. Let us remember, not in selfish purpose but upon the immutable principles of justice to a great people, that we ought to defeat these articles 156, 157, and 158 in this treaty.

I stated that last summer. Nothing has occurred to change the reasons that were urged at that time. I find myself of the same opinion still. I believe every Senator here will have the same opinion after all has been said on the floor of this Chamber. It is not with any purpose of changing some Senator's opinion, I believe, that anything is said. It is more to justify the vote that the individual gives upon a roll call on this measure.

Mr. President, I heard yesterday, part of the time—I did not hear all that was said but I heard it argued yesterday at some length and to-day—that because we did not protest in 1898 we are estopped now. Various Senators this morning have stated that we can not now be heard because we made no complaint in 1898, when this Province was taken by force of arms from China. It is argued, therefore, that now, when we are called on to ratify this treaty, we can not be heard to criticize it, but that we must accept the treaty as it is presented to us.

In 1898 we were not engaged in going about over the world meddling everywhere. We were then occupied in attending exclusively to our own business. We confined our interposition to affairs in the Western Hemisphere. If other nations undertook to acquire territory or to interfere with existing forms of government in the New World, we protested, and protested in apt season, and effectively. We protested at the close of the Civil War, when France undertook to place an Austrian prince over the Mexican people. We sent our forces to the banks of the Rio Grande. We protested against the invasion of the Monroe doctrine. Again in Cleveland's administration, when Richard Olney was Secretary of State, he gave to the world a proclamation in substance to the effect that we administer law on the Western Hemisphere, and what he proclaimed through the Executive of this Republic was the fiat to be observed by the nations of the Old World. That was law then under the Monroe doctrine, and it is law now. We have confined ourselves to the New World in years past; and only in 1917, when, following the declaration of war, we engaged with the associated nations against a common enemy, did we go beyond our own borders.

We, therefore, have stayed on this side of the Atlantic and on the same side of the Pacific, our own shores. We have not sought to interfere in the affairs of the Old World, because of this established policy which we announced nearly a hundred years ago, the Monroe doctrine, that is sought to be preserved by divers amendments, and by a revision, even, of the original document sent to us last February for our approval.

Having confined ourselves to the New World, we did not interfere with the affairs of the Old. If Germany took portions of the Chinese territory by force, we did not protest. It was not a part of our policy. When we went with other powers to interior China to protect our legation and our citizens, we then protested against the dismemberment of China by the European powers. There is found the first protest in the form of Secretary Hay's "open door." That was in 1900, some 18 or 19 years before this document was presented to us. So the only thing that we can complain about, it is said now, has been in the nature of our delay, such as to constitute, I suppose, what lawyers would call an equitable estoppel. That does not operate upon nations nor upon governments. We can not be held here to have foreclosed our right to protest at this time.

Mr. President, there is another thing outside of mere lapse of time. Let this be called a 99-year lease—and it is the most transparent flattery to refer to it in that way. Let it be called a lease. The acquisition of leasehold interests in property, real estate especially, by sovereign powers within the borders of another sovereign power is not attended with the same conditions that attend the acquisition of private property by private owners. It is not regarded as a matter of common right that a sovereign power may come inside the territory of another sovereign power and acquire real estate, either the fee-simple title or long leaseholds, unless the power within whose borders the territory is acquired shall be consulted and shall acquiesce in it.

I can go as an alien, if the law of any foreign country permits it, and purchase any quantity of real estate in any foreign country. I can hold it. It is not a matter for international negotiation or for diplomacy to recognize my right so to hold it, if the domestic laws governing the acquisition of real estate in that country permits me to do so. But if my Government goes into another country and acquires there either leaseholds or the fee-simple title to real estate, it can be done only upon negotiation with the country wherein that real estate is found. It is an invasion by a sovereign power, withdrawing it ordinarily from commerce in it. The grantee of the real estate or the lessee is not subject to the laws of nature; the Government is perpetual in its life; and for that, as well as the entry upon sovereignty, no such rights can be acquired except by the consent of the country within which that territory lies.

Germany acquired a 99-year leasehold in the borders of the Chinese Empire. It was under a threat, it was by military force, that the term was created. It was not a voluntary act, and it is generally conceded in discussing the question that it was not a voluntary act on the part of China in granting the leasehold. It being an involuntary act, Mr. President, whenever the power that applied the force to China withdrew, either voluntarily or by force of arms, then the leasehold taken from China by force or threats returned by force of Germany's retirement. The reversionary interest of the lease, if gentlemen wish to be technical about it, as a matter of right, returned to China instantly upon the withdrawal of Germany. Whenever Germany entered into an arrangement by which China lost her interest and Japan acquired it upon the withdrawal of Germany, it was in contravention of the common right of the Chinese Republic.

We are asked to ratify it. There is this difference between voting upon this treaty and interfering in 1898 with the affairs on the mainland of Asia. Then we were living under the Monroe doctrine. We were taking care of our own affairs. We were declining to go abroad and mingle in the affairs of all the powers of the earth. We were justified then in letting other people and other nations attend to their affairs. Now, the treaty is brought into this Chamber and we are asked affirmatively to ratify it. We are asked to place the seal of our approval on these articles referring to the Shantung territory. Affirmatively we are asked to ratify what before, 20 years ago, was not of our concern. There is a difference between active approval of a theft, the burglary of a friendly power, and a silent abstinence from approving or disapproving by attending to our own business, pursuant to our policy of nearly a hundred years.

Mr. President, this territory in the Province of Shantung belongs to China. At best, there could only be a delayed reversionary interest. Why not write the guaranty in the treaty? If all that is said in this treaty is right, if it is ratified, it would leave a reversionary interest in China, and it ought to be provided in this treaty that this unexpired lease shall return to the sovereign that involuntarily gave it in 1898.

We are asked, however, to approve it, and put ourselves in the attitude not only of approving it, but of turning around on the heels of article 10 of the league and binding ourselves to defend it by entering into a moral obligation. If Senators are at all sensitive about moral obligations, then it must be conceded that under article 10 of the league this itself is a moral obligation, and is so interpreted—interpreted by all who support it, interpreted by the Executive, interpreted by the authorities in Europe—that it imposes moral obligations; and if that be so, then we must either break our moral obligation or we must come to the rescue in case China attempts to reassert her claims over this territory and retake it from the power that now seeks to seize it.

Mr. President, it is not my intention to occupy much of the time of the Senate, but I simply wish to protest against the assumption that because in 1898 we did not protest, did not make objections to arrangements then entered into involuntarily by China to ward off threatened military invasion and the devastation of her territory, that we are now bound. That is a strange morality. It is a strange interpretation.

I have listened to interpretations all the way across the continent and in this Chamber. There are enough interpretations of the league of nations and of this treaty to make the Arabian Nights, if put alongside of it, look like a revised edition of Greenleaf on the Law of Evidence. I have heard interpretation after interpretation that refines away all of its powers. I am told that there is no real power, that it is only a question of recommendation; that they can recommend, they can advise, they can tell us what they wish to be done, but, after all, it being a moral obligation, whether we observe it or not is for us to say.

Concede that that be true, it does not seem that a moral obligation is ineffective in producing results when our Navy goes into Italian waters, when two regiments are to be ordered to Upper Silesia, when the Secretary of War begins to estimate that it will take 150,000 of our troops to administer the Armenian mandate, when ill-concealed rumors come through the press and are published broadcast and when it is generally understood in this Chamber that the Executive already has bound us to an Armenian mandate. The supreme council seems to be issuing effective orders.

A circular has gone out very recently admonishing us that Armenia is on the brink of destruction; that we must interfere, and that actively, or she will be soon destroyed by the Turk and her territory as well as her people be devastated, and there will be no use then for any nation to intervene, because annihilation will have been fully accomplished.

Following on this a great number of doctors of divinity in various parts of the country have been quite active in having resolutions passed by their congregations. A great many religious organizations, headed by those same doctors of divinity, have besieged Members of Congress immediately to ratify the treaty and save Armenia from impending butchery. I wish to say to those preachers, whatever creed they have, that they are awaking late in the day to the great moral movement to preserve the Armenian people.

Mr. President, I again call attention to what I said here some months ago, that the Turk exists to-day as a separate Government in Asia, and is found in Europe, not because of the United States, not because of Armenia, not because of the Greek Catholics, the Russians, or others of that church residing in Turkish territory.

Armenia and the Turk are a pressing problem to-day, because England and France in the Crimean War, from 1850 to 1854, kept the Turk in Europe. The Russian Government would have destroyed the Turk's Government, would have dismembered his territory, would have impoverished, if not overthrown and destroyed him, for slaughtering Christians; but England, France, and the then kingdom of Sardinia all joined with the Turkish Government to defend against Russia, and his Government exists at this day.

It was like the partition of Poland. It suited the purposes of Great Britain years ago to ignore the partition of Poland. When Frederick was on the eve of destruction, more than 150 years ago, when his enemies had crowded him into a corner of Prussia, when his soldiers were without provisions and without munitions of war, when his country was bankrupt, England intervened to save him from destruction. The partition of Poland followed in due course, and the three great powers that divided the territory, England taking none, all had either the passive or the active acquiescence of England in the partition.

I am not hostile to Great Britain, but I believe it well enough to remember some historical truths about that mighty Empire. She takes care of herself. She feared that Russia would acquire some of the Turkish territory in Europe and reach across for British territory in Asia. She therefore joined with France, who had some of the same fear, under the last Napoleon, and Russia was crowded back into her own country. The Crimean War ended in the preservation of the Turk. Therefore, Mr. President, I believe in letting France and England administer Armenian affairs and defend them against the Turkish power, because they are responsible for his presence in both Europe and Asia.

I respectfully remind the doctors of divinity who have bestirred themselves recently to an enormous degree to themselves be informed about who is morally responsible for the outrages that have occurred for the last 25 years against that unhappy people. Let those Governments administer the mandate.

The crusades started in England, and Europe from the time that Peter the Hermit and Walter the Penniless led 100,000 deluded people out of Europe into Asia has seen no more improbable scheme than the league of nations and other portions of this treaty. In the years past we are not the only ones who have made mistakes. To-day let the people in Europe who are responsible for those outrages take the burden; let them keep within bounds the Turkish power that they created and preserved.

The Turkish occupation is a tremendous object lesson of how a country's debts become its strength. Had it not been for the differences in the division of territory, had it not been for the debts of the Turkish Government, she would have perished from the earth long ago.

Talk to me about moral obligations! Mr. President, England has no morality in her Government. She never had, from the time that she blew from the mouths of her cannon the Sepoys in the rebellion in British East India, down to the day that she kept our people in prison hulks until starved and disease ridden they died. She has never had either morals or humanity in dealing with her enemies. The Hun is unspeakable, but still the Hun is not far behind our English ancestors when it concerns measures of effective warfare. I do not complain about them, but I object to being in the power of a country that always so zealously takes care of its own people even at our expense.

We have had some instructive examples of our own. I commend England for taking care of her own people, but I prefer to take care of Americans by the American Government, rather than to throw ourselves for mercy into the hands of the British Empire.

Mr. President, both England and France consented in 1917 to the acquisition of the Shantung territory by Japan. I shall occupy but a very little time on the matter. It is not my purpose to go into it at length, but only to leave in the RECORD these highly moral documents.

Many Senators specialize on international morality. I do not care, for my part, to discuss it. There is not a civilized nation in the world whose history has been read or recorded truthfully that has not at times outraged every principle of humanity and morality known to the casuist or the doctor of divinity.

I now read what is a distinct contribution to international morals, dated February 16, 1917, and I may say, parenthetically, that it was as well understood in the cloakrooms of the two sides of this Chamber and in the public press of this country as well as of Europe, that this document existed before the peace conference met, as any other matter of current news.

The British Embassy at Tokyo, on February 16, 1917, addressed to Viscount Motono, His Imperial Japanese Majesty's minister for foreign affairs, a note which, in substance, says that the Shantung territory, from which Japan has recently expelled Germany, in 1914, shall upon the making of the treaty of peace be vested in Japan, and that all the islands north of the Equator shall go to Japan, and those south of the Equator to the British Empire.

A like note was received from the Japanese Government, deeply appreciative of this friendly spirit. It was addressed to the British ambassador, Mr. Greene, and says that it takes pleasure in stating that the Japanese Government on its part is fully prepared to support in the same spirit the claims which may be put forward at the peace conference by His Majesty's Britannic Government in regard to the German possessions and the islands south of the Equator, and assuring the possession of Shantung to Japan.

Then, not to be outdone in this chapter of international morality, dividing up the territory of a friendly power that had furnished at least 300,000 men behind the lines in a nonmilitary service, the French Government sent to the Japanese ambassador a similar letter or note, and received a similar reply. In substance, it amounts to a treaty, an understanding, by which Japan is confirmed in the possession of this territory by two of the allied powers. Russia would have consented to it, but she was not an authority consulted in the making of the treaty. Temporarily she has troubles of her own, and is not to be considered. But these are the two highly moral documents on which we are sought to confirm articles 156, 157, and 158 of this treaty.

If this were upon anything but a supremely sober subject, it would be an idle jest. How many of Japan's soldiers are lying in their graves to-day because of the bloody war with Germany? Few. There were not 300 soldiers killed, wounded, or missing from the entire Imperial Japanese Army in their struggle to eject Germany from Shantung. There is nothing in it that would justify any claim of conquest.

China, it is said, consented, consented under threats, consented when they made the arrangement that was ratified in 1917 by the powers that concealed their negotiations from our country. The Executive said he did not know of these secret treaties. We know of them now. No ignorance can be pleaded when we are asked to ratify the pending treaty on a roll call. Because of that we are asked affirmatively here to set our approval upon these sections that are under criticism.

Mr. President, I do not care to argue this subject at length. I will vote for these amendments. I think I will vote for any amendments that come along. I will be quite candid about it. I do not care whether they are consistent or inconsistent. I have been told that consistency is the vice of small minds, so I can afford to be liberal. I can afford to amplify my knowledge and my position. I will vote for any pertinent amendment that comes along. I hope every one of them will be adopted. There could not be confusion worse confounded if every amendment offered were voted into the treaty. Nobody knows what it is. There are more interpretations than there are expounders. It is an international hodgepodge made up of jealousies, of alliances, of leagues, of vague notions, of war and rumors of war, and threatened world upheavals everywhere. If anybody will write an amendment that offers a chance to clarify it, I will vote for it, and I earnestly hope it will be adopted; and after they are all in the treaty can be no worse than it was when it came to us from Paris. It can not be made worse. So vote them in; and then, after every one of the amendments is voted into the treaty and the league, I will vote to reject it all. I will vote for something along the line of the suggestion offered by the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]. I will vote for an international code that will make a treaty between nations that will be a treaty of principle, and not a government of men; a treaty that will unite nations threatened by a common peril to act together to remove it.

It could not be any worse, Mr. President. It might be improved by mixing it up with something American. It could not be any more immoral if we would add a few local crimes of our own. There is already in it enough to stamp it as the imperial crowning infamy of the age.

Secret treaty? Yes. Japan's is a secret treaty, and yet it is in force. The treaty of the Adriatic border a secret treaty? Yes. It is not in effect. Why? Because the representatives at Paris—our own at least—said secrecy was under the ban. If that is so, then why is the Japanese secret treaty, that was equally concealed from the nations, given full force and effect? We may just as well talk plainly about it. I do not suppose this generation will live to see it, but the next war of any consequence that we have with any power will be with Japan. The motive is present. The ambition has been hers for years. She is a monarchy—yea, more than a monarchy, an autocracy. All that the Kaiser was to Europe the Mikado is to the mainland of Asia. We must not forget that in that time of supreme peril our friend, if we keep faith, will be beyond the Philippine Islands and beyond the Island Empire. It will be on the mainland of Asia, with 300,000,000 Chinese.

Whenever the Caucasian drillmaster goes into the interior of China, when he takes European and American tactics to train men for military strength and service; when China wakes from her dream and ceases to be a race of pacifists; when she understands that her territory is being absorbed in spite of the note of John Hay in 1900; when she remembers all that has been taken along her seacoast, Province after Province seized, port after port taken; when she sees the flag of alien powers floating all the way nearly from the Sea of Kamchatka down to her southernmost border; when she sees her territory taken by nation after nation, at last she will waken from her dream; she will understand that this world is no place for a pacifist; she will understand that the millennium has not come with the league of nations; she will know that the millennium is as far away as it was a thousand years ago; that there are as many devils yet to be chained as there were in the time when the crusades were begun. She will know, too, that the only way to preserve her national integrity and keep her territory without dismemberment by aliens is to be able to defend it against those who despoil her.

There is no pacifist nation on earth that has survived. Where are they to-day? In the 3,000 years of history not one of the pacifistic nations has remained. In that 3,000 years there have been 60 years only of universal peace. During the other 2,940 years it has been the military nations that have possessed and divided the earth; that have taken its wealth; that have dominated its people; that have created imperial dominion around the seas.

England for a thousand years has been a separate Government proclaiming her independence and ready to fight the world. I respect her power, her diplomacy, her warfare, and her genius for government. She has faced more than once a world in arms. She fought the Napoleonic wars. She has been repeatedly threatened with destruction, but she is essentially a warlike nation. She survived, and the British race to-day exercises wide dominion, the greatest territorial power the world ever saw, exceeding that of ancient Rome, exceeding in her genius for government that of any other known country in the world. She has been the lawgiver of nations. She has administered justice to most of her nations, and I believe in time will to all of her colonial nations, even including Ireland. There is an abiding sense of justice in an Englishman if you leave him alone. You can not extort justice from him, but if you leave him alone you will get it at last. It may be somewhat delayed, but he will if you give him time enough to do so. The Irishman is a little impatient. I do not blame him. It has been little less than a thousand years that he has been waiting.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. PHELAN. The Senator from Illinois has stated that the English finally accorded justice if given their own time. In what time will England grant it to Ireland if given their own way? Ireland has waited for 700 years.

Mr. SHERMAN. It will come about the time the millennium comes, when Satan is chained and cast in the bottomless pit. About that time England will make up her mind that as long as there will be justice all over the world anyhow, she may just as well be in the fashion. I think that gives the Senator as definite information as can be afforded at this time.

Because of that, referring back to England and her possessions, we are asked to go in with her and ratify articles 156, 157, and 158 of the treaty. We are thereby making ourselves a part and parcel of an arrangement that contributes to the glory and the strength of Great Britain and Japan.

I repeat to the American public, that in the day of trouble England will not lift her hand to help us in a struggle with Japan. England's commercial jealousy exceeds even her sense of justice.

Gladstone was mentioned by some friend of the treaty to-day as the Grand Old Man of England. Before he died Gladstone made the admission—and it was only one of many mistakes he might have admitted, but the only one he ever did admit—that when he undertook, by his influence with the English Government and the reigning authorities of the British Empire—and that included even colonial possessions wherever the Government could influence them—to dismember this Republic, that it was a mistake. Everybody knew why the Government did so. It was to destroy a great commercial rival. I know how England has claimed credit in history for making the first free soil there was in the world, so that from the instant the slave from foreign countries touched her soil his chains burst from around him. I have heard all that oratory or read it, in the English Parliament and on English platforms, and the most striking of the oratory was Irish oratory and not British. I have heard all that, but the fact remains that in our great struggle to maintain this Government undivided, England, under the lead of William Ewart Gladstone, used all its vast powers to divide and destroy this Republic and to promote a Confederacy based upon slavery. This is the historical record of England's Government in our day of trouble.

Go back to England; examine the political abstracts of title of statesmen there who are now endeavoring to bring us into this treaty and league. Who are they? Go back through Whig and Tory, liberal and conservative and radical of English politics, and you will find that the successors in the English Government of the same men who prayed that this Republic might be dismembered and destroyed to-day are the loudest proponents of the league in England and in all Europe. We are the catspaw of the Old World. No wonder a distinguished English lord in a club in London said that the United States was the "Fat Boy" of the world. We are also the "easy mark" of the world, if you will allow me to use such an expression in this Chamber. We have been worked by everybody.

To-day in not one foot of Italian territory have we a friend. They know that the treaty of 1915 was broken under the 14 points, for it was a secret treaty. Of course, Senators who do not want now to hear about secret treaties or the 14 points make no argument on the subject. They say the 14 points are obsolete. They are not obsolete; they are dead. We have not a friend in all Italy. It is our own fault. It is because for France and England we broke their treaty pledges of 1915. They signed the treaty; they pledged themselves to give to Italy the territory from the Trentino down along the Adriatic border to the southernmost part of Dalmatia. We were reserved as a sacrifice to court the unpopularity incident to breaking the treaty and denying to Italy the result of her entry into the war.

A half million of Italy's soldiers are dead; 1,500,000 of them are wounded for life; five million of them went into the field; she has a debt of $13,000,000,000 in gold; but when she sat at the peace table at Paris she could not get one acre of the soil that had been promised her. She had committed no robbery; it was not proposed to take some other country's territory and give it to her, but to give to Italy territory which was Italian in blood and language and spirit, territory which had belonged to her people and to their ancestors and which had been taken from Italy in the wars of 75 or 100 years previous, at the time of the first Napoleon in 1797, when it was given by Napoleon to Austria-Hungary as a pawn or pledge when he was setting up his relatives and friends on the thrones of Europe. The spoliation of Italy began then, and every acre of land proposed to be returned to Italy by the treaty of 1915 was Italian territory, inhabited by Italian populations, Italian in language, with Italian traditions and Italian in very soul; yet when, upon the dismemberment of Hungary this manifest injustice was sought to be remedied the plea was invoked that this was a secret treaty and could not be enforced.

On the heels of that, in this infamous treaty which we are asked to ratify, are the provisions ceding Shantung to Japan. What kind of territory is Shantung? Chinese, with a population of 38,000,000 Chinamen. What language is spoken there? The Chinese tongue. What literature, what traditions, what laws? All Chinese. It is as if we were a pacifist nation, without the ability to resist, and the territory in which Mount Vernon is located, where the dust of the Father of his Country sleeps, were to be taken from us by treaties made between other countries and turned over to Germany or to some other alien hand. We are asked to ratify it—the treaty containing the Shantung provisions—and if a majority shall ratify it in that form we shall have done so in the face of a secret treaty condemned in the case of Italy and approved in the case of Shantung. I fail to see, for my part, the justice or the necessity of such conduct.

Mr. President, I do not care to say any more. I doubt very much whether I will ever again say a word on this or any kindred subject. It is very much to my dislike that I have occupied this time, and unless there is provocation of an extreme character I shall take no more time on this subject. I wish to vote on every matter connected with the league and treaty. Nevertheless, as contracts go when conditions are to be inserted, if there be such provocation as has been presented here in the continual dwelling upon moral grounds, I shall be heard again.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I have but a word to add to what I said a few days ago regarding this amendment. How I ought to vote upon it has given me more trouble than all the other amendments suggested by the committee. Some of my friends in the State seem to think it a very easy matter to decide just what this Nation should do and what it should not do in any given case. It may be easy for them when they have no particular responsibility to discharge. I know that I am as anxious as they are to do the right thing by the United States. Its interests and honor are my only concern.

As an abstract proposition I agree fully with the contention of the able Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], who strongly urges that the United States should no more meddle in the affairs of Asia than it should in the disputes of Europe.

As an abstract proposition the proposal of the learned Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] that we should not amend this treaty, but should adopt a reservation in effect absolving ourselves from all responsibility for this outrage, which everyone condemns unsparingly, also meets with my full approval. If China alone was involved in this question, I would gladly vote with these Senators. It would be no direct concern of ours as to what should happen to China's territory, and we could well leave China to look out for herself. To my mind, this is not the case, however. China is not the only nation affected or concerned. We are involved as a nation and as a people. China was our friend when we entered this war; China became our associate in the war upon our earnest solicitation, if not with our most friendly assurances. If there is such a thing as a moral obligation between nations, we are morally bound to do what we can to prevent the spoliation and robbery of China by any of our associates. It seems to me that the very honor of the United States is involved, and we should do all we can to have this crime reconsidered and undone. I may be wrong, but this is the way it appears to me; and on this ground I shall vote for this amendment. If it is defeated, I shall then vote for the strongest possible reservation declaring our abhorrence of this unjustifiable outrage.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, some days ago I read into the RECORD from the Columbia Herald, Columbia, Tenn., a splendid editorial upon the league of nations and, incidentally, the responsibilities of United States Senators in discharging their constitutional duty of approval or disapproval of the German treaty now under consideration, and opposing our Government becoming involved in the jealousies, political intrigues, and wars of foreign countries.

My attention has been called to the utterance of George F. Milton, the editor of the Chattanooga News, a Democratic paper published in that city, along the same lines, which I likewise commend.

I read from the pamphlet containing the speech, evidently published for general circulation:

Our people are being stirred into a hysteria very similar to that in Europe previous to the beginning of this war.

Mine was the first pen in Tennessee to urge the President's nomination, and my vote as delegate at Baltimore was cast for him on every ballot, but this is a time for plain speaking. I do not think that it is in the best interests of our country that everyone take their cue from the President and meekly adjust their views to such influence. In a democracy free, frank, and full discussion is contemplated. It was for that reason that the freedom of the press and speech were established in the Constitution. It was for that reason that Mr. Jefferson secured the repeal of the alien and sedition laws in 1801. However able an Executive, he needs an intelligent public opinion to assist him in rendering the best service to the Nation. It will be a calamity to us if we cease to do that independent thinking which has been so useful in the past.

The first consequence of our entrance into this war would inevitably be that we would be drawn into one of the European alliances. Already voices are openly advocating it. In this we would again violate the precepts of Jefferson, who said: "I am not for linking ourselves by new treaties with the quarrels of Europe; entering the field of slaughter to preserve the balance, or joining in the confederacy of kings to war against the principles of liberty." Washington, in his Farewell Address, expressed himself similarly against "entangling alliances." Some paragraphs of his message might have been written for to-day. He said:

"Antipathy in one nation against another disposes each more readily to offer insult and injury, to lay hold of slight causes of umbrage, and to be haughty and intractable when accidental or trifling occasions of dispute occur. Hence frequent collisions, obstinate, envenomed, and bloody contests.

"The nation, prompted by ill will and resentment, sometimes impels to war the government, contrary to the best calculations of policy. The government sometimes participates in the national propensity and adopts through passion what reason would reject; at other times it makes the animosity of the nation subservient to projects of hostility, instigated by pride, ambition, and other sinister and pernicious motives. The peace often, sometimes perhaps the liberty of nations, has been the victim.

"The great rule of conduct for us in regard to foreign nations is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible.

"Europe has a set of primary interests which to us have none, or a very remote relation. Hence, she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence therefore it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves by artificial ties in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships or enmities."

If we join England the war of the Revolution might as well not have been fought. Of course, to join the central powers would not only bring on a naval war with England, but trouble with Japan.

Mr. President, that speech was delivered in the early part of 1916 in various parts of Tennessee. While I did not concur with Mr. Milton in his pacific utterances, but believed that we should enter the war, and voted for it, yet, in his other positions, with regard to independence of thought and the duty of this country to abstain from foreign entanglements, I fully agree with him. I have not had an opportunity to read the Chattanooga News of late, and do not know what Mr. Milton is saying along these lines at this time; but I hope that he is maintaining the manly independence and American spirit shown in this extract from his speech, and that he remains fixed and steadfast in the faith of the fathers, so well expressed by him.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I received this morning the following telegram, which I wish to put in the RECORD, together with my reply. There being no morning hour, I take this opportunity of doing so.

The telegram reads:

[Telegram.]

NORWICH, CONN., October 15, 1919.

Senator FRANK BRANDEGEE,
Care United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

By vote of the Connecticut Baptist convention, we are sending you the following resolution, with the request that it be read before the Senate and printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

"We, the delegates from the Baptist Churches of Connecticut, in annual convention assembled, representing a constituency of 27,000, do hereby petition and urge the early ratification of the treaty of peace with Germany, including the plan for the league of nations, without amendments or reservations such as would send it back to the peace conference for reconsideration."

JOHN N. LACKEY, President.
A. B. COATS, Secretary.

To which I replied:

OCTOBER 16, 1919.

Mr. JOHN LACKEY,
President Connecticut Baptist Convention,
Norwich, Conn.

MY DEAR SIR: Your telegram of the 15th instant, reciting the vote of the Connecticut Baptist convention in relation to the ratification of the treaty of peace, including the plan for the league of nations, is at hand. I shall be glad to comply with your request that the same should be read before the Senate and printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I shall take pleasure in doing this to-day. I regret that I am unable to comply with the request contained in the resolution adopted by your convention. There is no possibility whatever that the treaty containing the scheme for the league of nations will be ratified by the Senate except with radical reservations and possibly amendments. I am utterly opposed to the so-called covenant as at present drawn. It is simply an alliance to control the world by force, and I do not believe that, if adopted, it will result in anything but trouble. I am,

Yours, very truly,

FRANK B. BRANDEGEE.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, there is one phase of this discussion which I think has not been touched upon, and which I think has something of an important bearing upon the credibility which may attach to the so-called secret treaties. It is because I want to call this particular aspect of the matter to the attention of the Senate that I ask your indulgence now for a very brief period.

Historically apparently we are all agreed concerning the Shantung infamy. There seems to be, with possibly one exception, a consensus of opinion in the Senate that the decision made at the Paris conference by which the German rights in Shantung were awarded to Japan was an abominable and a detestable decision, to use the adjectives that have been used heretofore, and that it did a wrong which we ought not in any degree to countenance. Indeed, all of those whom I have heard speak upon the subject seem to have a common purpose in denunciation of the wrong; but the question presented to some seems to be whether there should be an endeavor to prevent that wrong so far as lies in our power.

It is insisted, Mr. President, in one instance, that the decision made by the President of the United States was a decision rendered essential by the peculiar circumstances of the case and a decision which expediency dictated in the Paris peace conference. Indeed, in the White House conference between the Foreign Relations Committee and the President, my recollection is that the President stated that he had been advised before the decision was made in this important matter that Japan was likely to withdraw from the peace conference, or was likely not to become a party to the so-called league of nations, unless the decision was rendered in accordance with Japan's wishes.

We may pass that phase of the matter, Mr. President, justifying, as we may look at it from the one hand, the decision rendered by the President of the United States because of the great advantage he thought might be reaped by the world from that decision, or disagreeing with that decision because of the wrong done an immemorial friend. The matter now comes to us as a coordinate branch of the Government, dealing with subjects of this sort; and upon us now rests the responsibility for a decision which has been rendered by the Paris peace conference, and which, primarily, when submitted to the President, has been determined by him.

I want to impress upon the Senate, if I may, that now this matter comes to us as a Senate and as individuals, for us in the great power that is ours in relation to treaties, for us in the great duty and obligation resting upon us in dealing with world affairs, to do as we now see the right; and if this question is, as I insist, a moral question, if it appeals to the ethics of a man sitting here circumscribed by his oath and desiring to render a service to his country—if it be, I say, a moral question, there is a distinct right and a distinct wrong to that moral question; and upon every man in this body rests the duty and the obligation to decide that moral question as he sees the right or as he sees the wrong.

Therefore, Mr. President, if it is conceded in this body that a wrong decision has been made, if it is admitted here that this decision rendered by the Paris peace conference and the President of the United States is abominable and detestable, is immoral, and is infamous, I am unable to understand how it is possible, if those things be true, and this moral issue is presented to us, for any man to avoid the issue, and to avoid it either in one fashion or the other, either by saying that he will concede the wrong and will protest against it, or by saying that he will admit the wrong and vote for it.

I asperse no man's motives. I recognize that in matters of this sort all of us may view various things differently. I recognize every man's right to his opinion. I recognize, above all that, the right of every man to do just as his conscience shall dictate. I am not questioning, in what little I say, any man's motives, any man's courage, or any man's activities in this regard or in any other regard in respect to this treaty. I state only my own position.

There is a wrong. It is admitted. There is a crime. It is conceded. There is an infamy. No man denies it. If this be so, my signature shall not be attached to that wrong, that crime, that infamy, either directly or indirectly.

So it is, Mr. President, that I am for the amendment presented by the Foreign Relations Committee, that not only points the wrong but indulges its expression of the right; for there is a twofold aspect to this amendment of the committee. The twofold aspect is not only saying that a wrong has been done but asserting as well, by the insertion of China in the particular provision, that this wrong should, if possible, be remedied, and that the right of the situation is that China should be awarded the Province of Shantung.

Now, it is not a question of whether we can yield Shantung back to China. I recognize that we can not do it. I recognize that any act of ours here will not accomplish the desired purpose. I grant all that; but that is no reason why we should not indicate our position, and if our position is that Japan has done a wrong we will not, in the first place, assent to it, and, in the second place, we express our view that Shantung should go back to China; and this we do because called upon to act and express ourselves, even though the act be wholly futile and even though we may not accomplish the design that is ours in relation to the Province.

So, I repeat, there is a twofold design in this amendment, not with the recognition upon our part of absolute accomplishment of what we endeavor to do; not at all; but we point the wrong, we decline to be a party to it, and then we express what we believe to be the right, and that is the bold, the courageous, the righteous thing to do in a proposition of this sort.

I listened this morning to various remarks concerning secret treaties. As I understood the distinguished Senators who spoke in regard to them, it was asserted that no obligation rested upon any of our allies or any of our cobelligerents to communicate to us the nature of the bargains which they made before we entered into the war. Very respectfully I dissent from that position. I say that when we entered this war and mobilized the forces of this land, when we went into this conflict by the side of our cobelligerents, the duty rested upon those cobelligerents to make known to us how they had divided the earth's surface and the peoples of the world. It rested upon them to advise us, just as in the daily affairs of life, if you go forward with an individual, it is his duty to advise you of all the facts that may lie in your common path and of all those things which you may together in the future encounter.

I can not for an instant subscribe to the idea that the foreign nations engaged with us in this strife could accept from us all that was done by America in this war and withhold from us every treaty that they had made which was designed at the peace table finally to dictate the peace. That is something I will not for a moment concede, and in which I am in total disagreement with some of the gentlemen whom I have heard this morning.

The justification of the treaty provision again is made that China has been despoiled before, that in the days gone by we have permitted, without open protest, it is said, various parts of China to be taken by various countries of the earth. Admit it all, Mr. President; concede the despoilment of China in the past; concede that it has transpired exactly as has been related upon this floor. This is the first time, Mr. President, that the United States of America has ever been a party to the despoiling of China, and this is the first time that the signature of the people of the United States has been put to any document which took from China peoples or territory.

There is an immense difference between observing a despoilment which we could not preclude or prevent, and being a party to that despoilment, as we are in the present instance. The proudest thing that there is in our history, Mr. President, the one thing of which we may most boast, is that in all the time that we have been a Nation we have never despoiled a friend and we have never broken our plighted word, and for the first time in the history of the United States now we are asked, not alone to break a plighted word, but we are asked to despoil a friend, upon the theory that we were bluffed out of doing our full duty in the premises and that we might hereafter remedy the wrong that is done.

We are told, too, Mr. President, that this wrong may be remedied by the league of nations hereafter. But I will not insult the intelligence of this body by suggesting that any action in this regard could be brought about not alone by those who are parties to the partition of China, but by the one benefiting nation, Japan, under the league of nations. And so a statement that the remedy might be had under the league of nations is a statement, indeed, that has no real foundation, and is utterly without verity so far as the facts are concerned.

Justification of the secret treaties in this instance and in others? I can not understand that kind of ethics. Justification that China could be despoiled by secret treaties and those secret treaties withheld from us until the President reached Paris, as he says, with no knowledge on his part or on the part of our Government, until that time? Justification for treaties that were entered into, treaties, indeed, that reflected not alone upon Japan, but reflected upon England as well, in dividing the isles of the Pacific? Justification for these treaties, some gentlemen insist upon this floor, when only a short time thereafter, without disclosing those treaties, the representative of Japan asked, from the Secretary of State of the United States, an agreement recognizing the special interests of Japan in China, and never, when thus negotiating, disclosing the treaties which had been entered into which gave a special interest to Japan in China? I repeat, those ethics are beyond my comprehension, and for one I will not subscribe to them at all.

But there is another aspect to this question, Mr. President; there is an aspect that has not been adverted to, so far as I have heard. We had certain terms of peace presented to all the world, certain terms of peace accepted by all the world, certain definite, specific points upon which a world peace should be made, and every nation on earth accepted those certain definite, specific points of peace, save in the one instance where England withheld consent to the provision relating to freedom of the seas; and the peace of Paris was presumably to have been made, not upon secret bargains, not upon treaties entered into before we entered the war, but specifically and directly, by the promise of every belligerent, the peace of Paris was to be made upon the statements of the peace iterated and reiterated by the President of the United States, and accepted by every belligerent in the war. When the President made his specific points of peace, and when they were accepted as the basis of the peace by every nation on earth, these secret treaties and these secret bargains by which spoil was given stealthily unto our cobelligerents were substantially abrogated, and should never thereafter have been heard of; least of all, they never should have been permitted to be a part of the treaty in any degree at all.

Lest we forget, let me remind you of what these terms were upon which we made the peace, and after I have reminded you of what these terms were upon which we made this peace, take your Shantung provision and square it with the terms that were announced to the world and that the world accepted. Take your Shantung infamy, upon which you wish a reservation after you agree to it, and see whether it fits into the picture that was painted by the President of the United States, and to which not only we, but every nation upon the face of the earth, assented and agreed.

In the 14 points presented by the President in January, 1918, we find this:

> 5. A free, open-minded, and absolutely impartial adjustment of all colonial claims, based upon a strict observance of the principles in determining all such questions of sovereignty the interests of the populations concerned must have equal weight with the equitable claims of the government whose title is to be determined.

On February 11, 1918, in the address of the President we find these principles announced:

> The principles to be applied are these:
> First, that each part of the final settlement must be based upon the essential justice of that particular case, and upon such adjustments as are likely to bring a peace that will be permanent.

I assume there is no man who will claim that the essential justice of the case is met by the provisions of the treaty in relation to Shantung. Now, follow this, if you please:

> Second, that peoples and provinces are not to be bartered about from sovereignty to sovereignty as if they were mere chattels and pawns in a game.

We applauded that, and the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD has in parenthesis the word "Applause." The President continued:

> Even the great game, now forever discredited, of the balance of power,

"Peoples and provinces are not to be bartered about from sovereignty to sovereignty as if they were chattels and pawns in a game." Oh, we applauded vociferously when the President thus announced this principle. Where is the applause to-day? Have we forgotten that in the peace conference subsequently peoples were in this particular decision bartered about just as if they were pawns in a game, and are we seeking to maintain American principles thus announced or are we seeking a way of escape from recognizing the American peace principles which in February, 1918, we vociferously applauded?

> Third, every territorial settlement involved in this war must be made in the interest and for the benefit of the populations concerned, and not as a part of any mere adjustment or compromise of claims amongst rival States.

How well that sounds to-day, and yet how soon forgotten. I am sure principles of this sort struck a responsive chord in every American breast. I am sure that every one of us subscribed with enthusiastic approval and indorsement to the statement of the President when he asserted that "every territorial settlement involved in this war must be made in the interest and for the benefit of the populations concerned."

This we believed in February, 1918; this we applauded; this enthusiastically we indorsed. Where is our applause, where is our belief, and where is our indorsement to-day of this principle?

We have the opportunity at least to express ourselves. I repeat, it is not a question of righting a wrong; we may be wholly unable to do it. But we have the opportunity either to stand by our utterances in the past, to do equal and exact justice so far as we are able; we have the opportunity to do the reverse, or we have the opportunity to shirk from either course.

I call the attention of the Senate to these principles of peace because I insist that we, so far as we are able, with the primary obligation now resting upon us to do our duty in respect to the ratification of treaties, should maintain at all hazards, maintain as well as we are able, in every possible manner, the good faith and the honor of the American Nation, and the good faith and the honor of the Senate of the United States.

I quote the President further:

> Fourth, that all well-defined national aspirations shall be accorded the utmost satisfaction that can be accorded them without introducing new or perpetuating old elements of discord and antagonism that would be likely in time to break the peace of Europe and consequently of the world.

Then followed these words:

> A general peace erected upon such foundations can be discussed. Until such a peace can be secured we have no choice but to go on. So far as we can judge these principles that we regard as fundamental are already everywhere accepted as imperative, except among the spokesmen of the military and annexationist party in Germany.

The President says, in February, 1918, that "these principles for which I contend now had been imperatively accepted by every nation on the face of the earth"; and yet at that very time the pockets of our cobelligerents were bulging with secret treaties and secret bargains, by which they were denying the very principles we were expressing to the world and that had been accepted, as the President says, imperatively by all the nations of the earth.

I read again:

> If they have anywhere else been rejected—

That is, other than in Germany—

> the objectors have not been sufficiently numerous or influential to make their voices recently audible. The tragical circumstance is that this one party in Germany is apparently willing and able to send millions of men to their death to prevent what all the world now sees to be just.

All the rest of the world but Germany were sending their forces forward, said the President, in order that every territorial settlement involved in this war should be made "in the interest and for the benefit of the populations concerned." Every other nation on earth, said the President in 1918—and you applauded then—was mobilizing its resources and sending its youth to their death in order that peoples and provinces should not be "bartered about from sovereignty to sovereignty as if they were mere chattels and pawns in a game."

To-day, after we have listened to these principles and accepted them all this time; to-day, in dealing with this provision of the treaty, we are handing about peoples as if they were mere chattels in a great game. How brief are our memories, and, indeed, how soon we forget the principles that we ourselves announced to the world so short a period ago.

I read further from the President:

> I would not be a true spokesman of the people of the United States if I did not say once more that we entered this war upon no small occasion and that we can never turn back from a course chosen upon principle.

I do not pause to characterize the peace conference at Paris when it turned its back upon principle, but to us to-day comes the question—we are up against the gun right now on this Shantung provision—shall we, a part of the Government of the United States that possesses its glorious traditions, and that we upon this side and upon the other side, too, think is the bulwark of the American liberty—shall we, when confronted for the first time with our principle, turn our backs upon that principle and do what admittedly is a wrong and an injustice and an infamous thing nationally?

I continue with the President's remarks:

Our armies are rapidly going to the fighting front and will go more and more rapidly. Our whole strength will be put into this war of emancipation—emancipation from the threat and attempted mastery of selfish groups of autocratic rulers—whatever the difficulties and present partial delays. We are indomitable in our power of independent action and can in no circumstances consent to live in a world governed by intrigue and force.

And then we applauded again. "We are indomitable in our independent action, and we can not live in a world of intrigue and force," and yet to-day the right of our independent action is questioned and not only questioned but denied by some Senators upon the floor, and it is insisted that that right of independent action we should forego now because of circumstances they relate that may come to us out of the peace conference and possible delay in the signing of the treaty. We could not, in February, 1918, even then live in a "world of intrigue and force," but to-day not only can we live in a world of intrigue and force but we can embrace it and say to ourselves, satisfying our consciences by a reservation after consenting to it, not only will we live in a world of intrigue and force but by our votes and our action we will make other people, too, live in a world of intrigue and force. I decline, Mr. President, to do it, so far as I am concerned.

Let me continue with the President's remarks:

We believe that our own desire for a new international order under which reason and justice and the common interests of mankind shall prevail is the desire of enlightened men everywhere. Without that new order the world will be without peace and human life will lack tolerable conditions of existence and development. Having set our hand to the task of achieving it, we shall not turn back.

And at the very first blush, the very first breath of power and intrigue in this treaty, we turn back, and, to use a phrase that has been common of late, we scuttle and run for fear that some nation across the water shall say us nay and shall say that we delayed the signing of the peace treaty.

Again:

I hope that it is not necessary for me to add that no word of what I have said is intended as a threat. That is not the temper of our people. I have spoken thus only that the whole world may know the true spirit of America—that men everywhere may know that our passion for justice and for self-government is no mere passion of words but a passion which, once set in action, must be satisfied.

When and where did we change so that our passion for self-government and liberty became a mere passion of words? If we set out upon that mission in February, 1918, if we agreed that, having set out upon that mission, we would not turn back, let us not turn back now. Let us do the right, no matter what the consequences may be, no matter what even may be the futility of the act. Let us do the right and let us put our stamp of disapproval upon a provision admittedly wrong.

Let me proceed with the concluding sentences of this address of the President:

The power of the United States is a menace to no nation or people. It will never be used in aggression or for the aggrandizement of any selfish interest of our own. It springs out of freedom and is for the service of freedom.

And not only do we have these addresses to which assent was given by our people and by the nations who were engaged in this war, but on July 4, 1918, much of what had been said before was reiterated by the President. I want to read a portion of that address:

This, then, is our conception of the great struggle in which we are engaged. The plot is written plain upon every scene and every act of the supreme tragedy. On the one hand stand the peoples of the world—not only the peoples actually engaged, but many others also who suffer under mastery but can not act; peoples of many races and in every part of the world—the people of stricken Russia still, among the rest, though they are for the moment unorganized and helpless. Opposed to them, masters of many armies, stand an isolated, friendless group of governments who speak no common purpose but only selfish ambitions of their own by which none can profit but themselves, and whose peoples are fuel in their hands; governments which fear their people and yet are for the time their sovereign lords, making every choice for them and disposing of their lives and fortunes as they will, as well as of the lives and fortunes of every people who fall under their power—governments clothed with the strange trappings and the primitive authority of an age that is altogether alien and hostile to our own. The past and the present are in deadly grapple and the peoples of the world are being done to death between them.

Oh, you can repeat that to-day upon this hearing. The past and the present are in deadly grapple, and the United States Senate is called upon to say whether a helpless people, always our friend, shall be ground between the forces which have made possible autocracy and government wherein peoples are not considered at all.

I read further:

There can be but one issue. The settlement must be final. There can be no compromise. No halfway decision would be tolerable. No halfway decision is conceivable. These are the ends for which the associated peoples of the world are fighting and which must be conceded them before there can be peace.

I. The destruction of every arbitrary power anywhere that can separately, secretly, and of its single choice disturb the peace of the world, or, if it can not be presently destroyed, at the least its reduction to virtual impotence.

II. The settlement of every question, whether of territory, of sovereignty, of economic arrangement, or of political relationship, upon the basis of the free acceptance of that settlement by the people immediately concerned, and not upon the basis of the material interest or advantage of any other nation or people which may desire a different settlement for the sake of its own exterior influence or mastery.

Read that second paragraph in the light of this determination. And now, having read these principles of peace, it seems to me obvious that we held out to the world certain definite principles upon which the peace would be made. They are our principles as well as the principles that were enunciated by the President. He enunciated them, and we at least accepted and applauded them. Whether he has maintained himself in relation to these principles is not the particular question at present. The question is, having our word plighted to all the world, having plighted our faith to this helpless ally of ours across the Pacific, shall we keep our faith as best we can? In this juncture shall we, irrespective of whether the duty has been done by any other person, do our duty?

I repeat, Mr. President, this is a moral issue, plain and simple. It is a moral issue. Upon the one hand is the right and upon the other is the wrong. No matter what may transpire, no matter what may be the possibilities of its decision, no matter whether it may remedy the wrong or affect it, the decision of the Senate of the United States should be for the right upon this moral issue.

Mr. BRANDEGEE and Mr. WILLIAMS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will yield to the Senator from Mississippi if he wishes to ask permission to have matter printed in the RECORD.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I have just listened, as have you and the Members of the Senate, to the impassioned oration of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON]. His chief characteristic seems to be impassionateness of one sort or another. He comes back after an unsuccessful visit to California to contend for an unsuccessful proposition in the Senate of the United States. The Shantung amendment is going to be defeated. It is going to be defeated by the common sense of this body.

I have received a number of communications from the State of California in the last few days, some of which I desire to insert in the RECORD, and some of which I shall now read:

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF., October 8, 1919.

Senator WILLIAMS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I note with much gratitude your attitude toward the ratification of the treaty of Versailles in its present form.

Senator JOHNSON represents only the Irish and the sentiment opposed to Japan; he does not speak for the best thought in California. I spent 14 months in France fighting for the principles embodied in the league covenant, and I assure you that I should be glad to return to France and Germany if by so doing I could complete the task begun in 1914. So far as policing certain areas of Europe is concerned, it seems to me a Regular would prefer service in Silesia or elsewhere to service in China guarding commercial interests. While the President has been unwise in some things, he did his duty in Paris. There is a strong feeling out here that JOHNSON is only a politician, fighting Wilson instead of the treaty.

Sincerely, yours, R. S. MACRAE, Jr.

[Western Union telegram—Night letter.]

OCTOBER 4, 1919.

Hon. HIRAM JOHNSON,
857 Green Street, San Francisco:

"Green Street"—

We have listened to your message and feel that your criticism of the league of nations presents no constructive alternative—

And at that point I call the attention of the Senate to the words "presents no constructive alternative."

What are you going to do if the league of nations is defeated? If the treaty with Germany under the league of nations is defeated, what are you going to do? Are you going to Germany upon your knuckle bones and ask for a new treaty? I do not want to take any advantage of you. I am perfectly aware of the fact that whether you go on your knuckle bones or otherwise, Germany will be only too glad to agree to any terms that you may dictate, because she hopes, out of the trouble, to devise further trouble between us and our allies; she hopes out of it all, as Ludendorff recently said in a speech in Germany, to achieve by a treaty of peace what she failed to achieve by war; but, all the same, the remarks of the Senator from California, the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts, and the remarks from other Senators disclose "no constructive alternative"; the language is very important—"constructive alternative." I now resume the reading:

Defects in the covenant can be amended, and meantime it offers the only comprehensive attempt toward enduring peace. The majority of California women are greatly opposed to American isolation and wish their country to continue maintaining her share of international responsibility.

I have also received the following letter:

OXFORD APARTMENTS,
Berkeley, Calif., October 9, 1919.

Hon. JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Pardon me for troubling you. My excuse is my interest in the struggle over the peace treaty and the league of nations, and having closely observed your course in the contest I am led to conclude that any reliable information as to the real sentiments of the people of California touching these vital matters will interest you; so I take the liberty of sending you the inclosed "straw vote" just taken at the First National Bank in this city. As this vote was taken subsequent to the visit of Senator JOHNSON it would seem to indicate that his whirlwind campaign turned out to be a harmless zephyr.

From extensive observations and personal inquiries throughout a large part of this State, I am convinced that the vote as here recorded is below the average of what would be shown by a complete poll of the State. However, nearly 5 to 1 is pretty good.

I am proud to claim Mississippi as my native State.

Yours, for speedy ratification,

J. WALTER SMITH.

Mr. Smith incloses the following:

STRAW BALLOT—LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Deposit at statement department, window No. 38, First National Bank, Berkeley, Calif.

For league of nations	1,273
Against league of nations	281
For league with reservations	183
For league with textual changes	16
For league with reservations and textual changes	116
For league with interpretative resolutions	94
Total	1,963

Vote for one proposition only.

Now, Mr. President, switching from San Francisco and the Pacific coast, I come finally to the South, and to some of the resolutions passed by the United Confederate Veterans.

Mr. President, I can not pay fitting tribute to the United Confederate Veterans; I am unworthy to pay tribute to them. The few of them who are left yet alive, without pensions and without support from anybody in the world, comprehend the best part of all humanity in all the world. Everybody who knows anything about the history of the United States knows that. They are the purest and the noblest and the greatest that America hitherto has produced. I do not mean by that any reflection upon anybody else; I merely mean that I know these old fellows and I know that they represent the highest, the loftiest, the most altruistic, and the most idealistic opinion of America. They have met and have passed in behalf of the treaty of peace the resolutions which I send to the desk, and ask to have inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, leave will be granted. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

The resolutions referred to are as follows:

Whereas the amendments and textual reservations to the treaty of peace and league of nations covenant now pending in the Senate of the United States sharply present the issue as to whether or not this great Republic shall disassociate itself from her allies in the common struggle for the perpetuation of liberty, justice, and the rights of humanity, and refuse to participate in the efforts for a just and lasting peace; and

Whereas the league of nations forcibly presents the ideal for which the Christian world has been earnestly working and hopefully praying for centuries, thereby creating and providing for a wiser and more humane method of composing the differences and contentions of nations with each other without the sacrifice of national sovereignty: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Confedcrate Veterans in annual meeting assembled, That the Senate of the United States be, and it is hereby, respectfully memorialized to speedily ratify the treaty of peace with Germany and the league of nations covenant without amendment or textual reservations.

Humanity, commerce, industry, and the whole commercial order demand that this be done. We should not be kept longer in the twilight between peace and war. We earnestly protest against further negotiations and reopening of the treaty with Germany which would necessarily result if amendments and reservations should be made.

The Constitution of the United States has been frequently amended in the manner provided by that great instrument, and other amendments will follow from time to time as the occasion requires. If the league of nations covenant has infirmities or needs further material correction such amendments can be safely left to the action of the league in the manner provided by the covenant. After the victorious war, let the Senate take no action which would compel the United States to humbly petition Germany for its consent to changes in the treaty.

We entered the war not only to avenge the wrongs and outrages done us but for the preservation and perpetuation of liberty, freedom, justice, and that right should triumph over might; not for conquest but for conscience; not for selfish but for righteous ends; that military autocracy seeking world domination might be dethroned, and that world democracy, governed not by force and fear but by faith, justice, and friendship, might prevail.

No selfish act has marked our course in this Great War, and let us be mindful that no selfish, partisan, or unholy influence shall deter us from the performance of our full duties and responsibilities as peacemakers and peace keepers.

The same inspiring causes, and the same conscience which induced us to wage war, resulting in victory, command us now to stand by the league and energetically cooperate with our allies in bringing about a just and enduring peace.

To abandon our allies now, refuse to participate in the league, and seek separate peace with Germany is unthinkable and too horrible to contemplate. If we could not keep out of the war we can not honorably keep out of the league.

This great conflict has taught us that America, with her lofty ideals and unselfish spirit, belongs to the world and must take her share of the world's burdens in solving world problems. As she stood firmly and courageously with her allies in war, she must stand with them in peace. Let us not adopt any policy of cowardly evasion of our responsibilities by killing the treaty with amendments and boastingly say to our allies, with whom we have worked harmoniously shoulder to shoulder in the war, "You will take us on our own terms, for without us your league is a wreck, and all your gains from the victorious peace are imperiled." On the contrary, let us willingly and gladly cooperate with the other signatory powers, and the peace-loving nations of the world, to prevent the recurrence of a cruel, life-destroying, and devastating war like that from which we are just emerging, and let us uncomplainingly accept our share of the responsibility in making the league of nations effective. If our responsibility as maker of peace has been great, our responsibility as conservers will be even greater.

Fail to ratify the treaty, and our brave boys who made the supreme sacrifice for liberty, justice, and humanity will have died in vain.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, Mr. President, the United Confederate Veterans know something about war, its horrors and its conquests. There has been nothing in all the history of all the world to compare to them in their hour of military surrender and in their hour of self-surrender, which came later. If they had been Irishmen in southern Ireland fighting for something unattainable, they would have left to the history of the United States a different page; but they had common sense enough to know when to quit.

When Robert E. Lee surrendered his armed forces in the field he surrendered them and came back into the American Union as well as he and they could, reconciled to the situation. We are nearly all glad to-day that there are no customhouses along the Ohio or the Potomac to divide the American people. The Irish might at least learn that while they are seeking Irish freedom they ought to seek human freedom. They might at least learn while they are seeking the freedom of a part of Ireland to allow Ulster her freedom. The North finally left home rule to Virginia and Mississippi.

It has not been many days ago, Mr. President, since I heard upon this floor a pretense that over 50 per cent of the American Revolutionary troops were Irish when we gained our independence. Only about 4 per cent of the population of the United States at that time were Irish, and two-thirds of that 4 per cent were Scotch-Irish and English-Irish from Ulster; and during the American Revolution whenever a man raised his cup of beer in Ulster he drank "to the memory of William of Orange and to the liberties of the American Colonies." I also find out from a little bit of investigation that the British troops who took the works at Bunker Hill against us and made a defeat out of the thing that we have celebrated as a victory were a British command denominated the Royal Irish. They went over our works at the very last minute and took them from us.

Some time ago a man wrote to me, an Irishman in this city, and said:

While your father was a colonel in the Rebel Army my father was a private in the Federal Army, and my brothers and uncles and various other people were fighting that way.

Now, Mr. President, without any question of the rightness or wrongness of his contention, I wrote back to him and said:

I do not exactly understand why that appeal should appeal to me. You are now coming to me with the idea of Irish self-determination. When Mississippi wanted self-determination, and when Virginia wanted self-determination, and when Alabama wanted self-determination, you people chiefly prided yourselves upon the fact that you did not allow us any self-determination. I have met over 100 of you since the Civil War who have told me in a confidential, democratic way that it was not the Yankees—the "damned Yankees," as they called them—but the Irish that whipped the people of the South.

As a matter of fact, of course, the Irish never whipped the South at all. They could not whip one State of the South. They could not whip the South anywhere, at any time. They are always contending that they have done everything, everywhere, at every time. They never won the war of the American Revolution. Ten Irishmen were in the British Army to every one Irishman in the American Revolutionary Army.

It was the noble, magnificent men of the West—Iowa and Wisconsin and Michigan and Illinois and Ohio and Indiana—that won that war against the South, fighting with a spirit that no people upon the surface of this earth ever displayed before, but going down before superior numbers. What did the Irish have to do with it? All the Irish in Mississippi were fighting for Mississippi. All the Irish in Virginia were fighting for Virginia. All the Irish down South were fighting for the South. Some of the noblest and bravest and best soldiers that I ever knew personally in my life were of their number; but the fact remains that they fought upon whichever side of the line they happened to reside.

The Democratic Party as a party is not engaged in this controversy; and if I am to believe the assertion of the Senator from California and the Senator from Massachusetts, the Republican Party as a party is not engaged in this controversy.

Mr. President, I find this amongst the contentions of these men who are opposed to the league of nations and the treaty of peace—that while they are constantly emphasizing what they call "Americanism," they mean by it pro-Germanism, Irish-Americanism, Magyar-Americanism, and Austrian-Americanism. We have finally reached the point where, according to the tale of the ledger, no man can be a real American unless he is an Irish-American or a German-American or some other sort of a hyphenated American. I do not think these gentlemen have measured up the consequences.

Suppose that once we English- and Welsh- and Scotch- Americans who have never hyphenated ourselves but have just called ourselves Americans dare to unite in one single party and announce to the American Republic that every man in America who is Scotch, English, or Welsh, or the son of a Scotch, English, or Welsh man or woman, or descended from them, shall consolidate politically as the others do, or attempt to do, where would these fellows be? We are not going to do it, because we are simply Americans and nothing else; but suppose we followed their example and grouped ourselves according to racial derivation as they tend to do? Their only strength consists in the fact of their confidence in our not doing it. They imagine that we dare not ever say to them that we are of English or Scotch or Welsh descent.

Mr. President, I am perfectly aware that this speech which I have just made, or attempted to make, is an unwise speech politically considered. I am perfectly aware of the fact that the Friends of Irish Freedom have been packing these galleries for some weeks. I am perfectly aware of the fact that even my Democratic colleagues might call me to account for the inexpediency of it.

I and those with me standing for this treaty and this league of nations are contending for Anglo-Saxon freedom, for the great universal spirit that has dictated the traditions and the ideals of the race in the United States of America, and in Canada, in Australia, in New Zealand, and in South Africa, those traditions and those ideals being simply expressed in the phrase, "Law and liberty with order," a spirit that is as far removed from Russian Bolshevism as it is from Prussian autocracy, but a spirit standing halfway between license and law.

Mr. President, if there be anything in this world more precious to humanity than Anglo-Saxonism, I do not know where it is to be found. If there be any liberty in this world that did not gather its birth from our brethren in Great Britain, I do not know where it will be found. If there be any law and order in this world that did not gather itself from them or from us, I do not know where it will be found.

All the world ran riot for 100 years except Great Britain and the United States of America. They held their own; they are holding their own now. They have a great middle class that dictates their policies. They have no ruling aristocracy—not even in England now. They have, on the other extreme, no proletariat that can dictate what they shall do. They have a great middle class of average citizens—or subjects, whichever they may be called, here or there—which says to all, "Thus far shall ye go, and no further."

I care not for Germans, I care not for Austrians, I care not for Russians, I care not for Turks, I care not for Serbians, I care not for Roumanians, but I do care for the great political and ethical philosophy of Anglo-Saxonism, and by the aid of God's right hand, extended to our right hand—we upon the earth below and He in heaven above—we are going to establish the civilization and the enlightenment of this world upon the basis of Anglo-Saxon law, Anglo-Saxon order, and Anglo-Saxon liberty. Having made it national, we are going to make it international.

I do not care much about what gentlemen say as to Shantung. I am opposed to the part of the treaty about Shantung. But I recognize the fact that the average American citizen that says that he cares whether Shantung is under Japanese or Chinese sovereignty is more or less talking through his hat. He never heard of Shantung until about the time this war started, and did not know anything about it. All at once, one day, somebody woke up and in a partisan sense announced that he was unalterably for China, and a lot of the men who said that are men who upon the Pacific slope had been fighting Chinese and advocating Chinese-expulsion laws for years. It reminds me of the time when Dewey made the discovery of the Philippine Islands by taking Manila, and all at once, within about three or four weeks, there rose up many Americans who said that the American Republic could not exist without the Philippine Islands. Most of them did not know anything about the Philippine Islands except that there was a hat called the Manila hat, and a straw called Manila straw, that came from there, and even that some of them thought came from Spain.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator yield to me to make a request for unanimous consent?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate vote upon the pending Shantung amendments to-day not later than 5 o'clock, and that after the Senator who is now addressing the Senate takes his seat speeches be limited to 20 minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I will go a little further than that. I will not insist even upon my five minutes. I would be very glad to have a vote. I want to spend about three minutes in saying, before the request for unanimous consent is put, that I do not see the slightest reason in the world why any Member of the Senate on either side of this controversy should resist a vote upon any possible amendment or reservation. Every one of us knows already how he is going to vote. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] could not have any influence over me if he spoke for three hours. Even the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] could not have any influence upon either one of us if he spoke for four hours. Nobody could. I would be very glad indeed to have a unanimous-consent order to take a vote upon anything in connection with this treaty, and especially upon the proposition submitted by so-called friends of the treaty who want to offer reservations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that not later than 5 o'clock a vote shall be taken upon the Shantung amendments, and that from this time forward speeches be limited to 20 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Nebraska a question. The Senate is proceeding under a unanimous-consent agreement to consider the so-called Shantung amendments en bloc. I desire to know of the Senator from Nebraska whether his request carries with it that the vote shall be upon these amendments en bloc, and I suggest to him that he submit his proposition in that manner, if he sees fit to do so.

Mr. LODGE. The agreement was that there should be only one vote.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think that was the understanding.

Mr. LODGE. It is the understanding that we shall vote on them en bloc.

Mr. ROBINSON. The agreement does not reflect that. As written on the calendar, it merely reflects an agreement to consider them en bloc.

Mr. LODGE. I know; but I supposed it was understood that we would have but one vote.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I make the request in that form, then.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will restate the request. Is there any objection to voting upon the Shantung amendments en bloc not later than 5 o'clock, and that speeches be limited to 20 minutes in the meantime?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, have I the floor irrespective of the request for unanimous consent? My reason for asking the question is that it is now 4 o'clock, and if we are to vote at 5 o'clock it will allow only three Senators to speak. If I have the floor, I shall not object and wish to take 10 minutes; but I want to know whether I have the floor or not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut will have the floor when we find out whether there is objection to the request for unanimous consent.

Mr. BORAH. What is the necessity for having a limitation? I do not think there are over two or three speeches to be made. I do not care especially about this particular vote, but there are other votes coming, and I do not wish to have a precedent established by fixing a specific time to vote. I am satisfied that we will get a vote by 5 o'clock, anyway.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Under those circumstances, Mr. President, I withdraw the request.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Connecticut to yield to me for three minutes to make some brief comment upon the address of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I had one experience half an hour ago in yielding for a minute. I would be very glad to yield, Mr. President, if I would not lose the floor; but if I keep yielding to Senators for different periods of time, we can not get a vote by 5 o'clock. I do not know that I have a right to yield for a specific period of time, anyway. I will yield for a question at any time.

Mr. PHELAN. If the Senator desires, I will put my remarks in the form of an interrogatory.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will yield for a question.

Mr. PHELAN. I would like to ask the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] if he thinks it perfectly fair for a Senator to leave this side of the Chamber and, taking his place upon the other side, make a speech which, in the eyes of strangers looking down upon this body, might be attributed to a member of the Republican Party? [Laughter in the galleries.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. Just a moment. There is going to be order in the galleries. The officers of the Senate have been instructed to remove from the galleries those who do not keep order and obey the rules.

Mr. PHELAN. Speaking of races, I believe the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is of the Welsh race. I desire further to ask this question, if the Senator would consider it opprobrious for the managers of the Dublin horse show to post upon the gates of the inclosure, during the intermission between races, that "These gates are closed in order to prevent the escape of 'welshers'?"

Does the Senator think it would be any reflection upon the Deity if Senators, addressing this Chamber and commenting upon the street address of the junior Senator from California, made reflections upon the color "green," with which God has clothed all his wonderful works? Or, would the Senator think that in making a comparison between the Irish in battle and the Irish in peace, that the South, having accepted the situation and yielded to superior force, should also record such conduct on the part of the Irish, who fight but never surrender? The fact is the South, after a valiant struggle, gave way because there was no moral force behind their cause. They were fighting for slavery, whereas the Irish are always fighting for freedom.

I commend to the Senator from Mississippi that he go and live in Ireland because, as was said by a Chinese mandarin, who had observed that he would rather live in Ireland than in any other land, in answer to an interrogatory to explain why, said, "It is the only country in which the Irish have nothing to say."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I may say in opening that I regret exceedingly the introduction into this great question, the weightiest and most pregnant question that has been placed before the Senate of the United States, of these racial questions and questions which develop racial feeling. This is an American question to me, and I have no racial prejudices whatever in relation to it.

One of the inescapable consequences, however, in attempting to frame and put in operation a vast contract to control all the nations of the world, who have at times been rivals and enemies, is that you can not put your finger upon any national trouble in Europe, Asia, or Africa, and attempt to deal with it by this Government without immediately arousing racial feeling in this population of ours, which is drawn from all the Governments and countries of the world.

We are altogether differently situated from any other nation in the world in that respect. All our ancestors came from some one of these foreign countries, and it is impossible to touch any one of the complications which are daily unfolding themselves now in foreign lands without involving, to a certain extent, our own peace and good order, and stirring up racial feelings in this country.

Nevertheless, Mr. President, in the consideration of this treaty and the first part of it, the league of nations covenant, I am speaking simply as an American and without, as I trust, any partisanship and without any racial prejudice. I want to do what I think is best for the United States of America as a Government and for all its people in the long run.

As to the immediate and pending amendment with reference to Shantung, it is immaterial to me how deep a knowledge of the Province of Shantung existed among the people of America before this treaty was formulated. It is not a question of the knowledge that existed as to that Province or other Provinces of China and other remote places in the world. The question is a question of principle, and that is all. It is equally applicable, whether the inhabitants be Chinese, Japanese, or Europeans. Here is a great Province of 40,000,000 people, which holds the command of the arteries of commerce in China, to be turned over from its ancient possessor for 6,000 years into the hands of a foreign empire. We have recognized the Republic of China——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, does the Senator contend that 40,000,000 people are turned over to Japan under this treaty, and that that formed a possession of Germany?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will say to the Senator in reply that I made some remarks on this same subject yesterday, and the idea is that, while the territory itself is not turned over, the possession of the strategic ports and the railroads and the business concessions will allow Japan to control the Province effectively, and, controlling the Province, they control all of north China.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then the Senator's argument is based upon the idea that by the possession of railroads and mines they control the entire population?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The idea is based upon the testimony of Dr. Ferguson, who has been for some 20 years in China and is counsel for the President of China; upon the testimony of Prof. Edward Thomas Williams, who is a professor in Stanford University of California and was the expert on oriental affairs retained by the peace commission itself; and upon the testimony of Mr. Millard, editor of the Far Eastern Review. Upon the testimony of those three gentlemen, whose credibility and whose competency, I venture to say, can not be questioned, it was based.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Do I understand the Senator to say that two out of those three have asserted that there are 40,000,000 of Chinese transferred to Japan?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not assert that there had been 40,000,000 Chinese transferred. I said they all stated that those who control the commerce and facilities for commerce of the Province of Shantung control the destiny of China, and I believe it.

Here is a proposition to turn over to a foreign empire a Province which has a population of 40,000,000——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Thirty-six million.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Whatever it may be—from thirty to forty millions. It is equivalent to a proposition that a State much larger than the Empire State of New York, with its harbor and terminal facilities and radiating railway arteries of communication, should be turned over to an alien empire. Do you suppose the people of this country would put up with such a situation as that? Is that sort of a knife at the throat to be lightly laughed away by saying that nobody cares about the Chinese or whether Shantung is occupied by Chinese or Japanese? Mr. President, is that the spirit in which this great treaty is to be considered?

Here is our fellow Republic, China, which we have recognized. Here, in the very act of creating a covenant for the promotion of peace and good will among men, the first evidence of the spirit which is to actuate the council, which is to control the destinies of all nations, is to plunge a knife into the confiding bosom of our fellow inoffensive, helpless Republic and despoil her.

Mr. President, there is no use arguing the facts of this question. Everybody is ashamed of the transaction. Nobody has risen here or elsewhere to deny the facts. The facts are indisputable. The facts are stated by the President himself, and I will read his testimony in a moment.

But it is said that if we do not become a party to this infamy we can not get the covenant. That is the price. Forty millions of Chinese, the whole Chinese Empire is to be despoiled because Japan, through the Japanese delegates to the peace conference, according to the testimony of the President in the White House to the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, notified him that if he did not carry out the provisions of the secret treaties which England and France had made with Japan——

Mr. WILLIAMS. And Italy.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes; and Italy—to turn over this Province to Japan, they stood instructed by the Japanese Government to withdraw from the conference.

And the President of the United States, instead of standing upon the lofty principles announced by him and reiterated to-day by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], weakly surrendered because he had to have his covenant.

I read now from page 529 of the hearings before the Committee on Foreign Relations. This is the interview of the President with the Foreign Relations Committee at the White House:

Senator BRANDEGEE. In part 6 of the hearings before our committee, on page 182, Senator JOHNSON of California questioned Secretary Lansing. [Reading:]

"Senator JOHNSON of California. Was the Shantung decision made in order to have the Japanese signatures to the league of nations?

"Secretary LANSING. That I can not say.

"Senator JOHNSON of California. In your opinion was it?

"Secretary LANSING. I would not want to say that, because I really have not the facts on which to form an opinion along that line.

"Senator JOHNSON of California. Would the Japanese signatures to the league of nations have been obtained if you had not made the Shantung agreement?

"Secretary LANSING. I think so.

"Senator JOHNSON of California. You do?

"Secretary LANSING. I think so.

"Senator JOHNSON of California. So that even though Shantung had not been delivered to Japan, the league of nations would not have been injured?

"Secretary LANSING. I do not think so.

"Senator JOHNSON of California. And you would have had the same signatories that you have now?

"Secretary LANSING. Yes; one more, China.

"Senator JOHNSON of California. One more, China. So that the result of the Shantung decision was simply to lose China's signature rather than to gain Japan's?

"Secretary LANSING. That is my personal view, but I may be wrong about it.

"Senator JOHNSON of California. Why did you yield on a question on which you thought you ought not to yield and that you thought was a principle?

"Secretary LANSING. Because naturally we were subject to the direction of the President of the United States.

"Senator JOHNSON of California. And it was solely because you felt that you were subject to the decision of the President of the United States that you yielded?

"Secretary LANSING. Yes.

"Senator JOHNSON of California. The decision is his?

"Secretary LANSING. Necessarily."

Then I said to the President:

Now, I wondered whether Secretary Lansing was well informed about this question or not?

The PRESIDENT. Well, my conclusion is different from his, sir.

Senator BRANDEGEE. You could not have got the signature of Japan if you had not given Shantung?

The PRESIDENT. That is my judgment.

Senator BRANDEGEE. You say you were notified to that effect?

The PRESIDENT. Yes, sir.

Senator SWANSON. As I understand, you were notified that they had instructions not to sign unless this was included.

The PRESIDENT. Yes.

Now, I read from page 526 of the hearings before the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Senator JOHNSON of California. Did China enter the war upon our advice—the advice of the United States?

The PRESIDENT. I can not tell, sir. We advised her to enter and she soon after did. She had sought our advice. Whether that was the persuasive advice or not, I do not know.

Senator JOHNSON of California. Do you recall, Mr. President, that preceding that advice we had asked China, as one of the neutral nations, to sever diplomatic relations with Germany?

The PRESIDENT. Whether we had asked her?

Senator JOHNSON of California. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT. I do not recall, Senator. I am sure Mr. Lansing can tell, though, from the records of the department.

Senator JOHNSON of California. Do you know, Mr. President, whether or not our Government stated to China that if China would enter the war we would protect her interests at the peace conference?

The PRESIDENT. We made no promises.

Senator JOHNSON of California. No representations of that sort?

The PRESIDENT. No. She knew that we would as well as we could. She had every reason to know that.

Senator JOHNSON of California. Pardon me a further question: You did make the attempt to do it, too; did you not?

The PRESIDENT. Oh, indeed I did; very seriously.

Senator JOHNSON of California. And the decision ultimately reached at the peace conference was a disappointment to you?

The PRESIDENT. Yes, sir; I may frankly say that it was.

Senator JOHNSON of California. You would have preferred, as I think most of us would, that there had been a different conclusion of the Shantung provision, or the Shantung difficulty or controversy, at the Paris peace conference?

The PRESIDENT. Yes; I frankly intimated that.

Senator JOHNSON of California. Did it require the unanimous consent of the members of the peace conference to reach a decision like the Shantung decision?

The PRESIDENT. Every decision; yes, sir.

Senator JOHNSON of California. Do you recall, Mr. President, prior to the decision on the territorial question of Shantung, or of German rights in Shantung, the racial equality question coming before the peace conference?

The PRESIDENT. I remember that at one of the sessions called plenary sessions a resolution regarding that matter was introduced by the Japanese representatives, but rather as an expression of opinion or hope, and it was not pressed for action.

Senator JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, the press at that time stated that it had gone to a vote—and I trust some one will correct me if I am in error—and that the vote was 11 to 6 upon the proposition. The dispatches at that time were to that effect.

The PRESIDENT. I was misled, Senator. You are referring to the commission on a league of nations?

Senator JOHNSON of California. Yes.

The PRESIDENT. There was a vote there. There never was a vote on any subject in the peace conference.

Senator JOHNSON of California. I confounded the two.

The PRESIDENT. Yes.

Senator JOHNSON of California. May I ask, if permissible, how the representatives of the United States voted upon that particular proposition?

The PRESIDENT. Senator, I think it is very natural you should ask that. I am not sure that I am at liberty to answer, because that touches the intimacy of a great many controversies that occurred in that conference, and I think it is best, in the interest of international good understanding, that I should not answer.

Mr. President, I will not say that to any lawyer or to any diplomat, but to any high-school child who can read that testimony the whole thing is as clear as a bell. Our historic position with reference to China was one of friendship, almost of guardianship. We alone of all the nations that had had the chance to despoil her had treated her squarely and had never taken anything from her. We had her confidence. She knew we wanted nothing from her. Our own Government intimated to the Chinese delegates that they ought not to employ American counsel to protect their rights at the conference, and on that intimation they did not employ American counsel to protect their rights. They relied upon our integrity, and the President says that they knew we would do everything we could to protect their rights. The President says—well, I will not repeat his words—it was with the utmost regret that he surrendered. He surrendered his own principles announced in his 14 points; and he did it because the powers that had made the secret treaty with Japan said, "Here we ourselves are bound; you settle this thing with Japan; you are the goat, so to speak." The President tried to settle, and when he found they would not settle on his terms he settled on their terms. That is all there was to it.

In order that we may have the glorious privilege of bearing the burden of guaranteeing the territorial integrity and the political independence of every member of this league—which may grow indefinitely and include all the nations of the world—we generously and magnanimously agree, when we vote against the amendment proposed by the committee to the Shantung provisions, to ratify the Shantung outrage. We agree to do it; and then we put on record a self-accusing declaration, which simply adds to our infamy, when we say we recognize the infamy of it, but we vote to do it and we file the declaration that it is inexcusable that we should do it. If any other Senator wants to stand upon that record through the rest of his life, let him take his stand upon it. I will not stand upon it, treaty or no treaty, covenant or no covenant.

I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts that the suggestion that an amendment to the treaty will necessarily destroy it is mere fiction. It is a bugaboo to say that an amendment involves the resummoning of the peace conference. The peace conference has never been dispersed; it is in session today; but, even if it were not, on our mere submission by cable to the chancelleries of the various high contracting parties an amendment would be accepted by their own Governments irrespective of their delegates to the peace conference, or they could instruct their delegates at the conference to accept it. But we are no more to touch this European-made thing than we are to touch the Ark of the Covenant. Everyone admits it is full of errors, and that this is the only chance we will have to correct them. The talk about taking it as it is and then fixing it as it ought to be is pure buncombe. Everybody knows that our chance to correct the errors in this document is now, and it is the only chance we will ever have.

Look at article 26 of the league covenant providing that amendments to the covenant shall take effect when ratified. There is no provision as to who shall propose amendments and no provision as to when they are to be acted upon; but there is the provision that before an amendment shall take effect it has got to be approved by the unanimous vote of all the powers having representation in the council and by a majority of all the powers represented in the assembly. The minute we propose an amendment Japan—and I say it without feeling toward her, for I have nothing against the Japanese people any more than I have against the Chinese people—Japan will say, of course, "Yes; we will vote for your amendment if you will admit our immigration to your country." Either the thing is unamendable, or we have got to surrender our domestic questions to foreign control. Any way you look at this thing, Mr. President, it is unwise for this country to entangle itself in it. We have nothing to gain. Nor is it our duty to agree to it.

I recall that for the past 30 years the Democratic Party has been inundating this country with the declaration that we have no constitutional power to tax our people to protect our own industries and our own laboring men, while now they are asserting the doctrine that we have the constitutional power, and that it is our international duty, to tax all our people, not for their benefit, but to raise armies and build navies to protect the territorial integrity and political independence of every member of the league in Europe, Asia, and Africa. What constitutional power have we to make a treaty to do any such thing as that? Is that one of the purposes defined by the Constitution of the United States for which we can tax the people of this country? Why should we assume such a burden? On which side shall we fight?

If one foreign nation attacks another, do you suppose that this country can be thrust into a war against one European power to protect the boundaries or political independence of another European power because some one man appointed by the President of the United States, sitting in Geneva, happens to agree with the eight foreigners who are there that we should go to war? Do you suppose on such a question the American people can be coerced to agree to the judgment of Col. House, if he should be the delegate? And if he should decide that we must fight Roumania, although we were in favor of Roumania? Do you suppose that such a decision could be carried into effect? If it could not be, we would break our contract. What is the use of making a contract and solemnly placing the great seal of this Nation upon it if we do not intend to keep it?

The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] yesterday, on the floor, made an eloquent speech in favor of the league of nations, in which he said he agreed with everything the President had done in connection with it, and said that if we would sign this document and agree to it we would never be called upon to take any action under it. In other words, it is a "mind cure." He wants us to sign this document promising to do these things because we will not be called upon to do them. Imagine an arrogant, determined, and powerful belligerent like Germany, and let the announcement be made that we are assuming this mighty obligation on the theory that we will not be called upon to perform it, how much of a deterrent do you suppose it would be to them when they contemplate another raid upon civilization, if they ever shall?

The President himself after a labored explanation, or attempted explanation, of article 10 to the committee at the White House conference entered into a disquisition as to the difference between a legal obligation and a moral obligation on our part to perform our contract. Mr. President, that is all sophistry; it must be swept aside. Everybody knows that if we guarantee to protect, or if we undertake the obligation to preserve, the territorial integrity of another nation we have got to perform that task, and we have got to perform it by the only means practicable; and if the territorial integrity of a foreign power is threatened by an armed force, the only way—and everybody knows it—to protect its boundary lines is by an opposing army. It is said that the council is merely to advise; but, as the President says, there is a compelling moral obligation for us to conform to the advice. And Congress will be put in the position then, after we have been in this league, if we get into it, unfortunately, for some years, and get so enmeshed with the complicated broils and conspiracies and intrigues of the Old World that we can not get out, of having to go ahead and follow the advice. Very likely the President will recommend to our delegate to agree with those foreign powers, and then we will have to raise our Army, and Congress will not be a free agent; but what a condition this country will be in!

As I say, you can not touch one of these foreign questions without making it at once a domestic question, and a domestic question which will haunt you at the polls, and paralyze your industries, and put the country upon every occasion to the terrific expense and risk of going through exactly the sort of experience that we had to go through when the Germans in the country were paralyzing our industries and blowing up our railroads and bridges and mills. That is merely an illustration of what is going to be our regular order of business if we enter this thing with an idea of performing our duties.

Oh, Mr. President, they say, "You are for war if you are not for this covenant." "Where is your constructive alternative?" the Senator from Mississippi quotes his illiterate correspondent from an unknown address in Green Street as saying. "Where is your constructive alternative?" Why, my constructive alternative is to do what Congress has already declared shall be done and what is declared to be the purpose of the country in the magnificent and comprehensive resolution proposed by the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] and reported favorably by the Committee on Foreign Relations. Make your peace—the only thing that is delaying it is the insistence that this covenant and experiment and chimera shall be a part of it—make your peace and then, as we have already authorized, I believe, in an amendment to a naval appropriation bill, summon the nations of the world together to agree upon a plan; have an international congress to agree upon a plan for making and codifying and observing a code of international law. You can not shoot morality into people with 13-inch guns. Adopt section 5 of Senate resolution 76, submitted by Senator KNOX on June 10, as follows:

That, finally, it shall be the declared policy of our Government, in order to meet fully and fairly our obligations to ourselves and to the world, that the freedom and peace of Europe being again threatened by any power or combination of powers, the United States will regard such a situation with grave concern as a menace to its own peace and freedom, will consult with other powers affected with a view to devising means for the removal of such menace, and will, the necessity arising in the future, carry out the same complete accord and cooperation with our chief cobelligerents for the defense of civilization.

The present covenant is not a peace treaty. It is a "big stick" wielded by the five principal and allied powers over the subject nations of the world. It is nothing but a threat; and article 10, as the President himself says, is the heart of the threat. There are concealed behind it the menace of your potential armies and navies. They are to be summoned after you settle these questions of first, second, and third judgments upon "compelling moral obligations." There is your Army to be sent, and that is all there is to this league—that the five principal allied powers, represented one apiece upon a council sitting in foreign lands, with four others to be added practically at their dictation, for they will control it—those nine men, three times a triumvirate—are to sit there and by their machinations, in a star chamber as unknown to the public as the secret diplomacy that for nine months reigned uninterrupted in Paris, they are to issue their edicts to civilization; and upon what they say, not upon what Congress says, are human events to be decided.

The President says our protection is that it has to be unanimous. Very well. Suppose Col. House sits in the council there and the President of the United States orders him to agree with what the eight foreigners say shall be the diplomatic conduct of the relations of the United States of America, and he does agree, what are we going to do about it? The thing is done. The President himself knows how such things are done. Here is his view of it, from his book on "Congressional Government":

Nay, in many cases the President may not even know what the Senate's objections were. He is made to approach that body as a servant conferring with his master. His only power of compelling compliance on the part of the Senate lies in his initiative in negotiation, which affords him a chance to get the country into such scrapes, so pledged in the view of the world to certain courses of action that the Senate hesitates to bring about the appearance of dishonor which would follow its refusal to ratify the rash promises or to support the indiscreet threats of the Department of State.

Why, it is the President that controls the foreign policy of this country under this scheme, and he controls it without responsibility to anybody; and if Col. House—if he be the unfortunate delegate selected to represent the President in this "star chamber" abroad—presumes to disobey the secret instructions of the President, off comes his head, and there would be no trouble in securing plenty of subservient gentlemen to go there and do what they are told, because the worst that can happen to them if they hear they are to be hung upon return to their own country is not to come, but to stay over there.

That is the position that the United States of America is asked to put itself in. That is the fruit of six months of foreign labor and toil and "matching of minds"!

Mr. President, we can always form a league. They claim that they have formed one over there now. Let them have it. This country does not need to have its boundaries protected. We do not ask Russia or Great Britain or France to preserve our political independence. When that is assaulted, the American people in their majesty and might will know how to defend it! But we are to devote the future of America to being a policeman for the rest of the world. Imagine the financial schemes that are in contemplation when the debts of bankrupt Europe come to be liquidated! They do not have to control Congress, these mighty men of finance, any more. They simply go to the President, or to the nine powers, and make their financial arrangements. Whether this war debt of the world is to be funded and imposed upon us is a matter we know nothing about. All these menaces stare us in the face. When the President went abroad to make this peace nobody had it in his mind that he was to return with any such proposition as this; and the pathetic thing about it is that all the good people who want peace seem to be satisfied with anything that is labeled "peace," "a league for peace." Many of them are for the league without looking to see what is in it or on what theory it is drawn or how it is going to work.

Mr. President, they have got to be saved from themselves, and it is our duty to do it. We know what is in this covenant, and we can imagine how it will work; and the Senators who have borne the abuse and who have suffered the ignominy that has been heaped upon them by good but deluded people, in my opinion, if they live a year, and we can keep out of this international contrivance, which I prophesy will blow up the first time any strain is put upon it in an emergency, will come into their reward, and a grateful Republic will say that again the Senate of the United States has saved the country.
